

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

YEARS may be in store for the world more eventful than the twelve months now closing; seldom, however, has any year left these British Isles so rich in the materials of well-being, and so laden with the loving-kindness of the Lord. A continued depression in some branches of industry notwithstanding, the commerce of the year has been unprecedented; and although the recklessness of a few speculators has occasioned no small anxiety and disaster, there is reason to believe that seldom has there been within our borders the same amount of solid wealth and substantial comfort. All other blessings have been enhanced by peace, and a good and early harvest has crowned the mercy. In Ireland sparks of ancient animosities still smoulder, and into what a fierce and sudden flame they can be stirred was seen in the Belfast riots; but probably there never has been a time when all classes of the English community were drawn so closely together, when political rancour was so feeble, when there was the same honest, hearty effort on all hands for the good of the commonwealth, when the poor felt so little suspicion or heart-burning towards the rich, or when the highest in the land felt so proud of the growing worth and intelligence of the labouring classes.

Whether Christianity makes equal progress, is a more doubtful question. To many minds the recent controversies have been exceedingly unhinging. The hopeful piety of some has been nipped by the frosty winds of Rationalism, and the careless have found in these debates a convenient excuse for their continued worldliness and unbelief. Nor are symptoms wanting that, encouraged by the hope of assistance from traitors within the camp, the attack will be resumed with new vigour against the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath, which secularists rightly deem the chief bulwark of spiritual religion in these lands.

The ludicrous collapse of the Shakespeare celebration enables us to congratulate our friends in Geneva on the comparative success of the Calvin centenary. The literature evoked there and elsewhere, even when not entirely favourable, has done much to dispel prejudices regarding the great Reformer; and innumerable discourses and addresses from the pulpits of the Old World and the New must have done good service in recalling men's minds to the truths which this mighty thinker did so much to systematise and vindicate.

If the friends of peace have still to deplore the continuance of strife and slaughter amongst our Transatlantic brethren, and if the well-wishers to Germany regret the war of passion which has done such injury to Denmark and reflected so little honour on the "Fatherland," to the friends of freedom and of Italy it is no small relief to know that the foreign occupation of Rome is coming to an end, and that the most interesting of all nations may again be mistress of herself, as well as possessor of blessings which she did not know when mistress of the world.

The rebellion in China has come to an end, and the Manchoo dynasty has once more, in name at least, undisputed empire. Let us hope that the representative of Britain at Peking will take care that his co-religionists, whether native or foreign, shall run no risk of such outrages as Protestantism has endured in Turkey during the diplomatic reign of the present English Minister.

Amidst such mingled elements of anxiety and hope, the year is drawing to a close. That there are clouds dark enough on the horizon of Europe and the world, cannot be disguised, but the breath of God's Spirit can soon dispel the darkest of them all. And it is the part of the Christian to hope. Himself "saved by hope," he is in a position to be the consoler and helper of his brethren. We belong to a kingdom which cannot be moved—a kingdom the boundaries of which may, from time to time, contract or expand, but which can never be annihilated, and which is destined to absorb into itself the earth and its fulness. As regards humanity itself, the mere fact of redemption is enough to assure us that God's purpose is a purpose of progress. Even now we believe that there is going forward a real and multiform advancement; but our faith in the future is only a reason for present vigilance and increasing activity. To the Church of Christ a great door, and effectual, is at this instant open, but there are many adversaries. Our pages will still transmit the tidings received from watch-towers throughout the world, and if our zeal and love be worthy of the cause, and if a spirit of earnest intercession be awakened within the Church, we shall doubtless soon be permitted to record new triumphs of the truth as it is in Jesus.

Evangelical Christendom.

THE ALLIANCE, AND WHAT IT HAS DONE.

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE was constituted at London, in August, 1846. Many of those who took part in its formation have since fallen asleep, and no earthly assembly can henceforward be ennobled and hallowed by the presence of Bickersteth and Bunting, Raffles, Leifchild, and Wardlaw, Cunningham and Brown, Thomas Farmer and Sir Culling Eardley, Adolphe Monod, of Paris, and Dr. Baird, of America. It is a large fund of lovingkindness which our world has lost in losing them, nor is it easy to replace the men whose lofty worth and endearing goodness made them the attractive centre for any religious union: but although the personal charm is partly broken, and even although we should concede that all the results have not been reached which in the bright outset of this movement seemed to its originators so near, enough has been accomplished to requite the pains of those who in this good work laboured so long and never fainted.

For example: It is no small thing to have displayed to the world a testimony for so much TRUTH. Love is the atmosphere which the Christian breathes, but Truth is the rock on which he stands. And "what is Truth?" That the Holy Scriptures are divinely inspired, and are a sufficient rule of faith and conduct, that in the Unity of the Godhead there is a Trinity of Persons, that in consequence of the fall human nature is utterly depraved, that the Son of God incarnate effected an atonement for sinners of mankind, that the sinner is justified by faith alone, that it is the work of the Holy Spirit to convert and sanctify, that the soul is immortal, that the body will rise again, and that at the judgment of the world by the Lord Jesus Christ the righteous shall go away into eternal blessedness, and the wicked into eternal punishment—that so much at least is revealed truth, and clear beyond all controversy, is the answer of the Evangelical Alliance. Lutherans and Moravians, Arminians and Calvinists, Episcopalians and Presbyterians, Baptists and Wesleyans, have together witnessed this good confession, and on the "basis" of these great doctrines standing-room has been found, firm and ample, for more than fifty denominations. This ought to surprise no Protestant, but such a palpable unity of the Reformed is calculated to refute the Romish allegation as to our endless divisions and irreconcilable antagonism: whilst to brethren in Italy and elsewhere it holds out the promise that, should their new and purified Churches fail to repeat in every particular any existing organization, they will still, if loyal to the Lord, and holding fast the truth as it is in Jesus, be honoured by their fellow-servants and welcomed into this federation of the faithful.

The Alliance, however, has been eminently successful in promoting its own primary object—the manifestation and diffusion of BROTHERLY LOVE. This object has been generally undervalued. Many good men have said, "By all means associate for purposes of solid and practical utility. Unite to circulate the Word of God, to improve the dwellings of the poor, to reclaim and elevate our sunken masses. But merely to promote friendly feeling and mutual acquaintance between fellow-Christians, is an end too vague and shadowy to secure our sympathy. Your society is founded on a sentiment, and it will accomplish nothing." And so "practical people" are apt to limit their regards to gold, silver, copper, and the sixty elements which constitute the simple substances of the chemist; for out of these simple substances loaves are elaborated, beef and mutton are manufactured, sovereigns and sixpences are coined. But those who look a little deeper lay great stress on powers and agencies which refuse to go into the scales of the chemist, and they are continually thinking of electricity, and magnetism, and gravitation, and the vital force. Nor should practical people despise these inconspicuous agencies. Without them there would be no staff of life, no savoury venison, no cattle on our thousand hills, and even the sixpences and sovereigns would take wings and fly away. To say nothing of that supreme and ultimate Agency which gives to all others their efficacy, we cannot overrate such vital forces as Faith and Love, nor such a power as Prayer. They are "imponderables," but in the moral world they are by far the most potent energies. It is owing to the want of these that missions languish, and that admirable organizations produce inadequate results. It is where these abound that religion revives, the widow and the fatherless are visited, the Lord's treasury is filled, and volunteers in abundance come forward ready for any effort of Christian philanthropy, and intent on seeking and saving that which is lost.

Not only has the Alliance done much to demonstrate the catholicity of the Christian Church, but by its great convocations and its feasts of charity, it has gone far to bring down from its lofty abstraction, and quicken into a joyful reality, another article of the creed, "the communion of saints." How often have those who love the Lord found their hearts burn within them as in the society of fellow-disciples they were brought nearer to a risen Redeemer! How often have cold and half-consenting spirits been warmed and melted as the South wind waked, and in the coming of an unseen Comforter the clime grew soft and balmy! How often has the touching spectacle been witnessed—old faults confessed or old feuds forgotten in the moment of a mutual admiration; life-long friendships commenced and confirmed betwixt ancient adversaries; and the unexpected recognition, with the tearful response to the announcement which brings back far distant days, "I am Joseph your brother!"

The tendencies towards ecclesiastical amalgamation which are drawing together some denominations, hitherto divided, may be in some degree ascribed to the self-same origin. On the floor of the Alliance brethren met, and were surprised to find how intelligent, how high-minded, how loveable their opponents or rivals were: shadows fled away; distrust, dislike was replaced by that generous affection which strives to make up for former estrangement, and of continued intercourse the natural consequence has been the inquiry, Is there any barrier of principle in the way of our actual union? Scarcely less valuable is the service which has been rendered where ecclesiastical incorporation is not presently contemplated. An immense addition has been made to the magnanimity and mutual regard of fellow-Protestants of all persuasions; and even although many of the old denominations should still remain, we have no fear but that "brotherly love" will also "continue."

Amongst the TANGIBLE RESULTS of the mutual interest thus awakened amidst the widely-scattered members of the Christian family may be mentioned the successful interposition which the Alliance has often made on behalf of suffering brethren; such as the persecuted Baptists in Germany, the Madii in Tuscany, Matamoros and his fellow-prisoners in Spain. Equally precious is the intimate acquaintance which we have now formed with one another. Till of late, each British denomination was apt to be "insular." Now we have learned to look, not every one on his own things, but every one on the things of others. The progress of real religion is important to every Christian, whether the immediate precincts within which that progress takes place be his own or his neighbour's; and, like the yearly reunions of the Alliance, it has been the effort of these pages, from month to month, to apprise Christians of Britain, of the Continent, of America, as to the progress or perils of the cause which we have at heart in common.

To obtain and diffuse such intelligence shall still be a principal object of Evangelical Christendom; and, with the distinguished correspondents who have promised their services, our readers may rely on information at once fresh and authentic. The space which is not required for such communications we purpose to occupy with brief notices of well-known members of the Alliance, who now rest from their labours, and with articles calculated to advance its objects. Amongst these may be included occasional defences of the common faith of Christendom, at present so eagerly assailed, as well as tributes to the memory of its more illustrious champions and expounders. We also hope to take an occasional survey of the various Evangelical communities, pointing out their distinguishing features, and their specific contributions to the common Christianity; nor shall we omit to notice valuable accessions to religious and theological literature. But above all do we desire to dedicate such space as we can secure to the exposition and enforcement of those "things which are honest, lovely, and of good report," and in the abundant exemplification of which, as the field is unlimited, so we trust that unprecedented triumphs await the farther progress of Evangelical Christianity.

A WORLD UPON WHEELS.

It is not easy to delineate with accuracy any period of history; but it is peculiarly difficult to depict our living age. We are almost certain to exaggerate some features, and there are others which cannot obtain due prominence till the progress of events has brought out their significance. Besides, as civilization advances the influential elements multiply, and in various ways neutralise or enhance one another. Hence, if it needs care and accurate information in order to appreciate aright the England of Edward III. or Henry VII., it is a still harder task to analyse the very composite and miscellaneous England of Queen Victoria. We do not attempt it. We only seek to indicate a few of its more obvious characteristics, with their bearing on the duty of the Church and the Christian.

The present time is pre-eminently locomotive. As Mehemet Ali said to Sir John Pirie, when urging a farther acceleration of the overland transit: "England goes by steam. Pouf, pouf! whirr, whirr! you English are all upon wheels." It is so easy, so tempting, to travel, that no one stays at home. If any one were coming to London in the autumn, he would find the streets and houses, but not the people. He would find London in Paris, up the Rhine, scattered over the moors of Scotland—anywhere except in Middlesex. In the same way, all the world comes here. In every place of public resort you see the strange attire of some far-come outlandish race—Icelander, Japanese, Parsi, New Zealander; and you overhear strange dialects, Basque, Slavonic, or something stranger still, of which you cannot make out one syllable. Your next-door neighbour is perhaps a Russian or a Greek, a Dutchman or a Dane; and whilst in every large town of England you can find a little Scotland, and a larger Ireland, the neighbourhood in which we are at this moment writing so abounds in Hebrew inhabitants, that it has been nicknamed "the Land of Promise." Morally, if not physically, we have solved the problem of perpetual motion; and if the ocean be the highway of the world, England is its hostelry.

A circumstance not without its drawbacks: for such is the sad weakness of our nature, we copy from our neighbours their worse ways rather than their better. A Scotchman settling in an English town is at first scandalised by the ill-kept Sabbath; but relishing neither the liturgy at church nor the organ in the chapel, he stays at home, and by-and-bye wanders about the fields, and ends at last by being himself a Sunday trader, and, in order to justify it, an infidel to boot. Or a young Englishman is sent to a German university, and the strange life of alternate study and riot which is there the rule—he tries it also; but in his case the bookishness is soon drowned in the dissipation, and when, with folly and feculence thrown off, his German companions have settled down into quiet councillors and sedate divines, with him it is the other way; the student is extinct, and it is only the reveller or roué who survives. In other words, passing from a protected clime into a region of exposure, it is more likely that character will be blighted than that the moral constitution, the religious principle, will be confirmed.

Still, this is a feature of our time, and we must face it, both as a test of our own loyalty to our Lord, and as a possible means of extending His kingdom. “Thou God seest me,” must be our motto in the crowd of the city as well as in the seclusion of the country; and if from the giddy godlessness of Paris, and the noisy Sabbath of Berlin, we find that we cannot bring back a mind as devout as we carried away, it would be far better to tarry at home and forfeit all the exhilaration and intellectual expansion which are to be derived from foreign travel: although it would be better, more manly, and more Christian, to accept the good and avoid the evil; nay, safer for ourselves to turn the tables, and try to extend the good and abridge the evil. Nor would it spoil the pleasure were there to the tourist superadded a little of the missionary, and by giving away a Testament or a tract, or by a little kind and friendly talk, were we endeavouring to propagate that truth which alone can fill with solid happiness the present life, and irradiate hereafter with the blessed hope.

The present time is telegraphic. Information flashes from land to land swifter than the light of day; and a friendly talk may be carried on across a gulf of a thousand miles; and, if they choose, all the world may know each morning what every one is doing. How it may be with generations following, we cannot tell; but with ourselves, in whose time the revolution has transpired, the tendency is to make us feverish and fidgetty, fond of change, and bent on the startling and stupendous. No one need complain of the decay of the classical, for if not Attic in our elegance, we are Athenian in our avidity for some new thing—new books, new battles, new games, new colours, new flowers; and rather than not have something new, we welcome any historical paradox, such as a vindication of Nero or our own queen-killing Harry; and apropos of an introduction to gorillas and other new relations, we assist at the apotheosis of Voltaire and Frederick the Great.

It may come right at last, when telegraphing is as common as other forms of talking; but meanwhile, the effect of such rapidity and running to and fro is a prodigious lust of novelty. Rather than have merely the right, the good, the beautiful, people want the wonderful, the terrible, the thrilling; and startling news, “sensation paragraphs,” lead on to sensation fictions—stories in which probability, nature, morality itself, is set aside in favour of the mere galvanic shock; sensation sports, in which the amusement of the spectators is enhanced by the peril of life and limb incurred by the poor performers; sensation music, sensation pictures, sensation sermons—yes, and sensation piety, too, in which a few weeks of excitement compensate for long intervals of collapse and carelessness; and sensation prophecies, in which the coming Armageddon is rehearsed, and spectators are accommodated with a comfortable view for so many shillings a-head; or, to relieve the fears of their fluttered auditors, the consummation of all things is again postponed for a year or two by the self-licensed dealers in the Divine decrees. One result of this mobile tremulously-excitable state of feeling is a rapid alternation between extremes; at one time half the literature and nearly all the taste of England ready to rush Romeward in the van of the Tractarian movement, and anon the same authorities jeering at Tractarianism, as if they had never felt its spell, and giving to Rationalism a still more hearty aid than they lately lent to superstition ; at one time the entire community lashed into such fury by a delineation of the woes of the Virginian negro, as to be ready to go crusading for his release ; and anon so languid in his cause, as to listen to physiologists demonstrating that the normal and necessary position of the black man is subjection to the white. It needs a clear head or a calm spirit to maintain, amidst such fluctuations, a sound and righteous judgment—an attitude firm and fair.

Such vantage it is the prerogative of Christianity to supply. Lifting the believer to a region where the storms of passion and prejudice do not rise, it enables him to look down with composure on the tumults of the people, and in light radiated from that higher region, it enables him in patience to possess his soul, as he anticipates the future. On all whom these lines may reach we would urge, as a great public service, the cultivation of this calm and candid spirit. Try to keep aloof from mere political partisanship, and in those moments of excited feeling and temporary frenzy, when others are swept headlong by the current, do you still keep upon the bank, and try to look at the matter as it is likely to be seen in the light of eventual history. At present the waters roar and are troubled, and as they bound from bank to bræ, and as pines and house-tops come tumbling down the ochre torrent, you might fancy that a new and mighty river was added to the Niles and Nigers of the world. But, after all, it is only a waterspout which has burst among the mountains ; and when you return next week, except the bent and muddy weeds, and here and there along its course a drowned sheep or draggled shrub, there is no memorial of the hurly-burly ; and as you look at the meek little runnel which twists and twinkles far down in the rocky channel, you wonder whence that roaring monster came, and whither all 'tis gone. And so amidst the contests and controversies of the day, remember how casual is their source, how evanescent is their duration. The noise is frightful, but the earth will not be removed, nor will the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea. Where you stand the flood will never rise. God is your refuge. The Rock of Ages does not shake ; and as "from the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High" you look on, you may await the event with calm tranquillity.

The present is a time of high pressure and top speed. There are many men who are mere machines ; their one function is to make money and count it and pass it on or pay it away. They have no time to think, no time to love, no time to pray. Even the Sabbath scarcely brings a pause ; but, like a man who has escaped from a burning house, the smell of fire haunts them on the open slopes and in the pastures green ; like a man who has landed from a stormy voyage, on whatever spot they set their foot, garden-walk or sanctuary floor, it still is lurching in the swell.

And so again it is a time which pre-eminently needs the Gospel, with all the inward calm it diffuses—with all the depth which it adds to the affections and feelings—with the Sabbath which it creates in the sprinkled conscience and pacified spirit—with that Saviour into whose holy, restful society it ushers.

The features we have selected are but a few, and among the more obvious. But, as we have already said, the ingredients in our nationality are at this moment very various ; consequently the complexion, the character, of our time is very composite. Looking at the very lowest class in our society, a philanthropist might grow alarmed for his species—a patriot might stand aghast at his country : "To what are we coming ? Such coarseness, such animalism—minds so contracted, tastes so low, passions so fiendish !" whilst within a stonecast of that sordid vice and seething misery—no ignorant nor unconcerned spectator—may have been led one of those saintly lives which leave the path to heaven more bright, and which make goodness itself more lovely. Then one whose lot has been cast among the usurers and extortioners of the times might be ready to apply to this age all that the prophets have denounced against those who take in pledge the raiment of the needy, and who grind the faces of the poor; forgetful that on the other side the Most High has raised up some who fulfil a glorious stewardship, and who leave each day golden with their gifts, entire communities gladdened by their bounty. One whose lot is cast among hard thinkers is apt to fear that intellectualism is usurping the realm of feeling, both relative and religious; whilst another, weary with mere sentiment and soft emotion, longs for something more robust and manly, more definite and logical. We have all varieties; but still we think it will be conceded that we have what we have already specified—the restlessness, the running to and fro, the love of novelty, united to a swift and contagious susceptibility which into a modern decade condenses changes which would have more than sufficed for a former century—the rapid rate at which existence now burns itself away—the top pressure—the tremendous work which, in a little while, competition will extract from one man, and applause from another, and the golden passion from a third, and dire necessity from yet a fourth.

To a certain extent the Church and the Christian must accept the new conditions of society; for in some respects they are harmless, in some they are real improvements, and to some of them the Church has been much beholden. To modern missions what a mighty help is our speedy transit! If the Roman highways opened the world to the Apostles, the overland route and the ocean steamers make it still more accessible to the living evangelist; and the speedy journey effected, the still swifter tidings keep him constantly in sight—keep the Church and its messengers still close to one another. And although in some directions the tone of thought and feeling is ominous—although the wish for a new Bible or new Gospel is of itself a sufficient sign that the old one is not understood—there is no harm in desiring new illustrations of old truth, or new presentations of the familiar and faithful saying. The bread may be equally wholesome, though there may be a hundred different shapes of the loaf; and for placing it on the table some may prefer the pictured porcelain, and some the basket of silver, and some the wooden trencher of the olden time. And those of us who love the old landmarks best may well be grateful to the modern husbandry. A sermon with 107 divisions, and a fast-day with eight hours of devotional exercises, would be trying to the most devout adherent of the old régime; and for the modern time we claim it as a real improvement that it does not need eight hours to get it into a praying frame, and that it can open up a text without splintering it into a hundred pieces.

But whilst good sense will accept as improvements all that saves strength and time, piety will be jealous of all that weakens faith or lowers the tone of devotion. There is a “course of this world”—a tidal current essentially secular, made up of the notions, and maxims, and passions of worldly men, and into which, if any one fall, he is inevitably drifted away from revealed truth and a living Redeemer. That current runs at present with unusual strength and swiftness, and there are certain institutions of religion against which it impinges with especial force, and does all it can to sap and sweep them away. Against that flood ritualism and High Church assumptions are a mere rampart of sand. Nothing can turn that tide except God’s own Spirit, and nothing is sure to survive its onset except the everlasting verities.

CALVIN AND CALVINISM.

No. I.

ON the 27th May, 1564, died John Calvin. The sun was sinking below the Alpine peaks, its red gleam flashing over the eternal snow, when the immortal spirit which had tabernacled in the frail form of this man of God winged its flight upward to that rest which it had never known below. It may be fancy, yet the mind can hardly help lingering on this going down of the material sun at the moment when Calvin closed his eye on earth. A great light had gone out in the moral as well as the material world—a light not to be rekindled on the morrow. The sun is the great awakener of force. The heaven-sent beam, itself silent, calls into life a thousand loud activities, sending the husbandman to the furrow, filling the city street with noise, and bidding the hammer ring upon the anvil. The great mind—the intellectual, moral, or spiritual sun—stirs into genial activity ten thousand lesser minds, and over nations and hemispheres the energising influence spreads. The great mind is withdrawn, and it is night. Yes: we may have somewhat of that mind embodied in institutions or displayed in books; we may feel its influence for centuries working among us; but the peculiar, nameless, transcendent might of a living great man—a man prepared by God for tasks of greatness—is more than that of books or institutions; and its departure is the sign that one of these days of special and glorious illumination, with which God in His providence sometimes favours His Church, has ended. John Calvin was not inspired; but the gift to the Church of a mind fitted, as that of Calvin was, to apply what inspiration had already given to the benefit of men, cannot be classed among the ordinary bounties of Providence. It is special, exceptional; there is nothing like it; and it is only when we reflect on what was done for the Church, in his half-century of life, by such a man as Calvin, that we get a glimpse of the infinite significance of that prayer which the Saviour instructed His disciples to offer up for "labourers to the harvest." When God's labourers appear, the sheaves are gathered fast.

The recurrence of the tricentenary anniversary of Calvin's death seems to be a fit occasion for taking a brief but leisurely survey of his life and labours. We have come far in those three hundred years. Changes innumerable have taken place in the modes of our thought, in the extent of our knowledge, in the habits of our lives. Yet it is not too much to say that these years only afford the distance requisite to enable us to take the dimensions of Calvin. The mind's eye, like that of the body, is subject to perspective laws; it must be removed to a certain distance from its object; and the greater the object, the greater must be the distance. Every addition of intervening space, while dwarfing the small into invisibility, only affords a wider and better field of vision to contemplate the great. Broad leagues are spread before us; stretches of dusty highway; field, and forest, and ranges of lower hill; but yonder, serene in its elevation, high above all these, towers the solitary mountain. We can now see that the geography of the whole district depends upon it; that it determines the course of the rivers, and regulates the currents of the atmosphere and the direction of the clouds. We can now see that, except Luther, no one of the Reformers even approached in stature to Calvin. Great as the Puritans were, we can now perceive that they were small in comparison with him, less comprehensive in their intellectual sweep, less magnanimous, and calm, and broad, in their Christian sympathies. Looking at many Churches in many lands—in France, in Germany, in England, in Scotland, in Ireland, in America—we can see that, though the name of Calvin may be little heard of within their borders, though they may not have adopted the ecclesiastical forms preferred by Calvin, yet, in proportion to their Christian vitality and Protestant zeal, is the firmness of their adherence to those grand principles of Reformation theology which are laid down in the Institutes of Calvin. Modern history would have been different if this man had not lived; and it is by no means a daring prediction that, when three other centuries have passed away, his influence on the world during their continuance will be found to have been greater even than it has been in those on which we now cast a retrospective glance.

When we mention Calvin, there immediately rises before us the image of that other Reformer, with whom he agreed so profoundly, with whom he differed so conspicuously, Martin Luther. It may frankly be allowed that a thrill of enthusiasm has ever been awakened, and will probably continue to be awakened, at the name of Luther, in Protestant bosoms, more ardent than that suggested by the recollection of Calvin. To use the words of the late Dr. MacCrie, "there is a splendour which surrounds the great German Reformer, partly arising from the intrinsic heroism of his character, and partly reflected from the interesting situation in which his long and doubtful struggle with the Court of Rome placed him in the eyes of Europe," which sets him apart from all others. Nor is it this splendour in itself which so much attracts us towards Luther; it is the veil of tenderness, of soft, brotherly humanity, through which it shines upon us—a veil which dims, yet beautifies, like dew on flowers. What a real, what a genuine greatness was that which could consort with simplicity so child-like, with humility so sincere, with affection so natural and spontaneous, as Luther's! May we not think of him as of a man made to be loved and revered by children and villagers in some German Auburn? His fireside, with his beloved Catherine seated near him, and "bibacious, voracious," ruddy-cheeked youngsters sporting at his knee—his flute-playing, which he was sure that the devil could not tolerate—his joyous outflow of table-talk about the golden corn, and the stars, and the mysterious balancings of the clouds—his fiery indignation against blasphemous trafficking in sacred things—his dauntless valour, confronting men and devils, kings and popes, as it were in the very glare of the flames which had consumed Huss, with his foot on the eternal truth of God—all this is an unwritten poetry, which dwells in the hearts of Protestants, and endears to them the great German father of the Reformation. But it was as a man rather than as a thinker, an organiser, a discernor of the relations by which the parts of great moral and intellectual systems are bound together, that Luther was remarkable. He represents for us that first phase of the Reformation, in which Teutonic simplicity, veracity, love of justice, reverence for God's laws, rose up, in the terrible wrath of patience and gentleness stung beyond endurance, against Latin guile and Romish hypocrisy, against atheism in the scarlet robe and crowned with the tiara, against superstition, brooding like pestilential haze over the minds of the people. He was the burning mountain discharging showers of red-hot missiles on the Papacy, and pouring forth streams of molten metal, very precious, but not yet run into a mould, on the surrounding country. In Calvin the impetuous heat of the first outburst of the Reformation had not indeed cooled, but had become calm in its intensity; he led off into moulds of symmetry and durability the doctrinal truth which poured from the theological crater of the Reformation. He was the natural successor of Luther, giving articulation and distinctness to Luther's more confused utterances, and supplementing the work of the German Reformer. In him we meet not with those home-bred fascinations which charm us in Luther. The smiles of woman, the prattle of children, the voice of music, did not enliven his hearth. We shall prove, indeed, in the sequel, that he was not without tender wellings of affection, that he was a true and sympathising friend, that he was touched by the sorrows of those he loved, and could write away to distant Scotland to comfort Knox for the loss of his wife. But the character of steadfast and rational a ground of confidence as inflexible reliance by faith on the Lord Jesus Christ. Luther and Calvin did not find rest to their souls in seeing visions and dreaming dreams, in fancied apparitions and revelations made in trance. The Lord was their refuge. But his peace, such as it was, was the soul's life of Ignatius Loyola; and in these days, when there is so much of routine and mechanism in the missionary and other operations of Churches, it is well to remember that the tremendous impulse given to Popery in the sixteenth century by Loyola and his followers was due to the terrible earnestness with which, taking their lives in their hands, despising every earthly ambition, toiling, panting, agonising at their work, they addressed themselves to their mighty labour.

It was against this newly-awakened Romanism, against the Jesuits and the Inquisition, against Pontiffs who fared as anchorites, walked barefoot in processions, wore hair shirts, and spent hours in wrestling prayer, that Calvin rose up. His faith more strong, because more calm, than Loyola's, he met the impetuous tide of returning Romanism with the simple proclamation of God's immutable truth. "Thus saith the Lord!" Confronted by the dazzling and paralysing ray of this purer light, the hosts of Jesuitism and of the Inquisition fell back. "Calvinism saved Europe:" the words are not ours, but those of the Westminster Review, the most powerful organ of contemporary scepticism. It saved Europe by the simplicity, the comprehensiveness, the completeness of its truth. It no longer contented itself with mere protesting and destroying; it commenced a work of construction; it reared the Church, broad-based upon the Word of God, and set it in opposition to the Papacy. "The Reformed Church," says a writer on this subject, "became constructive, ceasing to be only a force of destruction. Instead of seeming the rebel child of the Papacy, she beamed forth, serene and terrible, the daughter of God new born. If no powers had been granted her by the decrees of Popes, she claimed a charter direct from Heaven, she pointed to rights sealed to her by the hand of God. If her faith was not based upon the decisions of councils and the opinions of Fathers, it was written for her in the Word of God. Thence she could take her doctrine, her ritual, her discipline, and taking them thence, she could attach to them an authority higher than any authority on earth."

If, apart from its express opposition to Rome, we ask what the Calvinism of the sixteenth century, strictly speaking, was, it might be compendiously answered that it was an inculcation of the duty of absolute, consenting, satisfied submission to the will of God, as revealed in the Bible. Against the will of God there was to be no rebellion; from the Word of God there was to be no appeal. The application and practical result of this grand principle of Calvinism may be intelligently conceived by tracing it into one or two details.

Socially, this principle could not be without effect. It placed the individual soul, so to speak, in the very presence of God. It removed every obstruction which might stand in the way of direct responsibility between the creature and the Creator. By viewing man from a point above the earthly horizon, it conveyed a strangely powerful idea of human equality and brotherhood. Compared with infinitude, the greatest measurable dimension seems levelled with the smallest. The loftiest pinnacle of the Himalayas is not nearer the limit of boundless space than the mole-hill at its base. The highest-mounted human mind is no nearer infinite intelligence than the mind of a child; the height of a throne does not bring its occupant nearer the glory of the Creator than the stone on which the beggar rests his weary limbs. It is undeniable that this Calvinistic habit of contemplating the human soul only in its relation to God had a tendency, wherever it came, to give peoples a sense of their power and dignity, and to shake principalities and principedoms not founded on munication, which Milton calls the "most mild, though withal dreadful and inviolable prerogative of Christ's diadem," was, on scriptural warrant, and for just cause, to be put in force by the Church. It was chiefly in the moral severity and austere discipline of Calvinism that suggestion was found for the epithet, "Puritan."

We intend to follow up the general view presented in the preceding article with a few biographical and critical papers on Calvin and Calvinism.

FAULT-FINDERS AND HERESY-HUNTERS.

IN the Sermon on the Mount we read, "Judge not, that ye be not judged"—a precept the precise force of which must be sought, not in the dictionary, but in the context and the cognate Scriptures. We cannot be so unreasonable as to understand it as prohibiting every exercise of the judicial faculty. That faculty is the most precious power which God has given; and persons as well as general propositions come within the range of its rightful exercise. We are bound to try the spirits, and distinguish the things that differ; and to judge, righteous judgment, to pronounce fairly, considerately, truly, on the complicated questions, and the no less composite individuals who pass daily in review, is the difficult task of every man who seeks to serve his generation, or who has a place to fill in society.

Nor does it settle the point if, instead of "judge," we say, "Condemn not: do not pronounce an adverse decision." For if we are to judge at all, we must sometimes judge unfavourably. We must sometimes come to the conclusion, in our own minds, that the doctrine is unsound, or that the statement is false, or that the man is dishonest, selfish, profligate, cruel. And if the opinion is unfavourable, there are circumstances in which we are bound to express it. Sometimes we are bound to express it to the individual himself. We have to remonstrate with him on his wickedness or folly, or mayhap must rebuke him sharply, in the hope of rousing his conscience and revealing to him, by a sudden flash of reflected light, the concern or horror with which others view him. And this adverse opinion it is sometimes our duty to convey to third parties. If you found your correspondent engaging as confidential clerk a convicted forger—if you found your commander employing as guide a spy whom you knew to be in communication with the enemy—it would be your duty to reveal the truth: it would be a cruel tenderness, a ridiculous and wrong-headed charity, which spared the feelings of the evildoer and sacrificed the life or fortunes of your friend. And there are times when the exposure of religious error is a sacred duty. It is a spurious catholicity which tolerates the wolf if he only put on the sheep's clothing, and far from denouncing as a bigot or an accuser of the brethren, we should thank as a public benefactor the honest and skilful analyser who calls attention to the trash or the poison with which the food of the people is adulterated.

When we read what follows about the mote in the brother's eye, and the beam in the eye of the beholder, we get a better idea of what is intended than any lexicon can convey. It is a warning against a cavilling, censorious, fault-finding spirit; and the Saviour's exhortation is contravened by those who have pleasure in detecting the faults and proclaiming the infirmities of others. It is a warning against a sour and malignant spirit, and is contravened by those who are always on the scent for heresy, and who, to excuse their own bad soldiery, are always hinting about Achans in the camp. It is a warning against that cunning form of self-righteousness which withdraws the man's attention from his own faults, and which tries to take off the attention of other people also, by crying, "Behold, the mote!" which fancies that severity on others is the same as personal soundness in the faith, and which hopes to convince others that itself is "without sin," by being always ready to cast the first stone at offenders.

There is indeed such a thing as heresy, just as in the plant kingdom there is such a thing as mould, and blight, and dry-rot, and all the varieties of fungous vegetation. And just as in a botanical museum they show you either dried specimens or admirable models of every boletus and agaric, of every tiny mucor and every mighty mushroom, so on the pages of Mosheim and Neander you may see, neatly preserved and accurately named, all those curious morbid outgrowths from the Christian faith which we call heresy, beginning with Gnosticism, and coming down to the vagaries of Ludovic Muggleton and Edward Irving. They are a curious collection, and a sad one—sad, when you think that error is so often an important truth exaggerated, or not unfrequently a dogma which was once sound, now that it is dead, decomposed and absorbed into this unsightly transformation. A large collection, but by no means lovely; and we own small sympathy with those whose taste and talent run in this dull direction—who, like the sharp-scented swine employed in some countries to search for subterranean truffles, have noses keen for hidden heresy; who in every new book are sniffing out some departure from the faith; and who seek no greater renown than to add to the Mycologia Biblica some new form of error—defined, described, and classified, with its “habitat” and the name of the first discoverer.

There must needs be heresies, and so far a good service is rendered when they are detected and described; but a better service is rendered by him who, aware of their origin, tries to prevent that death and decay in the midst of which they spring up so plentifully. And it is a striking fact and instructive—it is the mote and the beam all over again—that the worst form of heresy is often found in the heresy-hunter. Of all errors, the worst is an evil life: of all schisms, the sorest is separation from the source of all goodness: of all heresies, the most disastrous is that self-indulgent, sinful life inside of a faultless creed which leads men to dissociate sound words and holy living, and which makes orthodoxy itself appear like an enemy—a traitor—to the Cross of Christ. “Judge not.” Duty must not be evaded. As a witness-bearer, you may be called on to tell the truth; as a juror, you may need to decide on the guilt or innocence, or the amount of blameworthiness in one of your brethren. And when occasion requires, you will not refuse, but will contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. But if yours be the right spirit, you will grieve when such occasions arise. You will be sorry when, even for a moment, moral worth is dissociated from religious soundness; and whilst, as regards the weightier matters, you will love error none the more for coming as an angel of light, you will be thankful to recognise essential and vital unity even where, as regards the minor matters, there is a radical and irreconcilable diversity.

Judge not. Be not a Dominic—a heresy-hunter—ready to brand as false and mischievous the opinions of others, except on ample evidence, and in order to subserve some good and righteous purpose.

And be not a detractor—a calumniator of the absent, a disparager of excellence, a severe and systematic fault-finder.

A friend who long resided in a tropical island once told us that the balance of life had been there curiously upset; there were districts where scarcely a woodland note could be heard, where scarcely a feather could be seen; and the reason was, the rodent quadrupeds had multiplied so fast as at last to gain the upper hand. Devouring the eggs and the nestlings, and sometimes the full-grown trogons and warblers, the rats had got the better of the birds, and had banished both music and bright plumage from that region of the world.

So there is a lively kind of talk and a popular kind of literature which at the present day are working towards a similar result. Criticism we cannot call it, for true criticism is kind as well as honest, and it loves to be generous, although it is often constrained to be severe. But the rodents whom we speak of can do nothing but nibble and gnaw. From your cherished Milton, for the sake of the bookbinder's paste, they bite off the lordly morocco, and from your waxen medallion they eat off the eyes and the nose. Destroying even the relics which you cherished for the sake of some one now departed—marking every object with their teeth, and defiling the residue with their feet—they do their utmost to leave the world without a hero, and the Church without a saint; and it will be no fault of theirs if, despite their efforts to prove mankind a set of mean and miserable mummets, there should remain such a thing as true faith in the sanctuary, true love in the domestic circle.

Akin to this disparaging or destructive literature is a kind of talk which we too often hear: what is called "pulling people to pieces"—most usually absent people—bringing forward their defects, dwelling on their infirmities, and ascribing to inferior motives their creditable actions.

In some respects we believe that there is less social malevolence in the present day than there has been in some former periods of our history. Political rancour has softened down, and the conflicts of scholars are at least in language more courteous than in the days of Von Hutten and Scaliger, and even ecclesiastics do not now knock one another down, as the combatants did in the famous councils of Nicea and Constantinople. And in large cities there may be less tendency to that minute observation of our neighbours which is the fruitful source of gossip and tattle in vicinities thinly peopled. But still we are continually tempted to judge unrighteous judgment, and without habitual vigilance we shall find ourselves condemning the unheard or the absent, and by rash and ungenerous pronouncements on conduct and motive, lessening the world's small stock of worthies, by nibbling the heel or undermining the ground of those who have added too many cubits to their statures.

As a means of repressing this unkind and ungenerous tendency, it is well to remember—"Judge not, that ye be not judged." Even our neighbours will be apt to deal with us as we have dealt with others. But there is something still deeper. The disparager of others is a self-destroyer. God has so arranged it. In trying to lower another's reputation he, perhaps, so far succeeds, but in doing it he degrades himself. The evil-speaker is usually regarded as an evil-doer; and just as the man who cannot love is unlovely, just as the man who is incapable of reverence is himself contemptible, so, meting out to him with his own measure, the usual verdict on the calumniator is that he lacks those virtues which he denies to others. And, in so thinking, people are not far wrong. Whatever may be found in a fossil world, there are no gigantic rodents now-a-days. Lemur, jerboa, mouse, rats of all varieties—with the musk or without it—they run pretty much of a size; all of them small—none of them capable of growing large and lion-like—living in holes, and for the most part working their havoc in the dark—none of them popular, none of them respectable—apt to get into traps, and finding small pity when taken.

So that even before that great day comes when for every idle word men must give an account, falsehood and unfairness are punished. The calumniator blasts his own being. Instead of thinking on the things which are honest, lovely, and of good report, he thinks on the things which are mean, shabby, and disreputable, and, grub-like, grows of the same substance and complexion with the fare he feeds upon.

From this tendency to evil-speaking there are few more effectual preservatives than a mind well furnished. When people who have no rational or elevated pursuit come together, they are very apt to fall into personalities, and personalities which

What is the object of so many outrageous philippics? The Jesuits and their followers are especially desirous of provoking a war between France and Great Britain. They imagine that Napoleon III. might, by entering into an alliance with Austria, Spain, and other Romish States upon the Continent, get a footing upon English territory, and dictate laws in London; and then what a triumph for the Papacy! what a fall for Protestantism!

This is a foolish and hateful dream. Frenchmen who have any good sense, any knowledge of the real state of things, know that a war with England would be the most terrible of calamities for this country. Upon this question, our statesmen, our financiers, our mercantile men, and our liberal politicians are all agreed. They ask, with a decision and an energy not to be mistaken, for the maintenance of peace with England, and it is to be hoped that Napoleon III. will have the prudence to listen to their good advice.

The invectives of the clerical party produce, however, a certain excited state of feeling against Great Britain, and they deserve notice in this point of view. There exists, among the lower and ignorant classes of our people, a sort of jealousy, and even hereditary antipathy, to the British nation. The bigots take care to re-ignite these bad passions. The soldiers and sailors would be rejoiced, in the outset, at least, by an armed struggle against the country they call perfidie Albion.

It is for the reasonable and enlightened men of both nations to do all in their power to maintain peaceful relations with one another. The cordial union of England and France is the palladium of civilization; a rupture between them would be the signal for universal ruin.

HOW THE POPE ACCEPTS THE PLAN OF A GENERAL CONGRESS.

I have already, in this letter, pronounced the word Congress. I return to it, because it is the principal affair of the present moment, and it is especially worthy of note to see the manner in which Pius IX. and his followers have considered and resolved this new problem.

It appears that the proposition of Napoleon III. was received at Rome, in the first instance, with feelings of decided repugnance, the reasons for which were indicated in my previous letter. The partisans of the Papal cause were not ignorant that they would be in a minority in this assembly of crowned heads. Moreover, they were irritated at the prospect of the Congress meeting at Paris, and not at Rome. They saw in this an affront to the city of the Vatican. But the Roman Court, it seems, has since reflected further upon the subject, and Pius IX. has replied definitively by an affirmative response to the letter of Napoleon III. Perhaps the direct refusal of England induced him to express his approval of the project. As he well knew that the Congress had become impossible, there was no danger in performing this act of courtesy to the French Emperor.

Be that as it may, the conditions which would enable the Pope to share in the deliberations of the Congress, as they are put forth by the Ultramontane journals, are characteristic and amusing.

1. Pius IX. would undoubtedly have the presidency of the assembly, because he is the vicar of Jesus Christ, the supreme representative of law, order, and justice! So Queen Victoria, the Czar Alexander II., and King William I., would humbly bow down before the Bishop of Rome, and recognise his divine and human supremacy. This is a little exorbitant, but it is not all.

2. Pius IX. should have a veto upon the deliberations of the Congress: that is to say, that he should be able to reverse the decisions of the minority, when opposed to them! It would be sufficient for him to have one or two votes on his side—that of Queen Isabella of Spain, for instance, who would never fail him—and he might thus control the wishes of all the other princes. This right of veto belonged to the Popes in the middle ages; therefore, in the present day, it must still be regarded as theirs! Is not this argument of the Ultramontane party utterly ridiculous?

3. In the letter which he himself addresses to the Emperor, Pius IX. says that he will assert in the Congress the pre-eminence of the [Roman] Catholic religion, because it is the only true one. Here, again, is a comical idea! The Roman Pontiff, in the face of the Protestant princes of entire Europe, would attack the Reformation as a practical error and an act of rebellion, and would lay claim, on behalf of the communion of which he is the head, to exclusive privileges, even civil and religious! The monarchs of England, Prussia, Sweden, &c., would apparently consent to sanction this humiliating inferiority!

4. Finally, Pius IX. announces that he would demand the restoration of the Romagna and other provinces of the Pontifical States, which are now in the hands of the King of Italy. Picture to yourself what would take place in the assembly in question exception, are compelled by law to send their children to the district school for a certain number of years; and if they fail to fulfil this duty, they are liable to be prosecuted. The fundamental principle of this legislation is that the State, or the public society, has a right to ordain that children should be rendered capable, by the culture of their intellectual faculties, of becoming good citizens. In other words, in the same way as parents are compelled, under the liability of suffering certain legal penalties, to give their children nourishment for the body, they ought also to procure for them food for the mind.

This system certainly gives rise to some serious objections. Even those who have at heart the education of the humbler classes, may perhaps see that in such matters all legal constraint is liable to abuse. But into that question I do not enter. I shall only say that the Romish clergy offer violent opposition to the principle of compulsory education, and accuse the liberals of being tyrants. They claim liberty for heads of families, and pretend to be the best guardians of it.

Upon this point I may make a brief remark. In Spain, quite recently, in Italy and other Romish countries, there prevails compulsory baptism, compulsory communion, the compulsory practice of Popish worship. The judge pronounces penalties upon those who do not obey these laws. Nevertheless, the priests feel no scruples in violating the liberty of the parents. Why, then, do they change their tone when the question has reference to popular education? There are two reasons for this difference. First, they fear that the people would become well instructed; and next, they attribute to the [Romish] Church, as being the infallible interpreter of the will of God, a sovereign authority which they do not accord to the State.

Another fact which has been made quite evident by this controversy is, that the numerical proportion of ecclesiastical schoolmasters punished for crimes and delinquencies is greater than that of lay schoolmasters. The Ultramontanes themselves have been compelled to accept this fact, inasmuch as it is supported by authentic documents. What a strange spectacle! The Brethren of the Christian Doctrine and other teachers in schools belonging to the monastic orders have been the subjects of more judicial sentences than those school teachers who belong to the laity. This proves that compulsory celibacy and the ascetic rules in general of Popery easily lead to the commission of acts of gross immorality. The Jesuitical papers acknowledge that the heads of the monastic orders have to reproach themselves with being too indulgent in the choice of their schoolmasters. But there is here something more to be admitted—namely, that the bad regulations of the Romish Church, instead of making the men better, tend really to render them more depraved.

ABDUCTION OF A YOUNG PROTESTANT GIRL AT LYONS.

It appears that the affair of the infant Mortara finds imitators in this country, and that certain of the clergy regard it as a pious duty to steal away the children of Protestants. But what is authorised at Rome does not enjoy the same immunity among us, and the French Government is not at all disposed to tolerate such proceedings. Here is an event which has lately happened at Lyons.

A young girl, aged thirteen, brought up in the Protestant communion, suddenly disappeared from the paternal residence. What had become of her? The parents were not long left in doubt. They learned that this poor child had come under the circumventing influence and ascendancy of certain bigoted persons, and they immediately concluded that she had yielded to treacherous advice. But in what place was she shut up? The city of Lyons is very extensive; it contains numerous convents; and it was not easy for the parents to discover the new domicile of their lost daughter.

The father informed one of the pastors of his domestic trial, and he suggested that immediate application should be made to the police. To the honour of these public functionaries be it said, that the police agents exerted, on this occasion, much good will and activity. Inquiries were set on foot, and speedily various indications were obtained of the Popish convent in which the fugitive was hidden.

A commissary of police, accompanied by the parents and one of their friends, then entered the suspected house "in the name of the law." They called the Abbé Ch * * *, director of the establishment, and asked him, "Have you not had here, for more than ten days, a young girl, of such an age, and such an appearance, who has quitted the house of her parents?" To this question the abbé replied, that the last young girl admitted into the convent had arrived three or four days ago, and that he really knew nothing about the matter of which they were making inquiry.

A reply so ambiguous as this could not be satisfactory to the commissary of police. He declares that the young girl must be in the establishment, and orders that every person it contains shall be brought before him. The abbé dare not oppose this command of the public officer. The girls present themselves, one after another, before the commissary of police. At last, she whom the father and mother are seeking with so much anguish is found; she was already attired in the conventual dress, after having been re-baptized, according to the Popish ritual. "Why have you kept this child for twelve days without taking any steps to discover her family?" asked the Government functionary. The Abbé Ch * * * did not open his mouth, and the young girl was restored to her parents.

This is not enough. The abbé in question ought to be indicted in a court of justice and severely punished. But the father has a dread of exciting the hatred of the clergy. The priests will only learn by this example that it is their duty to respect the rights of the Protestants.

THE SYNODAL QUESTION IN THE REFORMED CHURCHES.

The synodal question is that which at the present time forms the most serious subject of discussion and agitation among the French Protestants. The Evangelical members of our Churches are urgently calling for the re-establishment of our Presbyterian institutions, and the convocation of a general synod. They see, in that course, the most efficacious means of maintaining and strengthening our religious community, of restoring the great principles of our discipline, of introducing more regular order in the proceedings of the consistories and the pastors, and of preserving that which is essential in the doctrines of the Gospel and in the profession of the faith of our fathers. But those who pretend to be the true friends of liberty, the advocates of rationalist or negative opinions, display more and more openly their opposition to this restoration of the synodal system. Why? Because they claim a right to enjoy absolute independence as to what they believe and teach. It is to be hoped that this resistance will be overcome. Already forty-five consistories have requested of the civil power the early convocation of a synod, and others will follow their example.

MR. RICHARD WEAVER IN PARIS.

I must not conclude my letter without saying a word upon the impressions produced in Paris by the presence and preaching of Mr Richard Weaver, the English operative. The effect has been excellent, even upon French auditors, accustomed to a more elegant style of oratory. This popular preacher exhibits a depth of feeling, a tone of conviction, and an abundance of picturesque imagery, by which persons of high station, also, have been moved and edified; and his visit to Paris will leave behind it most hallowed recollections.

Florence, December 14, 1863.

ITALY STRUGGLING IN THE LIGHT.

A monthly volume would now, thank God, be more possible than a monthly letter, so abundant are the interesting notices of evangelistic work which reach us from every quarter. It is difficult to know where to begin, or how to compress our materials into small space, so as to convey a just idea of the marvellous work of God presently going forward in Italy. My duty is to lay before your readers facts, obtained from original sources, so as to avoid deception or exaggeration. Would that Christians everywhere would lay to heart their solemn responsibility in connection with this opening for spreading the Gospel in the lands of the Pope. No mission field has yielded such fruit in so short a time. Nowhere has money been laid out to better purpose, or faithful toil been so richly rewarded. Oh that Great Britain would seize this opportunity, and that all her Christian men and women, and all her Evangelical societies and Churches, each in their own way, would show a noble and immediate generosity! Italy, from one end to the other, is not only open to the Gospel, but is craving the truth at our hands. There should be no stint or parsimony at such a crisis. Here is a country, barred so long against the entrance of the Bible, now presenting its fields white unto harvest. To put it in a few words, there is no parallel to be found for the present shaking of opinions going on all around us except in the ferment of mind which preceded and accompanied our own Reformation. England has done much for Italy, but nothing to what she is capable of doing, nothing to what is required at her hands in this national Italian struggle between darkness and light.

EVANGELIZATION IN MILAN.

Let us start our survey with Lombardy, where the greatest excitement on religious questions prevails, and where it is by many expected that the earliest and most decisive action will be taken, should God in His gracious Providence give success to the Reformation spirit as it now takes root and extends in Italy.

In the town of Milan alone there are already 1,000 Church members, men and women, whose names are on the registers of the various congregations, and partake of the ordinance of the Supper. About 700 belong to the Free Church, and 300 to the Waldensian and Wesleyan missions. This is but a small portion, of course, of those who hear the Gospel preached, or are perusing the Scriptures in private. Even of this number it would be wrong to suppose that all of them were genuine converts, although the most noticeable characteristic of the revival is the love of the Word of God. Generally speaking, all the artisans and townspeople connected with the different centres of evangelization carry the Testament about with them in their pockets, and occupy their spare hours and leisure moments in reading it. The form of their meetings also exemplifies this trait, for except at the meeting for public worship, the audience reads verse about, the minister making remarks as they proceed, and the people asking questions. These meetings for edification are held every evening, so that many of these Christians have acquired a very creditable power of quoting Scripture, especially on controversial subjects.

The utmost liberty of conscience is enjoyed by these northern Evangelicals. Only in one case, and that recently, has a disturbance occurred. An evangelist opened a place of meeting specially for the spiritual good of soldiers, to whom he might be seen speaking during the day in the street and in the Piazza, inciting them secretly to attend his service. This excited the suspicion of some officers of the regiment, who placed two sentinels at the door of the locale, arrested the evangelist, without reason given, and kept him for two hours in the guard-house. I am happy to say the Questor at once liberated the man, when the report of the proceeding reached him, and that the Milanese journals advocated the evangelist's cause, and one and all of them took the officers severely to task for entering a private house and seizing a free citizen, without the intervention of the civil authorities.

DON AMBROGIO: HIS IMPRISONMENT AND HIS POPULARITY.

The eccentric but earnest priest Don Ambrogio, of whose troubles in Turin I wrote last month, has been creating a sensation in Milan for some weeks, and is now crusading in Alessandria. From the steps of the cathedral, and other places of public resort, for days together, this extraordinary man has been haranguing crowds of 2,000 people, until an unfortunate allusion of a political nature to some cannon booming outside the town led to his being thrust for three days into a dungeon's cell, and thereafter for seven days in the better quarters of a common prison, whereupon he was liberated, there being no charge against him. His constant appeal to the powers that be is, "Either make a law which will touch me, or let me alone;" and he is right, and has the populace at his back. I should not have mentioned the strange career of this man, were it not that we are aware of deep and lasting impressions being lodged by his fiery declamations in the minds of hearers, who had before been merely nominal Christians. The fervour with which he urges the reading of the Scriptures, and the power with which he lays bare the errors of the Romish system, enlist the loudest demonstrations of sympathy. Prejudice is disarmed by his wearing the priestly robe, while the disinterestedness and fearlessness of his behaviour (so uncommon in Italy) have gained him immense popularity. A dozen such men, bearing about with them the marks of the prisoner, defying imprisonment and opposition of every kind, and exercising in the open air a roaming evangelization, would soon stir the ignorant masses from their lethargy.

EDUCATION IN MILAN.

The educational movement in Milan makes vast progress. The Evangelicals are rather behind in this department, having only three free schools, with 150 children in attendance; an evening school, with fifty adults; and the female boarding school for the middle and upper classes, for the purpose of training suitable teachers, established by the Wesleyans. Of this last I ought to say, in passing, that it affords an excellent opportunity to parents who wish a Continental education for their children, the religious instruction being carefully attended to, and the fees only 24*l.* per annum.

But I refer to the ordinary schools of the town and neighbourhood. Once a week there is a meeting of about 100 professors service, and rung the church bells long and violently, but not a man in the crowd moved from his place, and the church was afterwards ascertained to have been empty. The soldiers stationed there formed guard to protect the preacher, and many hands sought a shake of his, and with tearful eyes expressed their gratitude, when the service was over.

At Cremona the same popularity attends the herald of the cross. An immense hall, capable of holding 1,000 persons, was literally packed to the door at the second preaching. An onlooker was very much impressed with the perfect order maintained by the crowd, who behaved as if they felt it was the worship of God in which they were engaged. More than seventy persons came forward who were desirous of regular religious instruction.

In Ferrara again, the city of the Duchess Renée and John Calvin, where I was gratified to be able to notify last year the presence of some ten or twelve Evangelicals, there is now a regular audience of 300, waiting on the ministry of an evangelist of the Free Italian Church.

COMO : A REMARKABLE INCIDENT.

At Como, the young Waldensian evangelist has the place of meeting, holding 120, crowded to the door, and many anxious listeners outside who cannot gain admittance. At least the one-half of these are young men about eighteen or twenty years of age. At first, not a woman made her appearance. The females, indeed, were so violently opposed to the cause, that as a last resource they presented themselves, to the number of 500, at the door of the chief magistrate, to demand the instant banishment from the town of the Gospel party. Fortunately, the head of the municipality was absent at the time this formidable deputation waited upon him, so that the employés tried to reason their besiegers into a better state of mind, by showing that their request was contrary to the law. This rebuff gave rise to a circumstance well-nigh unique in the history of missions, for these women, seeing the fruitlessness of their effort, communed among themselves, and resolved on hearing with their own ears what really was being spoken to their husbands and sons, if the evangelist would consent to address a meeting almost entirely composed of females. Most gladly did he acquiesce in the request; and not a few of his hearers, when the Saviour was set forth in all His willingness and ability to save sinners, apart from the inventions of man or the rites of the Church, were pricked in their hearts, and mourned over their blindness, and besought with tears that they should be further instructed in the faith of the only Redeemer.

These are but a few instances out of many which might be cited to prove that a spirit of earnest inquiry is abroad in Lombardy. There is no hindrance to the work of evangelization, and the benediction of heaven seems to rest on the movement. The great lamentation is, that there are so few labourers to enter into the vineyard. May God speedily increase their number, for the people are as sheep without a shepherd.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY — ALLEGED IMPORTANT PROJECT BY GARIBALDI.

The sympathy of the masses is rapidly veering round in favour of religious liberty. Only the other day, at Treviglio, a priest, a Government official, and a number of boys, got up a huge bonfire of Diodati Bibles in the public square of the town. The people were enraged, and the newspaper of the place, though edited by a priest, spoke out in earnest condemnation of the iniquitous deed. Thereupon, the Bishop sent an eloquent preacher to defend from the pulpit this wanton act, and to violently attack the newspaper. The storm was only allayed by reference to the Government in Turin, who at once dismissed the official, and had the stranger preacher withdrawn. It is scarcely to be wondered at that the priestly editor of the newspaper has unfrocked himself of his own accord, and purposes to wait the advent of better times to his unhappy country.

As another illustration of what I mentioned last month, the increased liberty granted even in Venetia, still under Austrian rule, I may say that, upon the representation of the Swiss Protestant pastors of Venice and Trieste, the Government at once sequestered the whole edition of a violent book which had been printed against Protestantism. I am given to understand, on good authority, that the Italian Government, so tormented by the perversity of the Pope, looks with a very kindly eye on the whole Evangelical movement, wishes it still greater success, and will put no obstacles in the way of its progress. A still more startling rumour is afloat, which has been communicated by those who are in the confidence of the great Italian patriot, to the effect that Garibaldi is prepared to act in the spring, if not in a military, then in a religious movement. Should there be no effort to liberate either Rome or Venice, we are assured that the hero of Caprera purposes to visit all the townships of Italy, with-powerfully aided in the founding of schools and asylums for the children of both sexes of the poor fishermen on the Mergellina, who crowd to these institutions, where they obtain food and Christian training.

"Don't suppose the Roman clique stand by with folded arms. On the contrary, they are raising a diabolic noise. To hear them, you would suppose the world was at an end, and the day of universal judgment at hand, and all of us the prey of Satan, unless the heretics are violently rooted out, even to the seventh generation. Fools that they are! As if the prison and the stake were not things long gone by, and gone for ever.

"The other party that is making way, and opening a terrible breach in the citadel of Rome, is under the leadership of Signor Albarella d'Afflitto, who not only teaches the poor artisans to read and write, but holds conferences on religious subjects. I can assure you that his preachings are creating a great stir, and that the proselyting work is advancing with a steady, accelerated motion, as philosophers would say."

INCREASE OF ANTI-PAPAL FEELING—PROJECTED LEGISLATION.

The Liberal and anti-Papal feeling is waxing stronger every day in Italy. A few more municipalities have withheld the customary money to the priest-preachers of their district, because they will not pray for the King and young Italy. The Government Delegate of Arezzo has prohibited a baker there from any longer putting the likeness of Pio Nono on his panforte, a Christmas cake in great repute in Tuscany. A man in Leghorn, who lately wrote a very sanguinary acrostic on the name Valdesi, and entitled it "Death to the Waldenses," to which a very pretty acrostic reply was published, breathing the forgiving love of the Gospel, has been brought to trial for his illiberal writing, and he is so certain of getting at least six months' imprisonment, and thus losing his situation in the dockyard, that he has been running about among the Evangelicals, and pleading with Mr. Ribet and his parishioners to appeal to the King to pardon him, when the sentence of the Court has been pronounced. A lay Jesuit, Signor Lotti, has been unearthed in Florence and dismissed. He held a high place in the Royal house, being Great-Almoner of the King in Tuscany. In an evil hour he replied to some able articles against the Jesuits in our leading newspaper, and frankly admitted that he rejoiced in being a member of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. The excitement and indignation of the public, when the disclosure was made, knew no bounds. The municipality of Naples have taken occasion of an insult offered to a shrine in the Toledo, the leading thoroughfare, to order that all images and tabernacoli (small open chapels) should be immediately removed from the streets of the town, and placed in the various churches, where they will be better looked after. Only those who have been in Rome and Naples, and have seen the multitudes of crosses, statues of saints, Madonnas, and shrines, in the open streets, can appreciate the sweeping nature of this change for the better.

The bill is now before Parliament for the legalisation of civil marriages, and is expected soon to become law, being introduced by the "Keeper of the Great Seal," and supported by the Government and its large and liberal majority in the House. This will be an immense gain to the country, and greatly weaken the influence of Rome, which has wielded this spiritual weapon unscrupulously for its own advantage. In the case of Englishwomen married to Italians, it has often been exceedingly painful to see that, however liberal the husband might be, no dispensation could be obtained, and that not until the fearful oath of abjuration of Protestantism had been taken, could the marriage be legally celebrated by the humblest priest. Oddly enough, some slight relief has been, for three years past, obtained at Perugia, the Green of Italy. The Marquis Pepoli, the first governor in the King's name of this portion of the old States of the Church, acting on his own authority, sent out a decree legalising civil marriages. The decree has not been withdrawn by his successor nor revoked by Parliament, so that not a few runaway couples have resorted to Perugia.

NEAPOLITAN EDUCATION.

Dislike to the priests has happily driven both the authorities and people in the direction of improved education, with regard to which another statistic will be welcome. In 1861 there were in the Neapolitan provinces 1,746 boys' schools, 835 girls' schools, with 1,735 masters and 835 mistresses, and 34,198 boys and 29,160 girls in attendance. Now there are 2,367 boys' schools, 1,364 girls' schools, with 2,488 masters and 1,479 mistresses, and 77,864 boys and 52,153 girls in attendance. In the same period the evening schools have increased from 48, with 1,002 scholars, to 677, with 14,341 scholars, and the 5 infantine asylums of two years ago, and 3,000 bishops. More than 80 emperors, empresses, kings, and queens have joined this body, which has also the honour of having given 3,000 saints to the Romish calendar, of whom 1,700 were martyrs.

Again, the building of St. Peter's, at Rome, cost 8 millions sterling. $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions more were laid out on ornaments and works of art, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ millions on the maintenance of architects, &c. The colonnade was finished at an outlay of 200,000*l.*, and on the sacristy of the church were spent 330,000*l.*

Frankfort, December 16, 1863.

THE DUCHIES OF SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN AND GERMANY.

The question which at this moment occupies and excites the public mind throughout Germany is that of the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein. This eternal quarrel between the Danish Government and the German Diet has become suddenly complicated, as you are aware, by a question of succession, consequent upon the death of the King of Denmark. The serious feature in the case is, that, on both sides, the people exert a strong and vehement pressure upon their respective Governments. In Germany, the nation en masse and several of the Chambers of Deputies (that of Prussia, among others) are no longer content with seeing the old question decided in such a way as should secure the freedom of the Duchies, but energetically demand the recognition of the Duke of Augustenburg; and, to attain that end, the occupation of the Duchies by force of arms. The Diet, for its part, having ordered a simple occupation, which should in no way prejudice the question as to the right of succession, great excitement has been exhibited throughout the country. In most of the towns it has been resolved, in popular assemblies, to open subscription-lists, and to raise volunteer corps, for the purpose of urging forward the Governments, and inducing them to proclaim the Augustenburg sovereignty. It is in these circumstances that the troops for effecting federal execution have quitted Hanover and Saxony, amid the enthusiastic hurrahs of immense crowds, having behind them a powerful reserve, furnished by the armies of Prussia and Austria. The latest intelligence still left room for hope that the Danish Government would offer no resistance to the invasion of Holstein, and that thus, for the moment, war might be avoided. When these lines shall have reached your readers' hands, this grave question will doubtless have taken a decisive form.

In countries where the Church is closely united to the State, every political movement of this kind inevitably reacts upon religious questions. Thus, in the Duchies, the ministers of religion, being regarded as State functionaries, have been called upon to take the oath to the new King of Denmark. Their position has become an intensely painful one. In Holstein, most of them have refused the oath, an example of that course having been set by the magistrates of the country. In Schleswig, a good number of pastors have followed the same line of conduct, and made known their reasons for so doing through the press. You can understand what immense moral influence these facts must exert in the Duchies, whose relations with Denmark are thereby altered beyond all remedy.

ECCLESIASTICAL AGITATION IN HANOVER.

Though these events chiefly engage public attention, especially in the north of Germany, they do not prevent the ecclesiastical question raised in Hanover from producing excitement and agitation. I referred, in my last letter, to the composition of the Constituent Synod, which has been in session since October 5. Elected in part by the clergy, in the spirit of the most rigid orthodoxy; in part by the parishes, in the interest of rationalist liberalism; and in part by the Government, with the desire of reconciling the two extremes by means of moderate men—this synod could not fail to issue in irritating discussions and patched-up resolutions, with which everybody would be dissatisfied, and which would but increase party strife. Such is what has actually taken place. Three resolutions of the synod have particularly contributed to this result. The first is that which grants the right of voting in elections for the parish councils and the synod to those only who are in the habit of attending public worship and partaking of the Lord's Supper, while the Liberal party will hear of no such distinction. The second is that by virtue of which the existing parish councils remain in office, under the new constitution, until the expiration of their term of service. The third, doubtless the most serious of all, is that which, as under the old system, denies to the parishes the power of electing their pastors until it shall be determined otherwise by a general synod, shortly to be convened. Scarcely had these decisions become known, when a warm agitation arose throughout the country; and numerous public meetings took place at Hildesheim, Göttingen, Celle, Harburg, and other towns, where the most energetic resolutions were adopted. These demand that the general synod, the provincial synod, and the parish councils, should be elected by the direct vote of all the Protestant citizens, and so as to secure, in all these bodies, a majority of lay members; that legislation for the Church should be confided, exclusively, to the general synod; that all the consistories should be abolished, and replaced by an ecclesiastical council (Oberkirchenrath) nominated in part by the Royal Government and in part by the general synod; that the pastors should be elected freely by the parishes; that the new constitution should be immediately put in force by the election of the new parish councils; that there should prevail in the Church unrestricted liberty of conscience, and that hence all engagements relating to confessions of faith should be abolished. It was also resolved, by the public meetings, that if these articles were not accepted by the Constituent Synod, the people should be urged totally to reject the new constitution.

It cannot be doubted that the existing synod, and certainly the Government, will not yield to these demands. What, then, will be done by the people, in the state of excitement into which they have been thrown by these angry debates? Even the public peace may be endangered. And if, on the other hand, this agitation should achieve a triumph, what would the orthodox party in the Church do? Such is the dilemma. It is incomprehensible how it happens that, in view of such insurmountable difficulties, it should not enter the mind of any party that the only true and peaceful solution would be the proclamation of complete ecclesiastical liberty, breaking the bonds which render the Church the slave of the State, and which connect by force opposing elements, incapable of living together without mutual oppression. Such is the absurd principle of that ecclesiastical Nationalism which prevails throughout Germany, and which no party has hitherto had the idea of giving up!

I shall continue to keep your readers acquainted with these important discussions, which may lead to still more serious consequences. Though they display somewhat melancholy features, and are, to a certain extent, the result of a deplorable religious condition, they are better than indifference and death. Under the supreme guidance of the Divine Head of the Church, they may serve to bring about a better state of things in the future.

DISSENSIONS IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The Protestant Church of Germany is not alone in suffering from strife and agitation. Catholicism, in spite of its imposing unity, more apparent than real, is also undergoing internal commotions not less grave. One deep-seated malady, especially, it bears in its bosom, which, sooner or later, must lead, by successive outbursts, to the dissolution of that great body. I refer to the melancholy bondage in which the inferior clergy groan, under the despotism of their bishops. It frequently happens that the cry of one or other of these oppressed men reaches the public ear. But very few have the courage necessary to break the bonds of their slavery. Some, however, do possess sufficient energy, of which I have recently given you a few instances. Here is a new case, which will doubtless add to the weight of testimony already adduced, touching this radical evil of Catholicism: A priest residing at Mentz, where the celebrated Baron von Kettler makes his Ultramontane and episcopal cross to be so heavily felt, after having undergone from his superiors much ill-treatment, yielded to the temptation to have recourse to the Press, and wrote under an anonymous signature, in order to take revenge of his oppressors. He alleged certain facts not very creditable to the persons of whom he complained, and they proceeded to institute proceedings for libel in a court of law. After some fruitless attempts at reconciliation with his bishop, the priest, deeming his position in the Church for ever untenable, quitted the parish and his church, and took refuge at Frankfort, where he has just published a complete account of his differences with his superiors. On this occasion he signs his name in full; it is Michael Biron. Doctrine does not appear to have gone for anything in the motives of his secession. Accordingly, he has not joined the Protestant Church, but has preferred, it would seem, the body called German Catholics. He deems himself happy, however, in having escaped from his slavery, and the first use which he makes of his freedom is, to address to his old companions in misfortune an energetic appeal to follow his example in coming out of Babylon. "How long," he asks them, "will the inferior clergy of Germany bend their backs beneath the heartless rule of Jesuitism? How long will the sons of the German people allow themselves to be employed as the silent mercenaries of an Ultramontane power? How long will the priests of the humbler classes be condemned to this disgraceful slavery, and be content, when two or three of them meet, to abuse, in a subdued tone, the bishops and their favourites, lest they should be heard and betrayed? Arise, then, and show that you have outgrown your years of childhood, and that you are no longer to be made to tremble at the rod." We wish that the priest Biron had shown less bitterness to his adversaries, in his recent publication, and a more Christian temper; but it is impossible not to compassionate the sad situation from which he has succeeded in extricating himself, and in which hundreds like him still groan.

Dissensions still wider and more important prevail, in the Roman Catholic Church of Germany, between a learned and liberal tendency, which struggles for freedom of science and the rights of philosophy, on the one hand, and that furious Ultramontane party, which aims to stifle all thought under the crushing weight of authority, on the other. I spoke to you recently respecting one of the most distinguished representatives of the first party—Professor Frohschammer, of Munich. In the month of September last there was held, in that city, a numerous assembly of Roman Catholic theologians, in which the two parties confronted each other, and in which the conflict of the two tendencies gave rise to the most stormy discussions. The Ultramontanes, though beaten at first upon the most important points in debate, ended by gaining a complete victory, owing to the apprehension with which they were able to inspire their adversaries of the thunders of Rome. Perhaps I may hereafter revert to this assembly, and to the great subjects which it discussed.

VISIT TO KUZZELBASH KOORDS.*

Mr. Barnum, the missionary at Kharpoot, has recently visited Ali Gako and the Koords in the vicinity of Chemishgezek. In his letter he gives his impressions of the people, and the prospect of accomplishing good by missionary effort among them. The native preacher, Hadji Hagop, accompanied him. The first night they passed at Ashvan, an Armenian village, where nearly the whole population were out harvesting; but the few they met were friendly, which was not the case a few years since at the same place. The next day they crossed the Euphrates and reached Chemishgezek, or City of Gardens, and found a perceptible change since they had last visited them. It had been considered one of the hardest places in Turkey to obtain a foothold, but now they found a number of men calling themselves brethren. Next day they breakfasted with a Koord, who called himself a Christian, and who conducted them to the tents of Ali Gako, the chief. On his arrival there Mr. Barnum writes:—

"I was much disappointed at not finding Ali Gako at home. We were, however, cordially welcomed by his family, and as it was Saturday, we could do no better than spend the Sabbath there. It did not seem much like the Sabbath. Some light has entered this Koordish clan, but not sufficient to secure the observance of the Lord's-day, especially at a busy season of the year like the present. Whether from our presence, I cannot say, but there was less than the ordinary amount of work going on that day. Ali Gako's wife is a very worldly-minded woman. They have eleven children, and the father greatly desires to educate them. One reads tolerably well, and some of the others a little. I saw no other Koords who could read. The priesthood among the Kuzzelbashes is a distinct line of succession, like the Levitical office of old, and these religious teachers are held in great esteem; and yet the old priest we saw was one of the most ignorant men we met among the Koords. Not one in a hundred of these priests know how to read.

"Regarding the prospects of evangelization among this people, my own mind is hardly made up. Of one thing I feel fully persuaded, that in Ali Gako's clan the Gospel has already accomplished much towards reformation. The testimony of every man with whom I conversed was substantially as follows: 'We used to kill and steal, and do just as we liked, before our Agha received the Gospel, five or six years ago. Since that time he opposes our doing anything bad. He tells us we must not steal, but try to live at peace with each other, and do to others as we wish rate her failings and to exult over her sorrows. It is with a deep and solemn conviction that I have a duty to perform, however painful it may be—a duty to the Divine Head of the Church—a duty to the Church of England, a duty to the Church of Westminster, in which I have been permitted to minister for nineteen years, and a duty even to him who is now designated to the highest office in that Church, that I write these words. The Church of Westminster is losing the presence and counsel of one who has ruled it with wisdom, piety, and love for seven years. And now as canon in residence, I find myself charged with the principal duty of officiating in the sacred services of this Church till the end of the present year. It seems, therefore, that, if there is a call upon any one to speak in this matter, that person is myself. I am not also without some hope that, by the blessing of God upon what is said, some offences may be removed which otherwise might be fatal to many; some explanations may be given which may calm troubled consciences, and some preparations may be made for the better maintenance of the truth, and also for the preservation of peace in this venerable institution within whose walls I now write. In reply to what I have said concerning the distress caused to many devout minds by certain passages in Dr. Stanley's published writings, it may perhaps be objected that I am only echoing the vague rumours and ill-defined charges of certain religious partisans. It is therefore my duty to avow that I share those feelings which I have ascribed to others. The examination of some of Dr. Stanley's works, especially of his recently published lectures on the "History of the Jewish Church," constrains me to declare my opinion that they contain many passages which may tend to weaken the belief of their readers in the truth and inspiration of the Bible, especially of the Old Testament. In those lectures, which were addressed chiefly to candidates for holy orders, he asserts that "the history of Israel is not the history of an inspired book, but of an inspired people." Surely such an allegation is injurious to the Bible, as implying that it is less inspired than a nation which God punished as rebellious, and excluded from Canaan for its sins. It is also irreconcilable with the declaration of St. Paul, speaking specially of the Old Testament, "All Scriptures"—or, as it literally signifies—"Every Scripture is given by inspiration of God;" and with the language of our own Church in the collect of this season (Advent), ascribing all Scripture to God—"Blessed Lord, who has caused all Holy Scriptures to be written for our learning." It is said by Dr. Stanley that the acceptance of every part of the Old Testament (by which I mean the genuine text of the Old Testament) as of equal accuracy is rendered impossible by every advance made in Biblical science, and by every increase of our acquaintance with Eastern customs and primeval history. And thus a vague and uneasy suspicion is created in the mind, that when science makes further progress, and historical investigation is pursued more successfully, the Bible must recede from the position it now occupies, and abate its claims to our belief. On the other hand, it is certain that all truth is consistent with itself, and the Christian student rejoices to know that genuine philosophy and antiquarian research—as for instance into the manners and customs of Egypt, and on the soil of Babylon and Nineveh—have brought to life new proofs of the accuracy and credibility of the Bible. In another place Dr. Stanley apologises for Deborah the prophetess, as "enlightened only with a very small portion of that Divine light which was to go on even more brightening to the perfect day." And thus a shadow of a doubt is thrown upon the inspiration of the still earlier prophecies, as for instance those of Jacob and of Noah, and on the earliest prophecy of Scripture, that concerning the Promised Seed. Dr. Stanley apologises also for the Old Testament, and tells us that we ought to extend the same charitable indulgence to it as "to other histories, especially Oriental histories," and that "the very errors and defects" of the Bible "are guides to the true apprehension of its meaning." In the same place he suggests that there are errors "in St. Stephen's speech in the Acts" (Acts vii.), a statement which I challenge him to prove. He asserts in the same work that the Books of Moses are probably so called "because he is the chief subject of them," not because he was their author, as the ancient people of God believed, with whom Christ himself communicated, and as the ancient Christian Church believed, being taught by Him and by the Holy Spirit, whom He sent to guide His Apostles unto all truth. I find also that, partly on the ground of a mistaken interpretation of the Hebrew text (2 Samuel, xxiv. 1, as compared with 1 Chronicles xxi. 1), an error committed by Tindal, and long ago exposed and refuted by Waterland. Dr. Stanley ventures to surmise that Abraham, the friend of God, the father of the faithful, was tempted by Satan to offer up his son Isaac. Thus, he sets himself up in opposition to the text of the Old Testament, which declares that "God tempted Abraham," and to the express testimony of the Holy Spirit in the New Testament—"By faith, Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac." But it is no part of my present purpose to point out what seems erroneous in Dr. Stanley's writings. I would rather draw a veil over it. The question is, whether a person who has caused much grief and trouble of conscience to many faithful members of the Church ought to be admitted to one of the highest places of trust and dignity in it? Ought he to be installed in the seat once filled by Bishop Andrews? It may, perhaps, be replied that the function of the Canons of Westminster, who admit Dr. Stanley to that office, is merely ministerial, and that the responsibility of admitting him rests entirely with those who advise his appointment to it. I, for one, cannot accept that apology. I cannot divest myself of my own responsibility in this solemn matter. Petition is the right of Englishmen, and it seems to me that we owe to those who recommend such appointments as these the language of respectful remonstrance and earnest expostulation. A condemnation is pronounced in Scripture upon those "who have men's persons in admiration because of advantage." "Accept no man's person against thy soul, and let not the reverence of any man cause thee to fall." Woes are uttered against those coward prophets of old who dared not stand in the gap, and against those traitorous watchmen who were "dumb dogs," and against those recreant priests who "prophesied smooth things," and said, "Peace, peace, when there was no peace." We owe to our rulers the word of warning and admonition, that whosoever "offends one of Christ's little ones, it were better for him that a millstone shall appear he may receive "a crown of glory that fadeth not away."

THE NEW REGIUS PROFESSOR AT OXFORD.

A struggle is understood to have taken place for the appointment to the Regius Professorship of Ecclesiastical History. Determined efforts, it is said, were made to secure the nomination of a gentleman holding similar views to those of Dr. Stanley, whose preference occasioned the vacancy; and it would seem that the new Dean himself was not inactive in the matter. Happily, however, other influences, yet more powerful, prevailed, and this important post is now filled by the Rev. W. Shirley, whose reputation, both for orthodoxy and sound scholarship, is unquestioned.

THE DEANERY OF LINCOLN.

The death of the Rev. Dr. Garnier has caused a vacancy in the Deanery of Lincoln; and the dignity has been offered to and accepted by the Rev. Dr. Jeune, Master of Pembroke, and recently Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford. The nomination is universally admitted to reflect credit on the Prime Minister, within whose gift it is. Dr. Jeune was formerly Rector of St. Heliers and Dean of Jersey, of which island he is a native. In 1843 he was elected master of his college, having formerly been tutor at Pembroke from 1830 to 1834, and during the last of these years he was chosen to be public examiner for the University. In 1850 he was appointed, along with the present Bishop of London, Bishop Hinds, late of Norwich, Dean Johnson, Dean Liddell, and others, to be one of the Commissioners of Inquiry into the University of Oxford. From 1859 to the close of last year he filled the office of Vice-Chancellor of the University, and it was admitted by all that his amenity and liberality were no less remarkable than his tact and his judgment.

It will thus be seen that the new Dean has been for the greater part of his career a University man; and his influence there has been steadily and decidedly directed in favour of Evangelical truth. The Rationalist party, which has of late grown to such a portentous height, had no more vigorous opponent than Dr. Jeune; while his power was all the greater from its never being sullied by being mixed up with personality or bitter feeling. This was especially shown in his administration of the office of Vice-Chancellor, the duties of which were discharged with an impartiality so clear, and an absence of all petty personalities so distinctly marked, that it was impossible for any one to say to which of the many parties that distract this ancient seat of learning the Vice-Chancellor leaned. But though holding so even, and, as it might seem, so indifferent a balance while in his office as judge or arbitrator, there was no mistake as to the doctrines of the preacher or the convictions of the man. His sermon on the vicarious nature of the atonement, which has been lately published, is one of the ablest and the soundest treatises on that cornerstone of the Christian faith that has ever been given to the world; and we are sure it will be felt as matter of congratulation, and as of good augury for the best interests of the Church and the nation, that the author of such a discourse is advanced to a place of dignity in the Church of England.

PUSEYITE DOINGS OF THE CHURCH UNION.

All the world knows that the Church Union is an institution expressly intended to diffuse and maintain Tractarian views within the Church of England, and to enforce the observance of those practices which would more nearly assimilate her with the Church of Rome. A branch of this Union, it appears, has lately been formed in Cambridge; and after working for some time in secret, they recently felt themselves strong enough to attempt a public demonstration; and the feast day of St. Andrew, the 30th of November last, was chosen for the occasion. The Rev. Mr. Ward, of St. Clement's, lent his church for the service; priests, gossellers, acolytes, choristers, &c., were present in great profusion; and in their solemn processions through the church, robed in their white surplices, it cannot be denied that they made a great impression on the spectators, though it appears these were not all of the most solemn kind. The sermons that were preached were of a piece with those Puseyite preliminaries. We need not believe, indeed, what was said, that one of the preachers insisted that more honour was due to the saints than to the blessed Saviour himself; even a Papist would not go so far as that theory, however true it may be that the multiplicity of the saints, and the reverence exacted for each of them, tends, in practice, to thrust the Saviour out of view; but it is plain, from the admissions of themselves and their friends, that the whole proceedings—apart from the prayers and the lessons of the Church—were of a semi-Pagan semi-Romanist tendency. We trust the attention of the Bishop of Ely will be directed to these grotesque caricatures of Christianity that have taken place in his diocese.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

GREECE.

The "Holy Synod of the Church of Greece" has again anathematised Dr. King, the American missionary—the sentence including also, on this occasion, a little book which he wrote a few months since, and printed in modern Greek, against the worship of the Virgin and other errors. This has caused a good deal of excitement. The anathema, as might have been expected, has increased the sale of the book, and Dr. King's congregation is also larger. He writes :—

I am now fighting what I consider as my last missionary battle. The enemies, so far as I can judge, are by no means so numerous and powerful as they were eighteen years ago, and their rage does not seem to me to be so great. Still they are numerous enough to cause much trouble.

SYRIA.

The ingathering of the firstfruits of the United Presbyterian mission at Aleppo is reported by the Rev. Dr. John Wortabet, who has thus been enabled to proceed to the formation of a little Evangelical Church in that city. Of eight communicants at the celebration of the Lord's Supper, four had been brought to a knowledge of the truth through Dr. J. Wortabet's instrumentality. One of them was a bishop in the Armenian Church, who, about a year and a-half ago, left his Church in disgust with its errors, joined the mission congregation, married, and is now labouring with his own hands for the livelihood of his family.

TURKEY.

The Rev. Mr. Riggs, of the American Board, has completed the first revision of the Bulgarian Old Testament, which is now in the press. Mr. Long, of the Methodist mission, has just commenced the revision of the Bulgarian New Testament. This completed, "for another year and a-half," he writes, "it will probably be my duty to give my remaining strength to the preparation and editing of the whole Bible, in one volume, with references."

"It is commonly believed," writes an American missionary at Kharpoot, "that we have recently had a narrow escape from a repetition of the Damascus and Syrian massacres :—

A short time ago, a Turk, feigning insanity, rushed into the street, attacking every Christian he met with a dagger, and passing by the Turks. He killed one Armenian and wounded another, and then rushed into the room occupied by the Pasha, with the design of killing him. Fortunately, the Pasha was out, and the man was secured. It is said that there was an extensive conspiracy of the Turks against the Christians, and that the signal was to be the death of the Pasha, so that the Government might have no head. The present time was chosen, on account of the absence of the soldiers. Turks, armed, were waiting a signal announcing the death of the Pasha, to begin their work of carnage. Several men are now in prison, awaiting a trial on the charge of being conspirators. The Pasha is waiting for instructions from Constantinople. The Moslems, all through the interior of the country, are very ignorant and fanatical; and whether the crescent is gradually to wane and go out in darkness, or to set in blood, is a problem which it is impossible to solve at present.

The distress and excitement prevailing among the Armenians in Eastern Turkey are exerting an unfavourable influence upon the mission work. Those of them who, in consequence of the scarcity, attempted to emigrate to Russia, were not allowed to cross the frontier, but returned in great depression and poverty.

PERSIA.

The mission circle at Oroomiah has been suffering, in some cases from bereavement, and in others from ill health. One of the missionaries writes :—

We have had a very disturbed summer, and on account of the insecurity of the roads, have travelled but little. Meerza Agha and Ali Agha, noted chiefs of the large tribe of Shekoik Koords, in our vicinity, have recently been seized, and are now in chains at Tabreez. They are brothers, and have run a long career of depredations, as well as of mutual hostility; almost every year rendering our roads, for a time, insecure. Their murders and robberies have often been connived at by the highest Persian officials of the province, who have not been ashamed to share the spoils with them. For a time, at least, we hope for quiet.

The new Nestorian agent finds it difficult to extend any efficient protection to Christian subjects, who are in the strong and unrelenting grasp of the powerful Afshar chiefs. He seems disposed to do what he can; but, like all Persians, expects to be handsomely paid for it in bribes.

A letter from the Rev. Dr. Perkins will be found in our Alliance intelligence.

INDIA.

The appointment of Sir John Lawrence as Her Majesty's Viceroy in India—universally admitted to be the best that could be made on purely secular grounds—is an event which must be viewed with extreme satisfaction by the friends of Indian evangelization. A man of known personal piety, a warm friend and supporter of Christian missions, and a decided advocate of the admission of the Bible into the Government schools—the five hundred European brethren labouring in the interests of Divine truth among the degraded millions of India cannot but feel that at length full justice will be done to their motives, their efforts, and their aspirations, by one who, while occupying the viceregal chair, thoroughly sympathizes with them, and fully appreciates their glorious enterprise. Some persons there may be who may expect too much; but they will do well to remember the restraints imposed by high office and by the special functions of a chief ruler in temporal affairs. For ourselves, we should be quite satisfied that Sir John Lawrence would go fast and far enough in the right direction, even though we had not his own assurance, made to a number of friends who, in order to commend him to the Divine blessing, met him, just previous to his departure from these shores, at the Hon. Arthur Kinnaid's, that he was prepared to stand by all that he had ever said, and trusted that he should be found the same man in the highest position that he had been in a subordinate post.

From all quarters we have evidence of the gradual process going on among the Hindoos, by which the faith of their fathers is becoming regarded as a worn-out superstition. With reference to Bengal, the Calcutta Corresponding Committee of the Church Missionary Society write :—

Hindooism is dying, yea, is well-nigh dead, as respects the hold which it has upon the minds of the people. It is no longer the battle-ground. During the whole of this tour I have scarcely met with a man who stood forth as its champion. Many and various are the influences which operate to produce this result; but the result is certain. A strong feeling, too, prevails, that Christianity must and will be the religion of India. Further, Christianity is to a great extent commending itself to the convictions of the people as a decidedly good thing; the character of Jesus is becoming more understood, and, in consequence, more admired. What is very important, also, the people can now draw the distinction between the precious and the vile; they rarely charge upon Christianity the inconsistencies of its professors; they can comprehend the difference between a Christian in name and a Christian in heart.

The Rev. T. Martin, of the Baptist Society, describes a visit paid by himself and a native preacher to the fair at Jatrapore (Bengal). "Jatrapore" means, literally, "town of the journey," and derives its name from the fact that, close to this town, the car of Juggernaut is annually drawn along the way prepared and set apart for it. "A more hideous monster," says Mr. Martin, "could not well be imagined. In appearance, he is neither like man nor beast, but a huge, bloated, ugly creature, without hands and feet! A torn cloth is thrown over his shoulders, and a large white umbrella is suspended over his head, to keep the rays of the sun off him." The missionaries take their stand in the shade of a large tree, and soon have a crowd of hearers. They are interrupted by the ringing of a bell. There is a rush to the car, and young and old—men, women, and children—drag it a few paces, and then, with one accord, turn their faces towards the idol, and bow to the earth. Offerings are presented by the deluded worshippers, and after a while the car is again dragged forward some paces :—

The car is now in front of us, and we take the liberty of pointing out the folly of worshipping such a creature. We show them how much more reasonable is the way of salvation which we have made known to them, through Jesus Christ. They nod assent. "It is of no use," they say, "to worship idols; it is all folly; but we cannot become Christians yet. By-and-bye we shall all be Christians." An old Brahmin, who had been listening to us for some time, observing me wipe the perspiration off my face, came up to me and said, "Ah, you have to exercise much patience and suffer much in making known your religion to these ignorant people, but the time is not far distant when your religion will be our religion, and your God our God. It must come to that." This is the conviction, though not the wish, of thousands who now worship idols.

From Benares, the Rev. C. B. Leupolt writes, that wherever he has gone, the people have manifested "a strong contempt for their idols, and a solemn aspiration to know something of the, to them, unknown God." Zenanas were thrown open, and they had plenty of listeners. While on an itinerating tour, accompanied by Mrs. Leupolt and three catechists, he conversed with a native gentleman, who, after frankly admitting that railway travelling is putting an end to the distinctions of caste, went on to say :—

The time will come when all the country will become Christians, and that time is not far away; your work is preliminary. You leaven the mass, but your converts are just the few solitary drops of Christian families, at the present as many as fifteen hundred [Roman Catholic] families may be found, and about forty Christian settlements."

BORNEO.

The Rev. Walter Chambers, of the Propagation Society, sends a journal of his labours among the Dyak tribes, east of Kuching, or Sarawak. In narrating his journeyings, which are for the most part by water, he occasionally presents to his readers some noticeable incidents of travel and sketches of scenery. Here, for example, is a pleasant picture :—

We went up the Stumbin. The brook soon became so narrow that we seemed ploughing through lofty grasses and rushes which overtopped us even as we stood up to pole, our only means of progress. After two or three miles the rushes ceased, the grass, in which the brook often almost lost itself, became short, and lying in the boat, I seemed gliding over a field miles in length. Thence we passed through a succession of ponds and small lakes—some covered with water-lilies—into one larger lake. The clear water reflecting the clear sky, the little island in the midst, the mountains on either side, the breeze fanning the water into miniature waves, made altogether as pretty a scene as I have looked on since I was on our own Windermere.

Sometimes, on the other hand, the storm, the flood, and the darkness, combine to render the missionary's position somewhat perilous :—

We were detained in the Gran by frequent accumulations of drift-wood. As we passed out into the Batang Lupar the clouds began to gather. It was not, however, until the sun went down that the storm burst. We kept on our way until we approached Stiro, when there was a general alarm amongst the crew at the danger of passing the currents and rapids there in a boat so few inches above the water's edge as ours. The tide ran too strong down for us either to make for the other bank, where were the lights of a farm-house, or to return to Bijat, where, up a creek, is a house with four Dyak Christians, with whom we would now gladly have passed the night; so we drove on to the mud bank of a Nipa jungle, where the boat soon stranded. Some of the crew now became apprehensive of our being within the wave of the Bore. As the water rapidly ebbed away we had the satisfaction of seeing the bank within a few inches of our boat shelve sheer down, leaving the water far enough away for any danger from the Bore. My crew were soon fast asleep, without a murmur at being dinnerless. I kept watch till after midnight, when the Bore rushed surging past, and we were again afloat and duly moored. . . . With the dawn my crew awakened their faculties by their usual dose of sirih leaf and betel nut. They apologised for having left all the watching to me, on the plea of having been kept awake the two previous nights by the mosquitos which abound in that region.

One of the severest trials of the missionary must be the inconsistency of professed converts. Mr. Chambers, speaking of Balow Hill, says :—

Berkat, Chaliang, and Abbat, are the only Christians here. Berkat did not appear for some time; he had been at a feast which had been kept up the whole night through at Lugus, a house not very far away. On his entrance, I was shocked at the ease with which he mentioned his having been drunk as an excuse for his late appearance. In their heathen state they are rather proud than ashamed of being in such a condition, and have a proverb, "Brave at the tuak (i.e., drugged rice beer), brave against the foe."

Mr. Chambers represents the Dyaks as contrasting most unfavourably with the Mbalos in force of character and religious earnestness—a point which has an important bearing upon native missionary effort in the interior. One of the Mbalos presented himself for baptism. Mr. Chambers observes :—

He is a brother of my friend Ramba. He had recently met with friends who had come direct from Mbalos land, who gave particulars as to what he had previously told me of Ramba's endeavours to convert his own countrymen. "Thirty Mbalos and two Kyans have entered with him into the worship of God. They have built a church with iron-wood posts. The Dutch resident at Selimbau, when he went up there, made this church his abode, and was so pleased to find there God's worshippers, that he made them a present of red cloth!" I should be more disposed to accept this as an augury of the ultimate Christianising of the inaccessible interior of this country by the natives, were the Dyaks possessed of a force of character equal to the Mbalos. During the time that Ramba remained here after his conversion, he displayed an earnestness, fearlessness, and perseverance in avowing and propagating the faith, which I have seen in none of our Dyaks. Most of the Christians, after a few attempts to teach their friends, desist in despair. When they have professed themselves such whilst living in houses where they have fellow-Christians, they are more likely on intermarrying into heathen houses to relapse into heathenism themselves than to make their new friends Christians. The Mbalos believe their land to have been the first seat of mankind, and name a mountain to which their ancestors fled during the universal deluge. Judging from the evidence of language, they came originally from the island of Celebes, and penetrated into the interior of Borneo, from the eastern coast. The Dyaks had no conception of God as a Spirit. Yet none of them seem to have any difficulty in accepting this truth when it is explained to them.

NORTH-EASTERN AFRICA.

Dr. Krapf writes from Kornthall, near Stuttgart, as follows :—

I have received the astounding news that in the vicinity of Matamuca, on the north-western frontier of Abyssinia, where the missionaries of the Pilgrim Missionary Society at Chrischona, near Basle, have taken up a station, natives have been discovered who came from Koordofan, Darfur, beasts from our oxen and horses. Many a howling I had formerly heard in the wilderness ; but such an awful concert I never experienced before. An incredible number of hyenas had taken up their quarters near the water, and devoured with the demon-like yells the poor animals that stole to the water to quench their thirst in the dark of night. They repeatedly made a thrust at our waggons ; but, thank God, we sustained no injury. At times it seemed as if the evil spirits had a forepost in this locality. Jackals, wild dogs, lions, all supported the chorus ; so that we were heartily glad when the sun came forth.

Leaving the desert, he is cheered by the sight of rich vegetation, picturesque scenery, and "a combination of natural beauties, seldom surpassed." Next, Molema's village is reached. Molema is the second brother of the Chief Montsiva, has been for many years a Christian, and has carried on the good work among the tribe to which he belongs ever since Mr. Ludorf left them, thirteen years ago. His satisfaction at seeing the missionary found substantial expression by presenting to him a fat sheep. Next Lord's-day Mr. Ludorf preached, and baptized several converts. Again he sets out on his journey, and has to travel through thick bush, where, for awhile, he loses the road, and his horses get lost from thirst. At length Morhaneng was reached, and the Chief Montsiva and his staff came at once to the waggons to salute the missionary. A fat sheep followed. Next day, being Sunday, Mr. Ludorf held Divine service in the Khotla. The Christians were at first shy ; but the chief and his staff having entered, they flocked round, and soon a good congregation worshipped in the very place where they had been shamefully treated. After two or three days, during which the missionary occupied himself in the performance of surgical operations and the distribution of medicines to the sick, as well as in pastoral work, he had an official interview with the chief and his council, and stating the object of his visit, asked for some explanation as to the persecution of the Christians. Mr. Ludorf goes on to say :—

Four of the headmen spoke well. A younger brother of the chief, a furious enemy of the truth, said, "If you hang me up, I will speak out my aversion and hatred against the Gospel and missionaries." At last the king in a long speech said he was glad indeed to see us. It was deeply regretted by him that he had ever been separated from his missionary. That now I had come to see my former dwelling was a sign for good. As to whether he would have a missionary, surely I was his missionary ; he would know of no other. The persecution I had heard of was true. It was brought about because his brother Molema would not submit to his orders. After I had left Molema stood as teacher of the tribe in my place. But he left, set up a chieftainship of his own. And as he had called oftentimes without effect, he got irritated, thinking, as these Christians are obeying the book more than the king, ultimately the tribe would split, and perish ; therefore he shut up the place of worship, and persecuted those who persevered. Molema ably defended himself from all these charges, proving that only the villany and evil-mindedness of a jealous man could do such a thing. "I am thy brother," said he, "and thou dealest with me and mine like a tiger." After six hours and a-half we broke up. No charge could be substantiated against the Christians. I go about in all parts of the town, preaching and exhorting without obstacle. Our gatherings are good. He is very friendly, at least to the face.

On a subsequent Lord's-day Mr. Ludorf describes the service as having been "opened again by the chief," and adds, "Liberty given to all except his daughters."

Mr. Ludorf having sent a friendly message to the Christian Chief Sechele, who, he was informed, was preaching to his people, received the following letter :—

I write to you, dear Mr. Ludorf, to testify my joy at your message. Here are my oxen to fetch you ; come at the time best suited to you. Two spans of track oxen I have not, or I would lend them to you. Do not forget any of your good things (medicines), because we have many maladies here, that you may help us. May God increase you that Spirit which you already have, that you may cause us to think of Him. Be saluted, as well as your wife. I am Sechele, your friend, who much desires to meet you, and to be impressed with the Holy Spirit, together with all your (his) people.

At the date of the last advices, Mr. Ludorf writes from the Khalagari Desert, "Behind us the grass is burnt ; the hoofs of our oxen are worn through. Water is scarce on the road."

MADAGASCAR.

There is no reliable intelligence, of recent date, from Madagascar. Rumours that King Radama was still alive appear to have been circulated with such reiterated persistency, that they appear now to be credited in quarters where they were at first disbelieved. The Mauritius papers of the latest date which have reached this country indicate an unsettled state of things in Madagascar ; there is nothing, however, to confirm the reports to which we have referred. But we await further and authentic information.

NEW ZEALAND.

The war news absorbs attention. The last accounts are somewhat unfavourable, and the determined resistance of these natives who have raised the standard of revolt makes it painfully evident much further bloodshed will ensue. Among the mission stations which have been compulsorily abandoned is one on the Wairoa River, under the charge of Arch-deacon Brown. Mr. Brown—"an excellent Dean and a good Maori scholar"—has always been in alliance with the neighbouring chief, Tamihana; but he received notice to quit, as the latter "might not be able to protect" him. He has accordingly left with his family. Yet, "Mr. Brown, or persons under Mr. Brown's direction, really taught Mr. Tamihana his own language."

The Bishop of Adelaide having invited Bishops Selwyn and Patteson to the South Australian capital, on a missionary errand, the former replies that, in the present state of New Zealand, his coming is quite out of the question. He adds:—

My connexion with the Melanesian Mission was singularly ordered. It began when the former was in New Zealand ceased, and before war broke out again I had surrendered the entire charge into the hands of the new Bishop, and have now one simple missionary idea before me—of watching over the "remnant that is left." Our native work is a remnant in two senses—a remnant of a decaying people, and a remnant of a decaying faith. The works of which you hear are not the works of heathens; they are the works of baptized men, whose love has grown cold from causes common to all Churches of neophytes, from Laodicea downwards. Such Christian knowledge as remains to them does harm rather than good, because it exalts them in their own eyes. They can condemn the sinners for breaking the Lord's-day, and justify the slaughter of children by reference to Maori usage. The more faithful men, as usually happens, are too timid or too few to make an effectual opposition. We are now pulling against the ebb, and, for aught I know, may soon be left aground. Two missionaries have already been sent away from this district for refusing to encourage the Maori King.

POLYNESIA.

The Rev. J. C. Vivian, a newly-arrived missionary of the London Society, at Raiatea (Society Islands), has been nearly nine months voyaging in the South Seas. He visited upwards of thirty islands, and on several of them the people were so anxious to receive missionaries, that he had literally to drag himself away from their grasp. "At Uea, one of the Loyalty Islands," says Mr. Vivian, "the natives were so anxious for me to remain, that they were ready to give up their lands, or anything they possessed, if I would be their missionary." At Fate—

As soon as they knew I was a new missionary, they determined, if possible, to secure me. At first they tried persuasion; on finding this to fail, they next tried what brute force would do—they designed to carry me off. For this purpose six strong fellows came on board before daylight, and took their stand near the cabin stairs. Judge my surprise on ascending the ladder. I had scarcely reached the top, before I was caught in the close embrace of these six naked black men. They looked very resolute at first, but by a little coaxing I got my release; and when they found their case was hopeless they desisted, and made no further effort. Every one of these poor fellows carried marks in his countenance of deep desire for further instruction in the Word of God. . . . On reaching Samoa, the same cry was heard from the brethren and people, "Do stay here; we need help." At the meeting of the brethren no less than seven of the high chiefs came and made a formal request that I might be detained. . . . They said with tears, if a missionary did not come with them, the priest would, and the people would be lost. If by gathering the whole population before me, to plead their own case, they could succeed, they would do it, and 5,000 people should come and present themselves as destitute of a pastor and going to ruin.

We mentioned, in our last (p. 599), the remarkable results which had followed the proclamation of the Gospel, by native agency, in Savage Island. From the same quarter we now hear that an interesting event had lately taken place:—

We have just had our first missionary meeting; it was a glorious gathering; not less than 3,000 were present. The natives are poor; they have no staple article for exportation. Their contribution has been in cocoa-nut fibre, arrowroot, &c. At a low estimate, I think they will fetch, in Sydney, 45*l*. In addition to this, they have paid for their books in arrowroot, and we have now shipped, per John Williams, about six tons of arrowroot, for sale in Sydney.

TRIAL OF BISHOP COLENZO.

The trial of Bishop Colenso for false and erroneous teaching in his published works began on November 17, in St. George's Cathedral, Cape Town, the Court consisting of the Metropolitan Bishop of Cape Town, and two suffragans, the Bishop of Graham's Town and the Bishop of the Orange Free State.

The accusing clergy, the Dean of Cape Town and the Archdeacons of Graham's Town and George, were present to support the charges preferred. On the part of Bishop Colenso, Dr. Bleek, the curator of the Grey Library, attended, and read a letter from his Lordship denying the jurisdiction of the Court; subsequently the Doctor handed in a formal protest against the proceedings. It was extended, however, that though the Bishop of Natal does not actually put in an appearance, he has virtually pleaded to the charges brought against him. The trial at the Cape was expected to extend over several days, and the decisive adjudication as to the questioned jurisdiction of the Metropolitan, and on the merits of the charges to be finally looked for some two or three years hence at the hands of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Literature.

THE times in which we live render it necessary that a popular commentary upon the Bible should be not merely doctrinal, experimental, and practical, but critical as well. Readers require more than inferences, observations, and exhortations; they require a careful analysis of the language of Holy Scripture, which shall enable them to see its true meaning. Expositions must not consist only of such materials as sermons are made of; they must be real interpretations, embodying the results of patient inquiry and scholarly exegesis. A demand will always exist for commentaries of the old school, mainly fitted for education; but for many reasons these no longer suffice. The growing intelligence of the Church asks for some of the fruits of modern Biblical scholarship; and the effrontery of recent sceptical criticism renders the infusion of an apologetic element needful in books upon Holy Scripture; in other words, something must be done to illustrate the truth of the record, its Divine inspiration, and its authenticity. All this has been felt by the author of the volume before us, as is apparent from his introduction, and many of the notes upon separate texts. Thus, in the introduction, Dr. Brown says at the outset: "When we enter on a critical examination of any work of ancient literature, we have first to discover its value; next we ascertain its integrity, or the purity in which its text has come down to us; and finally, to determine its meaning. Applying this to the four Gospels, our first inquiries must be apologetical; our second critical; our third exegetical."

Under the head of value he comprises both the genuineness and the intrinsic worth of a document. The genuineness of the four Gospels is affirmed on the ground of the universal consent of the early Church. Some of the special testimonies to this are also given, beginning with the more ancient known versions, the Syriac and the Old Latin; of these, the first represents the Eastern, and the other the Western Churches. They give us four Gospels, neither more nor less, and their text substantially agrees with our own. We say substantially, for there are some variations; the most extensive of which is probably the omission of the account of the adulterous woman in John viii. 1—11, which is not found in the Syriac Peshito. A second class of witnesses may be found in Christian writers, of whom Dr. Brown quotes some, all earlier than the Council of Nicea, in A.D. 325. They are Origen, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, the author of a list of New Testament books, called the "Muratorian Canon," Irenæus, and Papias. To these he adds Justin Martyr, the author of the "Epistle to Diognetus," Polycarp, Ignatius, Barnabas, and Clement of Rome. We do not by any means think that Barnabas, the companion of St. Paul, nor that any other man in that age, wrote the so-called "Epistle of Barnabas;" but we think it belongs to the second half of the second century, and therefore an important witness so far as it goes. In fact, it only quotes one Gospel—that of St. Matthew. Another group of witnesses is the heretical, comprising Tatian and Marcion; and it is observed that the infidels Porphyry and Celsus bear testimony to the genuineness of the Gospels, by their tacit admission of it.

Foiled in all attempts to overthrow this historical evidence, rationalist critics have attacked the Gospels by means of objections to their structure and contents. They have been ably answered, and Dr. Brown calls attention to some of the arguments which have been employed for this purpose. His observations on this head are well worthy of careful perusal. He glances at the questions of miracles and inspiration, and concludes his introduction by a paragraph in which he speaks in strong but appropriate language of the excellencies of the Evangelical narratives.

This is not the whole of the preliminary matter; a special introduction to each of the Gospels follows. Dr. Brown is of opinion that St. Matthew wrote his Gospel somewhere between A.D. 37 and A.D. 60; and we quite agree with him that precision cannot be arrived at. The words in Matthew xxviii. 14, "This saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day," to our mind certainly implies the lapse of a number of years between the event and the date of the record. As it respects the Jewish colouring of the first Gospel, we do not regard it as proving anything except that the writer was a Jew; it is certainly no evidence that he wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, Chaldee, or Syriac. Many ancient writers say it was first written in Hebrew, but very few moderns take this literally, although many suppose it was written in either Chaldee or Syriac. On the other hand, there are very powerful arguments for believing its original language was Greek, and in any case, no ancient Hebrew text has come down to us. We agree, then, with Dr. Brown, that this, like all the other books of Scripture, has been preserved in its original language. We also hold with him, that all the Gospels are independent productions, and not compiled from one another.

St. Mark's Gospel was probably written by him whom St. Peter (1 Peter v. 13) calls "Marcus, my son." He may have been a Gentile, but it is not likely that he wrote in Latin. The date of this Gospel seems to be some years later than that of Matthew. The uncertainty attaching to the literary history of the origin of the first two Gospels attaches also to that of Luke, but Dr. Brown tells us all that is known regarding it. John the Apostle undoubtedly penned the fourth Gospel, and apparently at a later date, but the actual date is unknown. Its peculiarities of style and of contents have always been acknowledged, but it remained for modern objectors to depreciate the grandeur and inimitable pathos by which it is distinguished.

The special introductions to the Gospels will be of real service to ordinary readers, the more inquiring of whom will be gratified with a list of the principal means we have for ascertaining the correctness of the text: they will also be glad to see the list of works referred to by the editor, including, as it does, many of the principal writers upon the four Gospels, or subjects connected with them. We may also observe here that a useful map of Palestine is inserted at the end of the volume.

The substance of the book, comprising 486 closely-printed octavo pages, must now be described. The text of the authorised version is followed, and given at length, divided into paragraphs, with copious parallel references and marginal readings. The commentary is at the foot of the page, in double columns. This commentary consists of critical and expository notes, with practical, experimental, and doctrinal remarks at intervals. In the selection and arrangement of his materials the author has had in view the requirements of ministers, and of educated studious private Christians, who will alike appreciate his efforts in their behalf. There are multitudes of such as are deeply anxious to avail themselves of the stores of modern learned and Evangelical criticism, but who find it difficult to do so. By means of a work like this their desire may, to a great degree, be accomplished. They will be able to see what has been done by more scientific explorers, and they will be put in possession of a valuable mass of sanctified erudition and thought. Nor will they be ignorant of the conflicts and discussions which are going on around the hallowed circle of the Evangelical narratives. Dim and indistinct notions still prevail in reference to sundry topics of importance, and the fears or suspicions of private Christians are appealed to by daring objectors—on the ground of various readings, for instance. Our author gives his attention to the more important of these, and possibly his readers will some of them wonder that those which affect the sense materially are so few. They will see that these various readings, or disputed readings, have been calculated and investigated with all possible care and fidelity; and they will not only have the judgment of our author respecting them, but a summary of the evidence for and against. In order to the due appreciation of these things, a knowledge of Greek is scarcely necessary, as a simple reference to the preliminary list of authorities will show the character of the witnesses. The knowledge of Greek is more desirable in cases of verbal criticism, although Dr. Brown has tried to make such things so plain, that merely English scholars may understand him. He has manifestly aimed to avoid the technicalities of learning, and, at the same time, to give his readers the advantage of it.

The days are happily gone by for thinking that the understanding of the literal meaning of Holy Writ is unimportant. Such an idea is quite inconsistent with the apostolic precept to "prove all things," and to "hold fast that which is good;" it allows an unbridled play to imagination and fancy, and leads to applications of the Divine Word altogether foreign from "the mind of the Spirit." This can only be ascertained by diligent attention to the language of the inspired record. We therefore approve of the prominence which is given by Dr. Brown to the development of the thought of the original. He is not often jejune or dry in his method of doing this; and he has relieved and refreshed his pages, if we may so speak, with those devout utterances of sanctified intelligence which we have already referred to as coming under the head of remarks. These remarks sometimes embody very important opinions on literary topics; e.g. at p. 217, in the following rather long sentence:

"Although a comparison of the four different streams of narration with each other, with the view of tracing out the unity of incident and discourse, and so shaping out as perfectly as possible 'The Life of Jesus,' has been the laudable, and delightful, and fruitful occupation of Biblical students in every age, one cannot but feel, the longer he studies these matchless productions, that every detail of them is so much fresher just where it lies than in any combination of them into one, that every such attempt as Tatian's 'Diatessaron' (about A.D. 170), and that of Professor White, of Oxford (1803)—that is, one continuous history woven out of the text of the four Gospels—is a mistake." This condemnation of what we call 'Harmonies' of the Gospels, is one to which Dean Alford and other great critics would subscribe; but they have always been popular, and are likely to continue so. By the way, there have been a host of Harmonies since that of White, and their editors include such names as Robinson, Greswell, and Dr. Tischendorf.

In conclusion (we are sorry that space forbids us to enlarge), it is with much satisfaction that we call attention to the elaborate volume before us; we trust it will be widely circulated and eminently useful. For although we do not accord with every opinion expressed, and think the style capable of condensation, we believe it to be a valuable book, and one fitted, with the Divine blessing, to render much aid to those for whom it is intended.

Sacrificial Worship of the Old Testament. By J. H. KURTZ, D.D. Translated by JAMES MARTIN, B.A. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark.

It is more than twenty years ago since Dr. Kurtz published the original sketch of this work, which he has now remodelled on a more extensive plan. The contents are distributed in four books: 1, "The General Basis of the Sacrificial Worship of the Old Testament." 2, "The Bleeding Sacrifices." 3, "The Bloodless Sacrifices." 4, "Modification of the Sacrificial Worship in Connexion with Special Seasons and Circumstances." The second book is divided into two parts; one on the rites connected with the bleeding sacrifices; and the other upon the varieties of that form of sacrifices, with further ritualistic details. Taken together, the four books involve the consideration of the entire Mosaic system so far as it consisted in external things. Beside this, the author has much to say respecting the moral and spiritual significance and intention of the precepts and institutions which he describes. It is, therefore, not merely to the sacrifices, but to the worship as a whole, that our attention is called, and it is designated sacrificial worship because everything in it was connected with sacrifice in one form or another. The matters treated of are therefore very various, and to ministers especially the volume is calculated to be most useful. A list of the texts illustrated would have been an advantage; but in default of this, the index of subjects will facilitate research. The character of Dr. Kurtz, as an able and conscientious scholar, and as an earnest advocate of scriptural truth, is so well known, that we need say nothing of it, but that it is a guarantee for the learning, thoroughness, and orthodoxy of this work. On the score of originality this volume contrasts very favourably with the shallow, and even flippant, attacks which have been made upon that portion of the Bible—the Pentateuch—here chiefly considered. Dr. Kurtz feels called upon frequently to combat the views of other writers, and hence his pages often assume rather a controversial aspect. This, however, could not be avoided, and readers who can appreciate the book will like it none the less on that account. The translator seems to have done his work well; but we think he could have adopted more fully the wording of the English version of the Bible in the enumeration of details from Scripture. The frequent Hebrew words are accurately printed, so far as we have examined them, but their translations sometimes seem harsh and awkward, and English readers will regard this as a blot upon a valuable book. Just to show what we mean, for the Hebrew words translated in our version "for a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the Lord" (Ex. xxix. 41, and elsewhere similarly), we have here—"i. e., firing to the savour of peace, of satisfaction, of good pleasure for Jehovah" (p. 56). This may be a very literal version of Dr. Kurtz, but it is very awkward, and even when reduced to its simplest form, "firing to the savour of peace, or of satisfaction, or of good pleasure for Jehovah," exhibits a translation of the Hebrew which would not be tolerated in English. The original Hebrew means "for an acceptable savour, a burning (i. e., a burnt-offering) to Jehovah." The only other remark we will now make is, that, considering the small number of English readers who understand Hebrew at all, some portions of this valuable volume would have been more generally intelligible if the Hebrew words and phrases had not been left untranslated. To give Hebrew without English may be to give "hidden wisdom," but such wisdom is useless, and teaches nothing.

A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Genesis, with a New Translation. By JAMES G. MURPHY, LL.D. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark.

DR. MURPHY has the reputation of being a good Hebrew scholar, and of having a large store of Biblical learning generally. He is, moreover, not afraid to call the Bible "the Book of God," and to show his implicit faith in its Divine inspiration and truth. It is just now peculiarly important that men who combine faith with learning should contribute their quota to the elucidation and confirmation of Scripture, and hence we welcome the appearance of volumes like the one before us. This book comprises an introduction and a commentary upon the text of Genesis, along with a new version. The introduction treats of the Bible in general, more especially of the Pentateuch, and in particular of the Book of Genesis. Dr. Murphy holds that Moses was generally the author of the Pentateuch, but that it has been retouched by a later and authorised reviser. He holds that Genesis is separable into no fewer than "eleven documents, or pieces of composition, most of which contain other subordinate divisions." Almost as a consequence, he thinks that Moses may be called the responsible author of Genesis, although he may not have actually composed the whole of it, but have embodied in it previously-existing narratives. He suggests that the primeval Bible contained the first four chapters of Genesis; the second Bible reached as far as chapter xi. 9; and the third Bible took in the whole of the book. The first Bible contained two documents; the second five; and the third eleven. All this is very ingenious, but, like all the theories known as "fragmentary," it is theory only. Astruc, the father of all these schemes, in his "Conjectures" (1753), suggested that Moses wrote Genesis chiefly from two documents, but that the book may possibly contain traces of twelve (pp. 308—315). Since then, the subject has led to much debate, and there are few who are unacquainted with the common distinction between Elohist and Jehovist portions. We have no space here to discuss the question, but we may express our opinion that Dr. Murphy has not set it at rest. His commentary and his translation contain many things of which we approve, and speaking generally, we admit that the volume is capable of affording important assistance to the student. At the same time, we have an impression that some of the renderings, and some of the opinions here advanced, will not meet with acceptance from the mass of scholars and expositors. We do not object to the treatment of the days of creation as natural days, because the genius of the narrative seems to demand it, and the fourth commandment, and the reason for it, seem to allow of no other. He has, we think, less ground for the opinion that the cherubim are real creatures, and not mere symbols. He advocates the opinion of a very limited deluge; but some will say they do not see why Noah needed to build an ark at all on this principle, as he could have migrated far beyond the imagined limit of the flood in a much less time than it took to build the ark. On many topics we gladly accept the explanations offered by our author, but we repeat that both in his version and in his exposition we are not seldom compelled to withhold our assent. It is a matter of taste, but we wish he had always retained the spelling of proper names familiarised among us by the authorised version. We wish, too, that some portions of the translation had been more conformed to our English idiom. Nothing is gained by saying, for example, "And the waters decreased from the end of fifty and a hundred days." Is it certain that Genesis xi. 1 is best rendered, "And the whole land was of one lip, and one stock of words?" "Lip" is not English for grammar, as Dr. Murphy seems to believe; and "one stock of words," is no better as a paraphrase than "one speech" or "one language." We are told (Gen. xli. 2) that the seven fat kine which Pharaoh saw in his dream "fed on the green." What green? The Hebrew shows that it was a kind of marsh-grass, as Dr. Murphy is quite aware. Little things of this character give a somewhat eccentric air to Dr. Murphy's version, to which otherwise we should seldom object, always excepting the opening verses of the book, "In the beginning had God created the heavens and the earth, and the earth had become a waste and a void, &c., which we should never subscribe to. Still, there is a vast amount of useful matter in the work, and it bears upon every page the marks of learned and industrious research.

Scenes in the Life of St. Peter: a Biography and an Exposition. By JAMES SPENCE, M.A., D.D. The Religious Tract Society.

DR. SPENCE tells us very truly that there is need for a scriptural delineation of the character of St. Peter, and a complete view of the facts of his history so far as they are authenticated. And the reason he gives for this is a just one—namely, "that a superstitious and mythical interest has gathered around" the apostle's name. But when he says that his pages are an attempt, "not merely to follow the facts of St. Peter's life, as they are recorded in the New Testament, but also to give a brief account of all that he did, said, and wrote, as a man and an apostle of the Lord," he says more than he means. Dr. Spence knows that we have no real source of information concerning St. Peter besides the New Testament, and he proceeds on that principle. Only in the appendix have we a short discussion of the question whether Peter was ever bishop of the Church at Rome. Even in the chapter upon the rebuke administered to Simon the Sorcerer, Dr. Spence confines himself to Scripture, with the exception of a casual allusion or two to Justin Martyr and Eusebius of Cæsarea; he makes no reference whatever to other traditions, such as are contained in the Clementine Recognitions, Homilies, and Epitome. It is so throughout. The author glances at the traditional literature just enough to show that he knows it, but he keeps close to the New Testament, as the only safe and genuine authority. We have been very much gratified with the perusal of the book, and we strongly commend it for sound doctrine, an earnest Christian temper, and a calm and intelligent style and arrangement.

Capernaum. By the Rev. A. MOODY STUART. James Nisbet and Co.

THIS volume is written in a good style and in an excellent spirit. It consists of a series of fifteen chapters upon Capernaum, and incidents connected with it, as recorded in the Gospels. The first chapter tells us all that is known of its site, and dwells upon the circumstances of its guilt and doom. The next chapter considers it as the place of Christ's abode; the reasons for which Mr. Stuart supposes to be three—that it belonged to Galilee; that it was a seaport town; and that He was earnestly invited thither by the people. It is rather doubtful whether Capernaum can with strict propriety be called "a seaport town," seeing that there was no port there, and that the sea itself is but a moderately-sized fresh-water lake some fourteen miles long by seven or eight wide. This is a small objection, and one which few will notice who read this book for edification; and for edification it is adapted. It is indeed admirably calculated to awaken holy emotions in the soul, and to show us the wonderful suggestiveness of everything connected with the recorded earthly life of the Saviour whom Mr. Stuart seeks so well and earnestly to honour. We thank him for this volume, and feel sure that it will become a favourite.

Christian Faith and Practice. By JAMES W. ALEXANDER, D.D., New York. Edinburgh: Andrew Elliot.

THIS volume of discourses by the late Dr. J. W. Alexander, of America, forms a befitting companion to the one entitled "Consolation," re-issued in this country a few months ago by the same enterprising publisher. If, as is remarked in the preface, "the testimony of booksellers now is that some of the most widely-spread publications of the day are collections of sermons," one would anticipate for the present edition of the above-named work—at once elegant and cheap—a very favourable reception on this side of the Atlantic. The discourses—twenty in number—range over nearly all the great distinguishing doctrines and duties of the Christian faith; and in the views advanced, the classic purity and vigour of language in which these are clothed, and the sobriety, yet at the same time firmness and fervour of conviction, with which they are maintained, is evinced at once the humble believer, the accomplished scholar, and the sound divine. In the opening discourse on "Our Modern Unbelief," it is most refreshing to meet with one who unites so attractively the wisdom of the serpent with the dove-like spirit of the saint; proving himself, on the one hand, quite a match for the most learned and pretentious of his free-thinking antagonists; and, on the other, one who "hath understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do." From this, as well as from some of the sermons which follow, such as "The Divine Perfections in Harmony," "The Worldling," "The Blood of Sprinkling," "The Inwardness of True Religion," "Love Casting out Fear," "Mirth," or "Youth Renewed in Age," we would willingly have made extracts, but our limits forbid. We would simply, and in brief, express it as our judgment of the volume, that it furnishes one of the very best specimens of polished, yet pointed and powerful, pleading for Gospel truth, with which the pulpit of America has of late enriched our common mother tongue.

1. The Leisure Hour: 1863. 2. The Sunday at Home: 1863. The Religious Tract Society.

THESE periodicals not only sustain their well-earned reputation, but present fresh claims to public patronage. The feature which will perhaps chiefly commend itself to most persons, in glancing over either of these noble volumes, is the variety which has been secured to meet the demands of different classes of readers. Age, taste, and temperament diverge so widely, that it can be no easy task to conduct a magazine which shall at once satisfy the literary appetite of the masses and fulfil all the conditions justly demanded by an institution like the Religious Tract Society. The experiment has been tried, however, and we have here the evidence of its complete success. The individual must be hard indeed to please who does not find in either of these miscellanies not a little that shall minister to his intellectual wants. The entertaining element properly predominates in the Leisure Hour, and the serious in the Sunday at Home; but neither is entertainment sought at the expense of solid instruction, nor is seriousness allowed to degenerate into gloom. In both works, coloured plates, from sketches by able artists, form a new and attractive feature. The wood-engravings are as abundant as ever.

The Cottager in Town and Country. 1863. The Religious Tract Society.

THIS is, if we mistake not, the most recently established of the Religious Tract Society's periodicals, and it certainly gives every indication of youthful vigour and vitality. Its ample and well-filled pages—with type specially suited for the aged and less educated reader, as well as that in ordinary use for the young and the middle-aged, and the attractive wood-engravings which form a leading feature in every number—cannot fail to be welcome in the homes of humbler classes, whither they ought largely to find their way by gratuitous circulation.

cisions of the Congress when it assembles, though it is plain that if that august assemblage had ever taken place and entered upon the affairs of Italy at all, one or other of these potentates would have been grievously disappointed. In the meantime, the Pope abates no jot of his pretensions to his old sovereignty. The bishoprics in several of the provinces which formerly belonged to the Roman See, but which have recently been annexed to the kingdom of Italy, have been vacant for some time past. It was not likely that any ecclesiastics named by the Italian Government would have found favour with the Pope; and there was, therefore, no attempt made to fill them up from that quarter. The Pope has, however, terminated any difficulty arising from that circumstance, though at the cost, we believe, of plunging into still greater difficulties. He has recently filled up all the vacant sees, without any consultation with the Italian Government, and altogether against their consent. Such a course might have been expected from the Pontiff who was guilty of an impertinence much stronger in the nomination of bishops by his own assumed power in the realm of England; he has now, it may be argued, only nominated bishops in those provinces which lately, in fact, and still, of right, are his own. But we much mistake the character of the present King of Italy and his advisers if they allow these ecclesiastical intruders to exercise their episcopal rights unchallenged.

The current of events in America continues to run against the Confederates. No impression, indeed, has been made by the Federals in Virginia, and the siege of Charleston is at a stand-still; but the campaign in Tennessee has ended in the retreat of the Confederates at all points, and in the firm establishment of their opponents in the commanding position of Chattanooga, whence in the course of the next year they will be able to make a strong inroad upon the hitherto uninvaded State of Georgia. The Congress has again met in Washington, and the President, who has been ill, but is now recovering, has forwarded his message, which is shorter and less discursive than documents of this nature usually are. It is remarkable, however, for a proposal which is put forth for a reconstruction of the Union, and the restoration of those states that have seceded. The President holds that the success of the Federal arms has of late been such as to justify him in holding out an amnesty to the disaffected. He therefore proposes that a proclamation shall be issued, offering an amnesty to all persons who shall lay down their arms—the leaders of the insurrection alone excepted—and the restoration of those states that shall express a wish to return to their former place in the Union, upon condition that they shall swear to observe all the Federal proclamations issued during the war, and especially the one for the abolition of slavery. This, it will be seen, is unconditional submission; and the President himself hardly expects that the Confederates are reduced to such a point of subjection as to be willing to accept it, for he says that after all, their principal dependence must still be in the sword. According to the estimates for the forthcoming year, the Federal debt, after three years only of war, will amount to about 440,000,000*l.* sterling. Such a frightful devourer is war. The expenditure of blood is not to be estimated.

The message of the Confederate President has also been received. His tone is gloomy, if not desponding. He admits the full extent of the losses the Confederacy have sustained, and he speaks in a complaining tone of the hostility with which, as he says, England regards their efforts. But, far from counselling submission, he recommends measures for the regulation of the currency, which is still more disordered than in the North, and for a more stringent conscription to fill up the armies. Whether the people of the South are in a temper to submit to these further sacrifices, time must determine.

HOME.

Standing on the threshold of a new year, we are naturally led to review the progress of Christian truth in the one that has just expired. There is not much on which Christian men can congratulate each other in the retrospect. We have no brilliant triumphs to which we may point; no great achievements of Christian enterprise; no new service undertaken on behalf of Christ. It is, however, true that these are not the only nor always the sure signs of substantial progress. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation." The spread of truth may be as gradual and as noiseless as the operation of a thaw on drifted snow; while we look, the obstacles are becoming converted into helps. It is matter of thankfulness that all the great Christian agencies have been maintained during the year in unimpaired efficiency. Efforts in preventing evil, as well as in producing good, must all be calculated before we can determine the full measure of their influence. But in those matters that come more immediately under observation, we should be disposed to say that the progress of events during the past year has been towards evil. The great scandals that have of late afflicted the Church are still left unrebuked and unremoved. Dr. Colenso still remains a bishop of the Church of England. The judgment pronounced in the case of two of the clerical writers in "Essays and Reviews"—pared down to the minimum of censure as it was—has not yet been affirmed by the higher tribunal to which the defendants appealed. The Judicial Committee of Privy Council have separated without giving their judgment; and there is a rumour, resting we know not on what authority, that when the judgment is given, the sentence of the court below will substantially be reversed—the Essayists will be declared to have kept within the limits of free thought allowed by the Church, and their accusers will be mulcted in the costs. We shall not presume that a judgment so disappointing will be delivered till it has actually been pronounced; but there is enough in the circumstances to awaken apprehension. When we add to this the number of eminent and good men that have been removed from amongst us in the course of the year, some of them in the fulness of their usefulness and their fame, we feel more than ever constrained to place our reliance on Him who alone can guide His Church through the dark and stormy future on which she appears to be entering.

The melancholy intelligence of the death of the Earl of Elgin in India was anticipated by the Government at home, when the first news of his illness arrived, casting about for a successor. Their choice fell upon Sir John Lawrence, a man who had only his merits to recommend him, but whose appointment has been hailed with a unanimity of feeling which is truly remarkable, as the fittest man to sway the destinies of India at the present crisis in her history. The career of his predecessor was too short to allow of his plans for India being fully unfolded. It was known that, when he first went out to his splendid, but fatal viceroyalty, he was labouring under heart disease; and his journeys among the steep hills of the North-west proved too much for his debilitated frame. And so closed, in an obscure corner in India, the career of one who had travelled further in his country's service, and negotiated with more strange and outlandish rulers, than any other man of modern times. We are satisfied that he proceeded on his last mission with a sincere desire to benefit the country and to draw out its material resources. But we are also satisfied that his successor brings to the same task a more special capacity and a more determined will. Sir John has spent, it may be said, his whole life in India; his career there has been more distinguished than that of any other man since the days of Clive, and his character is more pure and unsullied than that of Clive could pretend to be. After all deductions that may be made for the merits of others, it still remains true that it was Sir John Lawrence who kept the Punjab quiet at the most critical period of the mutiny, who afterwards turned the restless energies of the natives in favour of the maintenance of British rule, and who, by pouring down his levies for the siege of Delhi, entitled himself, more than any other man, to be considered the preserver of India. But the most interesting part of Sir John's character is, that all his iron energy is enlisted on the side of Christian truth—that the firm ruler, the able statesman, the man of determined will, is also the humble, devoted, pious Christian. He has already avowed his opinion that Christian education may be carried much farther in India than his more timid predecessor would venture on, and we anticipate from his appointment a new era in the diffusion and the inculcation of Christian truth among the millions of heathen committed to our rule.

There were two announcements recently made in the same number of the London Gazette which have both of them some significance to the Church and the country. The one was the promotion of Canon Stanley to the Deanery of Westminster; the other was the promotion of Mr. Serjeant Shee to the judicial bench. Both these appointments have, therefore, received official sanction, and are irrevocable. For the position of a dean differs from that of every other dignitary in the Church of England; the ecclesiastical authorities have no voice, nominal or real, in his appointment. The promotion of Canon Stanley has so long been anticipated, however, that the Church must, by this time, have made up her mind what to expect, and become prepared to meet the evil as best she may. The promotion of Serjeant Shee to be a judge comes upon us more unexpectedly. He is the first instance of a Roman Catholic having been raised to the judicial seat in England since the Revolution. His claims as a lawyer are admitted on all hands. He has been for several years one of the foremost men in his profession; and it was admitted that there was no reason, apart from his religion, why he should be passed over. And if the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act was not to be regarded as a dead letter, his religion could not be fairly urged as a bar to his advancement. It is to be added, that he is not one of the Ultramontane school, and that he lost a seat in Parliament he once held from an Irish county because he would not go far enough to please the priests. But, after making all allowance for these considerations, it is impossible not to see in this and other appointments the disintegration that is going on between Protestantism and the official organs of the State.

It may be remembered that at the congress of clergy and laymen held a month or two ago at Manchester there was a sharp passage at arms between the Bishop of Oxford and Canon M'Neile, of Liverpool, on the spiritual condition and the future prospects of members of the Roman Catholic Church—the Bishop attempting to fasten upon the Canon the maintenance of the dogma that no Roman Catholic can be saved. Canon M'Neile protested against this interpretation at the time; but the chairman was inexorable, and would allow of no explanations. Dr. M'Neile is not the man, however, to rest under a groundless imputation; and at a meeting of the Society for Irish Church Missions the other day he set himself right. What he did maintain was, that Romanism was not saving Christianity; a very different assertion from what was imputed to him.

At the same meeting, and in the same speech, Dr. M'Neile raised another question, which, in another way and another place, was about the same time raised by no less a person than Mr. Cobden. Dr. M'Neile says that certain articles that appeared in the Times against the Irish Church were written by a Roman Catholic, and that the Bishop of Ossory had challenged the Times to deny it. Mr. Cobden says that a reference made to some late speeches, delivered by Mr. Bright and himself, contained offensive and false libels; and he challenged the editor and the writer to avow these statements in their own proper persons. The editor, Mr. Delane, we may remark, has done so; and in his own name he distinctly states his opinion that Mr. Cobden did wish the agricultural labourers to understand they were unjustly kept out of the land by the aristocracy of the country; and though he admits Mr. Cobden did not counsel, but condemned violence, he asked what would be the effect on the minds of the peasantry? But in both these cases the matters immediately in issue are overshadowed by the broader one, whether the practice of anonymous writing, which has grown up insensibly in England, ought to be exchanged for that system of signatures to each article that is enforced by law in France. This is not the place to discuss a question so wide and interesting; and it may only be necessary to remark here that it is well understood in France that the signature to an article does not in every case represent the actual writer.

The newspapers have been filled for the last month with copious details of the court-martial held at Aldershot on Colonel Crawley, of the Inniskillen Dragoons. The charges against this officer were that he caused the sergeant-major of his regiment, at Mhow, in Central India, to be placed under an arrest so close and strict and irritating, as to be a matter of constant indignity to his sick and dying wife, and so offensive to the prisoner himself, that his health gave way under the torture, and he died; and that the Colonel then attempted to shift the blame upon another officer. To try this case about 150 witnesses, officers, soldiers, and civilians, were brought from India to England, and kept here for several months, at the national expense. The proceedings closed the other week, and, though the finding of the court is not yet published, we believe the general feeling of all who have attended to the proceedings is that the accusations have not been proved.* That, however, is a very small affair. The great point which has been established by the trial is, that every subject of the British Crown may feel assured, in whatever part of the world he may be placed, he is under the eye of his countrymen, and that he will not be allowed with impunity either to do or to suffer injustice. That point once established, it will be matter of satisfaction if an English officer and gentleman be relieved from the odious imputations of injustice, oppression, and cruelty that were brought against him.

* Since the above was in type, the decision of the court-martial, having been submitted to the Queen, and received the Royal approval, has been published. Colonel Crawley is fully acquitted of all the charges preferred against him.

WEEK OF PRAYER.

Our friends are again reminded of the invitation issued by the Evangelical Alliance to Christians throughout the world, to set apart the week commencing Sunday, January 1, as a season of special united prayer.

ARRANGEMENTS

For Special United Prayer-meetings during the Week commencing January 4, 1864, to be held in the metropolis, in accordance with the invitation which has been issued to Christians throughout the World.

The meetings will be held each morning at Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-fields, at eleven o'clock.

Monday, Jan. 4.—Chairman: The Lord Calverley.—Address by Rev. John Cumming, D.D. Subject: Penitential Confession of Sin, and the Acknowledgment of Personal, Social, and National Blessings, with Supplication for Divine Mercy through the Atonement of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

Tuesday, Jan. 5.—Chairman: Captain Trotter.—Address by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. Subject: For the Conversion of the Ungodly; for the Success of Missions among Jews and Gentiles; and for a Divine Blessing to Accompany the Efforts Made to Evangelise the Unconverted of all Ranks and Classes around us.

Wednesday, Jan. 6.—Chairman: The Lord Radstock.—Address by Rev. David King, LL.D. Subject: For the Christian Church and Ministry; for Sunday-schools and all other Christian Agencies; and for the Increase of Spiritual Life, Activity, and Holiness in all Believers.

Thursday, Jan. 7.—Chairman: Colonel J. Geddes Walker, R.A.—Address by Rev. Newman Hall, LL.B. Subject: For the Afflicted and Oppressed; that Slavery may be Abolished; that Persecution may Cease; and that Christian Love may Expand, to the Comfort and Relief of the Destitute in all Lands.

Friday, Jan. 8.—Chairman: Robert Baxter, Esq.—Address by Rev. C. D. Marston, M.A. Subject: For Nations; for Kings and all who are in Authority; for the Cessation of War; for the Prevalence of Peace; and for the Holy Observances of the Sabbath.

Saturday, Jan. 9.—Chairman: The Hon. W. Ashley.—Address by Rev. George Osborne, D.D. Subject: Generally for the Large Outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and the Revival and Extension of Pure Christianity throughout the World.

Christians are affectionately invited to plead before God, agreeing on earth as touching the things they should ask, remembering the promise, "It shall be done for them of my Father which is in Heaven."

MONTHLY MEETING FOR PRAYER.

The attention of members of the Alliance resident in and around London is called to the following notice issued by the Committee:—

VOL. XVIII.—V. NEW SERIES.—JANUARY.

A prayer-meeting for one hour will be held in the Council-room, on the morning of each monthly meeting of the Committee of Council, prior to the transaction of business, to which the members of the Evangelical Alliance, as well as the Committee, are affectionately invited. The meetings are held on the third Wednesday in each month. Prayer commences at eleven o'clock.

TERCENTENARY OF CALVIN'S DEATH.

Geneva, November 14, 1863.

Dear Sir and Brother,—The reason why I reply rather late to your letter of October 16 is, that our Executive Council of the Alliance has met only yesterday.

The committee has gratefully received the communication of the resolution adopted at your Conference at Dublin on the subject of the commemoration of Calvin's death. I have been requested to forward to the committee of London the resolutions which a month ago have been adopted with regard to this subject by our general committee. You will find them printed on the enclosed paper.

As our Council of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva entertains only the idea of a spiritual celebration of the death of Calvin, they take the liberty of inviting the British committee to assist them in making arrangements for commemorating the 24th of May, 1864, the anniversary of the death of the Reformer, in all the Protestant countries of the English tongue by special religious meetings. The especial object of such meetings would be to make mention of the Reformer Calvin and his work, to render thanks to God for the blessings and benefits of the Reformation, to ask God in earnest prayer that the pure doctrines of the Gospel may be maintained in the Church, and to deliver appropriate addresses.

The resolution adopted in September, 1861, at the Conference of Geneva, proposed the plan of erecting an edifice for evangelization, to be used both by the National and the Independent Church.

A special committee, after that of the Alliance, occupied itself with the realisation of this project; and after many attempts, the difference of opinion, the question of a profession of faith, &c., &c., have convinced us that it was impossible to carry into effect the resolution of September, 1861, according to its letter and its spirit. There was an incompatibility between the general terms of the resolution and the principles from which the Alliance cannot depart; and, in holding firmly to these principles, we should have acted against the terms of the resolution, and as the result of it, painful dissensions would have arisen. For these reasons the Alliance has preferred giving up the idea of erecting any edifice whatever, and has limited itself to a spiritual commemoration of two kinds. 1. To organise special religious meetings, with conferences on the Reformer. 2. To publish a popular biography of Calvin, especially destined for the Genevese, and for this we have offered a prize of 500f.

You suggest the propriety of having a British delegate present at Geneva on the day of the anniversary. We shall gratefully and joyfully receive him, and we shall later communicate to you the proceedings of the meetings.

APPEAL OF MATAMOROS TO THE CORTES.

The following is the translation of an address to the Spanish Cortes by Don Manuel Matamoros :—

TO THE CORTES.

To every man who loves his country banishment is more than a penal affliction ; it is a moral distress which troubles the mind and martyrises the heart. At all times, and under all circumstances of life, banishment produces a profound and painful impression ; but it is doubly painful when its victims entertain in the sanctuary of their consciences the sure and well-founded conviction that they have committed no fault in the eyes of the Lord, whose name they ardently desire to glorify, and that they have endeavoured to obey the Divine Word of that Supreme Judge before whose tribunal they must appear to give an account of their faith and life.

The writer of these lines has been condemned by the Audiencia of Grenada to an almost perpetual exile on account of his religious faith, and he addresses this respectful petition to the Cortes, in the hope that they will kindly receive the sincere expression of his sentiments, and, while they act in obedience to the Christian spirit, they will also show that they comprehend the spirit of our age, and the requirements of an advanced civilization.

I respect the laws of the State, and there shall never proceed from my lips a protest or a complaint against the inexorable sentence of the tribunals. As a Spanish subject, I have submitted without a murmur to their decision ; as a Christian, I have from my heart pardoned my judges. The existing laws do not permit the public exercise of any other than the official worship. I know it, alas, by sad experience, and I have learned something of their unrelenting rigour. But the protecting principles which consecrate liberty of conscience, the lessons of the past, and the example of all civilised and even of several barbarous nations, as well as other facts, make it manifest that the spirit of the Penal Code, not less than its application in our country, belongs to remote epochs of intolerance and fanaticism, the memory of which makes us tremble and blush with shame.

The whole of Europe was stirred when it was known that in the Spain of the nineteenth century men were condemned and punished for so-called religious crimes as was the case in those calamitous ages when the altar and the throne were used as weapons of despotism and vengeance.

Torrents of human blood have been the price of the conquest of that precious right which permits every reasonable man to pray to God in the form and according to the principles which his conscience dictates. Liberty of worship, the source of all liberties, has at last acquired the sanction of all public powers, even without excepting the Sovereign Pontiff of Roman Catholicism.

Truth in matters of religion cannot be enforced by fire and sword. Persecutions make martyrs, not apostates ; victims, not conversions. No one has the right to interfere between man and his Creator. No one has the right so to abuse his powers as to constrain the soul, and force it to submit to a worship which it disapproves and repels.

The history of our misfortunes is a testimony which rises with irresistible eloquence against the narrowness of sects and the theocratic oppression of the Established Church. The separation of the Netherlands, which deprived the crown of Castile of its brightest ornament ; the expulsion of the Jews and Moors, which emptied our workshops and manufactories ; the auto-da-fés, at which so many thousand victims were sacrificed ; the horrible catastrophes which desolated our land ; the atrophy of our intellectual faculties, which made us live in darkness, and the loss of our former preponderance among the nations, which has so often been a cause of humiliation to our flag both in the Old World and the New, have been the inevitable results of religious fanaticism, whose iron sceptre now for many a long year has weighed upon us heavily. Yes, fanaticism has deprived our fields of thousands of industrious arms, has interrupted the course of ideas and diminished our foreign influence, and made of the Pyrenees an insurmountable barrier, and of our coasts a wall of granite which isolates us from the civilised world.

It is time at last that the Spanish nation should enter into the assembly of the free and enlightened Powers. It cannot be concealed from the high wisdom of the deputies and senators that it would be for the interests of the monarchy, for the increase of its influence and its future prosperity, to reform the existing legislation with regard to liberty of worship, and to avoid the scandal that Spanish subjects, happy to consecrate to their country their talents and intelligence, should be removed from their country like criminals, and be obliged to seek in foreign lands an asylum, protection, and security. The undersigned was born in Spain, speaks the language of his forefathers, and implores the precious gifts of Providence for his country. His only guilt is to worship, "in spirit and in truth," the "God who is a Spirit." He has, by the grace of God, a sincere and deeply-rooted faith in Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour ; he believes in Him who alone is "the Way, the Truth, and the Life," "the only Mediator between God and men ;" he accepts as the rule of faith the Word of God alone, the only revelation of the Divine will, and he feels his eyes filling with tears and his heart oppressed with grief at the thought of his being an exile on account of this very faith and those precious hopes which God with His own hand has engraved in the depth of his conscience, and which do not permit him to submit either to the official worship of the State, or to have recourse to hypocrisy—the resource of mean souls for evading the severity of an unjust and oppressive legislation.

It would be indeed worthy of the legislators of Spain if they would adopt the resolution that all men, whatever be their form of worship and their faith, in whatever way they recognise their spiritual relations to God, should be allowed to establish themselves in that country.

The Government of the present time ought not on this point to be behind an absolute king in 1797. It was then decreed that no foreigners, your letter of September 1, and beg to thank you and your Committee most sincerely for all the efforts you have made to secure some measure of relief to the suffering Nestorians, through the intervention of your Government. I am happy to inform you that a member of the British Embassy at Teheran, Mr. Andrew Glen, is now here, inquiring into the state of this people, and for the time there is a partial lull in their wrongs.

Both our mission and the Nestorians are most devoutly thankful that the attention of your Government is turned to this subject, and we hail Mr. Glen's arrival here as the coming of an angel of mercy; and we earnestly pray and hope that it may result in measures which shall secure the protection of a worthy people, whose cup of woe has so long been filled to the brim and made to run over by their merciless rulers and masters.

We beg, however, to express to you our profound conviction, that no essential benefit can be secured to these sufferers by any temporary visit of an official; and that, remote as they are from the capital, and the authorities here being so nearly independent alike of the provincial Government at Tabréz and the central Government at Teheran, no measure short of placing a British consul or a consular agent here would have the effect to secure the end desired. I believe that Consul Abbott, who has just left Tabréz for England, and who has taken infinite pains to succour the Nestorians, but almost in vain, was entirely convinced on this subject. Indeed, the merely temporary visit of a British official here would have the effect to anger the Mohammedans and increase the sufferings of the Christians after his departure.

The recent painful case of the abduction of a Nestorian girl by Mohammedan ruffians may probably have been communicated to you by Mr. Birch. A month has elapsed since that occurrence, and three successive orders have been sent here by the authorities at Tabréz for the severe punishment of the culprits, at the instance of the British consul there; but as yet they have been entirely disregarded by the authorities of Oroomiah, and the poor girl and her friends are frightened from their home and village, and fleeing from place to place in terror. This case may well illustrate my remarks above, in regard to the unspeakable importance of having a British official stationed among this poor people, if we would save them.

I beg to reiterate my thanks to you, on behalf of our mission and the people to whose welfare and salvation we are devoted, for all your kind interest and sympathy, and all your unwearied efforts to help us and them, in the furtherance of those objects. (Signed) G. PERKINS.

NATAL.

The annual meeting of the Natal Branch of the Alliance took place on the evening of July 9, 1863, at the Congregational Chapel D'Urban. A. W. Evans, Esq., one of the vice-presidents, took the chair. It proved a most efficient and interesting meeting. The chapel was well filled, the speaking was admirable, and a good collection closed the proceedings. From the report read by Rev. T. Jeffreys, one of the secretaries, it appeared that the attention of the committee had been principally directed to the subject of polygamy and the purchase of women in exchange for cattle, as practised by Kafirs of this colony. Resolutions were submitted on the Sabbath and its observance in this colony; on the inspiration of the Pentateuch, as called in question by Dr. Colenso; and on the state of the law in relation to Kafir marriages, affecting missionary labour and influence. The case at present is this: The resident magistrates, in adjudicating on disputed property and claims, regard marriages as valid only when performed after Kafir fashion—that is, when so many head of cattle are given in exchange for the bride. In other words, when the intended wife is bought and sold like the beasts of the field. The marriage of a convert to Christianity, when effected without this barter, and without any degrading association with polygamy, is treated by the Colonial Government as invalid, and as, in fact, no marriage at all! This is justly regarded as an injustice to Kafir converts, as giving a kind of patronage to heathenism, and as shutting the door in the face of the Kafir who wishes to effect his escape from barbarism. The following is a copy of the resolution unanimously adopted on this subject at the meeting of the Alliance just held:—

This meeting, deploring the prevalence of witchcraft, trafficking in women, and polygamy among the heathen population of this colony, the tyrannical and injurious nature of their customs in these respects, and the serious difficulties with which the missionaries have to contend through the anomalous administration of law among their native converts, resolves to appoint a committee to co-operate with the missionaries in procuring information, and in devising and carrying out means for the removal of these difficulties, the abolition of these abominable customs, and the elevation of such natives as may desire it, into the full enjoyment of British liberty and British law.

JAMES DAVIS, Secretary.

HERMANN SCHMETTAU, Foreign Secretary.

Biblical and Cosmical, must be as harmonious in their import as they are identical in their Divine original. The servants in the two houses may not be acquainted with each other, or there may be a foolish feud between them. The gilly in the red tartan may draw his dagger when he sees the gilly in the green; or, when red tartan's master calls at the town residence of his green neighbour, ignorant of the plain pedestrian's rank, the powdered footman may deny his master to the prince, "His grace is not at home," and be very much surprised to see the duke and his homely visitor next morning in the park walking arm in arm. So true science and true religion are lieges of one King; and whatsoever may be the airs of their pages and lackeys—even although there may be an occasional fight between the footmen—there is no risk of any misunderstanding or mutual aggression on the part of the exalted neighbours themselves.

And there are some things which Israel does not need to do. Happily, the Protestant Churches are already provided with excellent standards. Whatsoever may be the debates as to minor details, the Heidelberg Catechism, the Thirty-nine Articles, the Westminster Confession, all contain a rich store of scriptural truth, and as mutual explanations of our views, may well be held fast till that happy day come when all subordinate standards shall again be merged in the Bible. Nor is there any lack of first-rate defences of the Christian faith, both in its foundations and superstructure. With the progress of research and scholarship, it is conceivable that fresh light may be thrown on the language and allusions of Scripture; consequently, that some passages may be better understood or less controverted; but it is hardly possible to desire more satisfactory expositions, or more conclusive vindications of the faith once delivered to the saints, than those which theology has already accumulated in its enormous arsenal.

Christendom requires no addition to its creed, and for that creed there is required no firmer foundation. But Christianity is something more than a territory which needs to be enclosed and defended. It is a soil which will repay cultivation, and the full resources of which remain still to be developed. It is something more than a palladium—a gift of love on the one hand, a test of loyalty on the other, which deserves to be sacredly guarded. It is a pearl of great price, which, after enriching a million-fold the individual possessor, is capable of adding indefinitely to the wealth of the world. Christianity needs to be more heartily enjoyed and more thoroughly exemplified by the disciples of Christ. It needs to be more fervently set forth and more eagerly diffused.

In Christianity the first and foremost object is the Lord Jesus himself, and for intellectual conviction, for religious establishment, as well as spiritual enjoyment, it is to the Lord Jesus that men must be brought. "God, who spake to the fathers by the prophets, in this latter age hath spoken to us by his Son;" and if, obedient to the voice from glory, we listen to the Saviour, we shall find Christ His own evidence. We shall find Him the great exponent of the Father's mind, as well as the one direct and assuring introduction to the Father's presence; and whilst we can have no heaven here except that which He brings with Him, we can expect or desire no heaven hereafter except that to which He is to take us.

But do we, who are ministers and missionaries, always begin with Christ? Are we not too prone to put forward the system first, and then the Saviour? In other words, are we not apt to try and bring men first to the "faith," and then to its "Author and Finisher"—first to Christianity, and then to Christ? A man comes to us in doubt and perplexity. He wishes to believe the Gospel, but he is haunted by fantastic fears and sceptical difficulties, and you advise him to take his passage with Captain Butler or Paley in one of the regular packet-boats which ply between the dim shores of Unbelief and the better land of Revelation. But unfortunately few of these ships sail right into the harbour. The Analogy, the Horæ, the Short and Easy Method, all anchor off-shore, and land their passengers on a flat, muddy beach, from which it is a toilsome struggle up to terra firma. The shortest, easiest method is to begin with Christ himself. The evangelist Luke or John is assuredly as readable as any book of evidence, and much more interesting; and if, after looking at Christ as there set forth, and listening to His words, a man still doubts His objective reality and Divine authority and mission, it may be questioned whether any demonstration would dissipate his misgivings and deposit him in a firm and final faith.

It was from the background of Sinai and the Temple that a Jew came down on Bethlehem, and it was through Moses and the prophets that he was introduced to Jesus. But towards Christendom—towards these Gospel ages, Christ himself faces, a Sun of Righteousness, full-orbed and actually arisen, and it is looking to Him that, in light of His own radiating, we see Him and are saved. It is looking to Him that we get comfort to our troubled conscience, and an object for our craving affections; and it is with light borrowed from Him that we can most advantageously travel back to Moses and the Psalmists, and study the law and the lofty theism which came before Jesus Christ.

The divinity, the atonement, the intercession of Jesus Christ, are truths for all times, and alas for the time which lets them go, or which holds them with a feeble grasp! It may be questioned, however, if the peculiar life to which these truths are the introduction—that high and holy life of which Christ is the model, and of which the Holy Spirit is the source, is sufficiently dwelt upon in the ministrations of the pulpit; and whether there is effort enough to attain it in the case of individual believers. Christianity is a high calling, and if we might name any paramount object for ministerial ambition in the present day, it would be such a setting forth of Christian character, and such an enforcement of New Testament ethics as might, with God's blessing, reappear in eminent piety—in a religion at once lowly and kindly, unselfish and upright, yet considerate and tender-hearted, wise in its ardour, and cheerful in its obedience, true to the Bible, true to the brethren, true to the Master, true to itself, and however attached to its immediate communion, not hostile to others, and growing daily fitted for the highest of all.

A religion like that would tell on the times, and whatsoever incidental influences it might accept, it still would hold its own. A living epistle of the Divine omnipresence, in the conscientiousness with which it fulfilled each duty, it would plainly say, "Thou, God, seest me," and "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ." A living epistle of beneficence, in the cheerfulness with which it ministered relief, it would as plainly repeat, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." And a living epistle of Christ, it would seek to perpetuate the beneficent career of the Master, and in symmetrical progress and perpetual aspiration alike would be echoing evermore, "Be ye perfect, as your Father in Heaven is perfect." TEN YEARS OF INDIAN MISSIONS.

THE expression has become proverbial, "Dry as statistics;" and yet, in many cases, all that is necessary to invest them with even fascinating interest, is to translate them into the language of ordinary life. It is known to many of our readers that, in 1852, and again, ten years later, in 1862, the Rev. Joseph Mullens, D.D., of Calcutta, at a vast expenditure of time and energy, made a formal census of all the Protestant missions in India. The result was given to the world in a small statistical pamphlet, and in a volume in which the relative positions of Indian missions in 1852 and in 1862 were elaborately discussed.* His most important table of figures was laid before the readers of Evangelical Christendom in 1863, and may be found at page 182 of that year's volume. But the subject is one of far too enduring interest to be thus summarily dismissed; and we the more readily recur to it that the tables, being statistical, have as yet excited comparatively little attention, and are not likely to exert proper effect till their force be examined and pointed out.

When one is first informed that two censuses of Indian missions have been taken, with an interval between them of ten years, the question that instinctively rises to his lips is, What has been the increase during that period in the native Christian community? Including men, women, and children, how many were within the Christian fold in 1852? and how many ten years subsequently? To this our author replies that the native Protestants of India and Ceylon were—

112,491;		153,816.

But, besides these, there were, at the latter period, 59,366 converts connected with the Burmese missions. In 1852 the native Christians of Burmah were most of them beyond the limits of the Anglo-Indian dominion, but by 1862 the frontier had been so pushed forward as to include them within the limits of the empire. Adding them to the number previously stated, the aggregate becomes 213,182. In other words, there were in our Eastern empire in 1862, 213,182 native Protestant Christians—more than the whole population of Leeds or of Sheffield, and about equal to that of Edinburgh and Leith united.

Next, as to the rate of increase within the ten years specified. To ascertain it with accuracy, for the purpose of subsequently reasoning on it, it is necessary to omit again the Burmese converts, and limit the view to India and Ceylon. Between 1852 and 1862, as has been already mentioned, the native Protestant Christians of the two countries now indicated had increased from 112,491 to 153,816. Much may be made of these numbers. If you will allow an ordnance surveyor carefully to measure on the ground the distance between two fixed points, to obtain what he calls a base of operations, then, by using, at either end of the line, the instruments in his possession, he will cover the country with a network of imaginary triangles, and finally map it out in every part. And if you will give even the humblest arithmetician a couple of numbers, standing to each other in the ratio or proportion which the two noted above hold, and inform him that they represent the population of a community at two dates, separated by an interval of ten years, then he will find no difficulty in reading you the future history of that people, statistically considered; of course, however, on the hypothesis that the ratio does not change. Let us perform the calculation, simplifying it by discarding all but round numbers, and therefore resting contented with a merely approximate result:—

NUMBER OF NATIVE PROTESTANT CHRISTIANS.

Date.			Date.
1852	in round numbers	110,000	1912	in round numbers	710,000
1862	" "	150,000	1922	" "	970,000
1872	" "	205,000	1932	" "	1,320,000
1882	" "	280,000	1942	" "	1,800,000

or considerably more than the present population of London or of Scotland. But here no note is taken of the undoubted fact that the ratio or rate of increase tends to alter for the better every year, and if only the Churches maintain the missions at their present level, and the English Government retain its power in India so as to be able to hold the balance as now between contending religions—if, moreover, prayer be made to Him whose province it is to grant the blessing—the numbers now given will, we doubt not, fall incalculably short of those which the future history of the Indian Churches will unfold. But, however this may be, let us not despise the results already attained. Not many supporters of missions know that the native Churches in India and Burmah amount to so many as 213,182. Let our readers treasure up this number in their memories, and when some irreligious officer comes from the East with the stereotyped phrase upon his lips, “I have been thirty years in India, and never saw a native Christian,” then let them reply with promptitude, “There are upwards of 200,000 native Protestant Christians in India and Burmah !” Thus they will do no slight service to the cause of truth.

Still, let them expect the rejoinder from the opponent of missions, “I mean, I never saw a sincere native Christian in India. I fear they are all hypocrites.” To this second form of the objection, statistics (dry as they are deemed) furnish the most satisfactory answer. During the fearful year 1857, about 2,000 native Christians were involved in the perils of the mutinies, a few even losing their lives on account of their religious profession. Of the whole 2,000, only six apostatised, and even these returned when the trouble ceased. If this be no proof of sincerity, pray how is sincerity to be proved? Let the fact now stated be treasured up in the mind, along with that formerly mentioned, for future use.

Another inquiry frequently made by those interested in the evangelization of the heathen world is, “What effect have the mutinies had on the missions in India?” To this the answer must be that, in the wonderful and adorable providence of God, they have in large measure been overruled to exert a beneficial effect. As is well known, the atrocities of 1857 made the Churches at home eager to send out new missionaries, to enlighten those whose moral darkness had astonished the world. We learn from Dr. Mullens that, “during the decade, more than 350 new missionaries were sent to India by the Churches of Europe and America,” a large number of them subsequently to the mutinies. But let it not hence be rashly inferred that there are 350 more missionaries in India now than there were in 1852. To suppose so were a very grave error. So many missionaries have died, or been compelled by old age, or by the sickness of themselves or their wives, to retire from the field during the ten years, that the addition of 350 and upwards only brought the original 395 up to 519—that is, added no more than 124. This is somewhat discouraging; but yet it is in a great measure unavoidable; and the lesson it teaches is (as Dr. Mullens words it), “that in order to maintain any mission at its present strength, half the number of its missionaries must be sent out in the course of every decade. . . . Any mission containing forty men must send out twenty in ten years; if it send out less, it will fall away.” Still, notwithstanding this heavy drawback, it may be alleged that the mournful events so often alluded to have increased the number of foreign missionaries in no slight degree. Yet a larger advance has taken place among the native agents of the missions, and a still more gratifying one in the number of stations occupied.

The mutinies have benefited missions yet in other ways. The assumption by Her Majesty of the undivided responsibility for the good government of India has stirred up throughout the empire a deep feeling of interest with regard to the East, and greatly quickened the progress of reforms there, though it did not initiate them, as is sometimes alleged—they were really commenced several years before. The loyalty of the native Christians, in the day of universal defection, has wonderfully told, both on the Government and on the Anglo-Indian community of their country; and their rights have been accorded to them with a cheerfulness to which there was nothing similar in former years. The vindication of the title of the Ahmednuggur Christians to use the public wells might have been achieved even prior to the recent change of government; but the firing on the Tinnevely mob, who insolently forbade Christian funerals to proceed along the ordinary roads, stoned the magistrate, and assaulted the military on duty for the preservation of order, was a stern defence of religious liberty which probably never would have taken place but for 1857.

Perhaps the most gratifying circumstance of all is the effect in many places produced on the native Christians themselves by the perils of the mutinies. We have already resolutely asserted, on the best of evidence, that, as a body, they are sincere; but must now sorrowfully add that in many respects they are imperfect. Thus, Dr. Mullens shows that in certain missions in which discipline is known to be administered faithfully, yet in love, of 4,289 converts admitted to baptism, and of course to the communion, no fewer than 998, or nearly one in four, had to be excluded again, though the large majority of the lapsed subsequently became penitent. Is it to be wondered that, in these circumstances, European missionaries should have watched over native Christians with a constant and fearful anxiety that they might fall, and prior to the mutinies should have left them too little to their own responsibility? During that frightful year, however, the native Churches were in many places scattered, each member being cast on his own resources, generally without counsel of any kind. The result was not disastrous, as even missionaries beforehand would have apprehended, but the reverse. "They who were thrown headlong into the troubled waters, and had to swim for their lives, without the aid of the corks and bladders on which they had relied, gained health and vigour in the process, and landed not only alive, but men. The old system has been flung away for ever. When, on the restoration of order, the presses and factories were reopened, they were not taken up as mission property." "The native Christians started as proprietors and managers, and took the work entirely into their own hands." Of course, the mutinies and attendant rebellion involved but a fractional proportion of the native Churches in the severest kind of trials; still, the benefit of their experience was available for all; and a much greater desire exists than ever before to give native pastors an independent sphere of their own, and serious personal responsibility. No policy could be wiser; and the next step has been taken in some places, though we regret to find not yet even in all the wealthier native Churches—that of requesting native contributions for the support of the pastor whom the Church members have chosen from among themselves, and for the propagation of the Gospel in the regions beyond. Another advance in the right direction which has been successfully made is the establishment of fees in some of the great educational institutions, and a triumph yet more remarkable—the possibility of which not even the most sanguine would have dared a few years back to predict—the exaction of a small fee from the girls in some of the Madras Free Church Schools. Our space is exhausted without our having been able to present one tithe of the interesting facts to be found within Dr. Mullens's pamphlet and volume, which should be in the hands of every one interested—(as what Christian is not)—in the great work of India's evangelization. It is matter for devout thankfulness that the result of Dr. Mullens's elaborate investigation is, on the whole, so favourable. Let Christians thank God and take courage. It is now seen that He never for a moment deserted His Church during the recent fearful darkness and peril. And assuredly He will not do so now, when the night, with its alarms, is over, and the day has dawned a cheerful day, with light shed down from Heaven.

error, together with the deadly blows it has inflicted upon open opposition to Evangelical truth, are incalculable. Never attaching undue importance to subordinate questions, thoroughly unspeculative, going at once to the point, and that point God's love to us in Christ, producing in us, through faith and by the Holy Spirit's agency, love to God and to man, he embraced all who loved the Saviour, whatever their denomination. A man of principle, and never of expediency, in all important cases it could be foreseen how he would act. He had in him somewhat of Luther's boldness and roughness, and much of his cordiality and joyous nature, which won the esteem and love of all who approached him.

Shortly after having had the intense joy of ordaining his eldest son Jean (now pastor at Nîmes) in the Church of the Oratoire, Frederic Monod was called upon to take the most painfully conscientious step of his life.

He loved the Reformed Church of France for the fathers' sake. He had seen its deadness gradually warming up into life, during the twenty-eight years of his ministry in the Church of Paris; the revival of religion in various parts of France, through foreign as well as native agency, often by independent bodies, had acted and reacted upon it, and many of its members were feeling shackled by the anomalous position of a Church legally governed by "the highest Protestant taxpayers to the Government." The organization imposed upon the Protestant Church in "the Year X.," and accepted as a boon at the time, was increasingly felt, by all who sought life within her pale, to be an obstacle to her growth and a dead weight on her spiritual progress. The Revolution of 1848, and the consequent freedom for meeting and association, gave the opportunity long wished for, to hold a General Assembly of delegates, duly elected by all the Reformed Churches throughout France.

Frederic Monod raised his warning voice against losing time in the discussion of questions of subordinate importance, such as the self-government of the Church, which "does not bring in perfection, however desirable he might think it;" and against all expediency which might shuffle principle out of sight. Time was come for the National Church of France to draw up her Confession of Faith, and to stand upon a spiritual foundation. He was requested to preach the opening sermon. It was a faithful exposition of what the Church of our fathers had been; strong and faithful unto death, standing on the grand Gospel doctrines drawn up in the Confession of La Rochelle. He showed the snare into which she had fallen, by accepting from Bonaparte, as a boon, the chains that fettered her to the world, depriving her of her synods, and governing her by men who afforded no spiritual guarantee of fidelity to their trust. And he called upon the delegates to acknowledge, with the ancient synods (the last of which was held in 1763), that Christian doctrine is the only foundation of Church discipline and order; and to lay down in a solid manner the only foundation, Jesus Christ and Him crucified, confessing Him boldly as God manifest in the flesh, the end of the law for righteousness to all who believe, delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification; and to build upon this corner-stone the superstructure of ecclesiastical discipline.

The Assembly, which contained many Rationalists, voted the statu quo, accepting voluntarily a situation which had been forced upon the Church, and which, until that moment, she had not been free by her own will to preserve or reject. It also declined, for the time being, to adopt any Confession of Faith; contenting itself with simply issuing an address to the Churches, worded with the greatest caution, and signed, after a lengthened discussion, by both parties, each knowingly giving its own, and often opposite, interpretation to the texts quoted.

It was not to be expected that the frank and intensely straightforward and logical nature of Frederic Monod would brook these concessions to the spirit of the words were uttered by Pastors Guillaume Monod, Pulsford, Valette, Duchemin, and T. Monod. Then followed the singing of Dr. Malan's well-known verse, "Notre sepulcre enfin connaitra sa victoire!" the blessing was pronounced, and the last sad offices of the devout men who carried Frederic Monod to his burial were ended.

CALVIN AND CALVINISM.

EARLY YEARS.

JOHN CALVIN was born at Noyon, in Picardy, on the 10th of July, 1509. The particulars known to us respecting his childhood and early youth are few, but suffice to enable us to recognise the man Calvin in the boy. Both his parents seem to have been of superior character and capacity. His mother, Jane Lefranc, a native of Cambray, is said to have been personally beautiful, and of a profoundly religious temper. His father, Gerard Calvin, was a man of judgment and sagacity, regarded with affectionate esteem by the better classes of his townsmen. One can perceive, from the few glimpses we have of him in history, that he ruled his household well, that he was a considerate and judicious father, and that he had penetration to discern, while his son John was still almost a child, that his talents were of the highest order. By profession, Gerard Calvin was Procureur-Fiscal of Noyon, and Secretary of the Diocese, holding thus by one hand on the Church, and by the other on law, and giving satisfaction in both capacities.

From his mother Calvin may have inherited that seriousness of nature which from the first characterised him, combined with a virgin purity of soul which shrank with loathing from all forms of profligacy; from his father he seems to have derived his intellectual bent, his administrative faculty, his strong will, and his clear, cool, steady brain.

He was one of six children, but no other member of the family attained distinction. In his early boyhood he was the object of special patronage by the family of Mommor, people of rank in the vicinity of Noyon, and pursued his early studies along with the children of that house. Even at this age he was grave and thoughtful, apt to check any moral delinquency in his fellows, and caring little for the ordinary sports of boyhood. His connexion with the Church commenced early, a chaplaincy in the Cathedral of Noyon being obtained for him by his father when he was but twelve years old. The office was, of course, nominal in all respects save that of entitling the boy chaplain to certain emoluments which could be applied to his education. It was the wish and hope of his father that he should attain high office in the Romish Church.

In his fourteenth year, Calvin proceeded to Paris, and entered the College de la Marche. According to his own statement, he was "still a child, and possessing only a few rudiments of the Latin language." He joined the fourth class, then taught by Mathurin Cordier. This eminent Latinist was remarkable for his zeal, tact, energy and elevation of aim, as a teacher. "Mathurin," says D'Aubigné, "was one of the men of ancient mould, who always prefer the public good to their own interests and glory; and, accordingly, neglecting the brilliant career which lay before him, devoted his whole life to the education of children. Prior to Calvin's arrival Paris, he had the head class in the college, and taught it with credit; but he was satisfied; he would often pause in the middle of his lessons, finding that his pupils possessed a mere superficial knowledge of what they should have known thorough Teaching, instead of yielding him the pleasure for which he thirsted, caused him sorrow and disgust. 'Alas!' he said, 'the other masters teach the children ambition and vainglory, and that is why they are not well-grounded in their stu disciple of his scholar, and in his turn thanked him, but it was for a Divine teaching of inestimable value."

Being designed for the priesthood, Calvin was removed, in 1526, from the college of La Marche, and entered the theological seminary of the Montaigu, also in Paris. Young as he was, there were eyes already upon him, and Beza mentions in particular a Spanish professor who took notice of the quiet, earnest, intelligent lad. This Spaniard appears to have been a remarkable man; stately, grave, and calm as Spaniards generally are, and with that patient and powerful genius which characterised many of his countrymen of that age. This kind of man naturally attracted Calvin, and an intimate acquaintance sprang up between the two. The Spaniard pronounced Calvin a young man of the most penetrating genius, and saw in him a future ornament of the Church. This hope was encouraged by Calvin's scrupulous attention to religious duties, unexceptionable morals, and devout submission to his ecclesiastical superiors. His fellow students were often taken to task by him for laxity of conduct, and he is said to have borne at this time, or still earlier, the nickname of "the Accusative." It is beyond all doubt that he never fell into the vices in which young men frequently indulge, and in his case, as in that of Milton, the theory that force of character and steadfastness of morals can be attained only after a process of wild-oat sowing, a period of revelry and dissipation, receives signal refutation.

Meanwhile, he expatiated with ardent delight in the fields of classical and philosophical knowledge. He studied the poets and orators of antiquity, and mastered the literary treasures of the scholastic ages. It was doubtless at this time that he laid the foundation of that mastery of language which was in subsequent years not the least wonderful of his accomplishments, and amassed those stores of learned illustration which are never exhausted in his works. He was passionately addicted to study; the soul, imperiously and insatiably demanding her peculiar aliment, refused the body sufficient time for food or sleep; and late wayfarers near the house in which he lived saw his solitary lamp twinkling beneath the stars when all other lights were extinguished. In every department of learning he distanced his companions.

It were impossible to exaggerate the advantage derived by the future Reformer from these studies. They imparted a magnificent amplitude to his range of thought and sympathy, enabling him, as a man of consummate culture, to appreciate what had been done in all fields of speculation before his own day, and to entertain an intelligent conviction that no solid acquisition of truth made by the species was excluded from his own system. Had Calvin been a student of Scripture only, he might have discovered in the Bible that scheme of theological truth which it was the grand work of his life to elaborate; but objectors could always have maintained that his lack of acquaintance with the works of those great thinkers who, before his time, had grappled with the problems of human life and human destiny, who had discoursed of God, freedom, immortality, rendered him incapable of comparing the Bible's solution of the riddle of the world with those which had been given by philosophers and sages. "Calvinism," they might have said, "is the stunted growth of a barren soil; Calvin's flaming zeal, and dogmatic insistence upon scriptural texts, were the exhibitions of an ignorant fanaticism." It is well, therefore, to know that Calvin was one of the most accomplished men of his age; that his familiarity with the classic authors is beyond question; and that, if there were any insoluble difficulties left in his scheme of theology, he must have known that they were left unanswered in other systems. Calvin's unreserved acceptance of the statement made in the Bible of man's duty and destiny—his submission of will to be directed, of conscience to be enlightened, of reason to be led, to the Word of God—did not arise from a contempt of the human intellect, or a blind persuasion that no glimpses of truth had ever reached the world except those which we have in the Old and New Testaments. He wrote of what we may call extra-Biblical truth with a frankness of acknowledgment, and a cordiality of sympathy, which might have caused his aspersion by some of our modern Dominics; but this frank acknowledgment, this cordial sympathy, only enabled him the more intelligently and convincingly to demand that the Bible should be placed in a seat of honour elevated immeasurably above that occupied by any human composition. "Since God alone," wrote Calvin to Bucer, in terms which, like much in his writings, have quite a modern, nineteenth century ring, and are as instructive now as three hundred years ago—"Since God alone is the source of all good, you must not doubt, that whatever truth you anywhere meet with, proceeds from Him, unless you would be doubly ungrateful to Him; it is in this way you have received the Word descended from Heaven. For it is sinful to treat God's gifts with contempt; and to ascribe to man what is peculiarly God's is a still greater impiety. Philosophy is, consequently, the noble gift of God, and those learned men who have striven hard after it in all ages have been incited thereto by God himself, that they might enlighten the world in the knowledge of the truth. But there is a wide difference between the writings of these men and those truths which God, of His own pleasure, delivered to guilty men for their sanctification. In the former, you may fall in with a small particle of truth, of which you can get only a taste, sufficient to make you feel how pleasant and sweet it is; but in the latter, you may obtain in rich abundance that which can refresh the soul to the full. In the one, a shadow and an image is placed before the eyes, which can only excite in you a love of the object, without admitting you to familiar intercourse with it; in the other, the solid substance stands before you, with which you may not only become intimately acquainted, but may also, in some measure, handle it. In that, the seed is in a manner choked; in this, you may possess the fruit in its very maturity. There, in short, only a few small sparks break forth, which so point out a path that they fail in the middle of the journey—or rather, which fail in indicating the path at all—and can only restrain the traveller from going farther astray; but here the Spirit of God, like a most brilliant torch, or rather like the sun itself, shines in full splendour, not only to guide the course of your life, even to its final goal, but also to conduct you to a blessed immortality. Draw then from this source, wherever you may wander; and as soon as He finds you a settled abode, you ought to make that your place of rest."

In these noble words, replete with poetry as with thought, brilliant in changing imagery no less than comprehensive in truth, may we not discern an epitome of Calvin's spiritual history? He had looked into the abodes of philosophy, not listlessly, not contemptuously, but with glowing admiration. In these, however, was not his rest. He had passed on; he had entered the everlasting portals of God's Word; and there he had remained. Nor is it a lawless flight of imagination by which we connect this intelligent appreciation of philosophy by Calvin, while bidding it farewell for the higher truth of God's Word, with an incident in the history of St. Paul, to whom, in respect of intellectual structure, Calvin probably came nearer than any man since the apostolic age. In St. Paul, as he stands on Mars Hill, the wise men of Greece around him, the city of Athens at his feet, we behold the realisation of this great fact in the history of the world—that the Divine faith, the true religion, had not annihilated philosophy, but absorbed and irradiated it in the light of a higher truth. Fair, in the eyes of Paul, had been that structure of Grecian philosophy. Reared, as of Parian marble, in the serene domain of thought; noble in its proportions, rich in its adornment, imposing in its general effect—

Paul could have been content to wander his life long in its spacious halls. But there had risen into his view another temple, its proportions still more lordly, its mansions still more capacious, its beauty still more majestic and more pure; a temple on whose stones no human chisel had passed, whose pillars had been reared by no human hand, but fitted to contain all the families of the earth, and filled in every chamber with the very light of Heaven. Into this temple went Paul, the temple of Divine Revelation, and there he abode. He did not despise philosophy; he did not bid the men of Athens despise or desert philosophy; he did not tell them that any good and perfect gift they had been enjoying could have reached them from any other source except the Father of lights; but he proclaimed to them that, in the Christian temple, they would find all the truth they had learned in the halls of philosophy, and a great deal more, only they would trace that and all other blessings, not to an unknown God, but to a God known and loved.

Such was the boyhood of Calvin. On the whole, we should pronounce him the unlikeliest person in the world to be acted on by any sudden, lawless, or revolutionary impulse. His nature was supremely intellectual; to expatiate in the realms of thought was his great joy. Manifestly, also, his was one of those natures which find satisfaction in acquiescence in established modes of faith and practice. In novelty, in specious pretence, in departure from the beaten paths, he took no pleasure. The pupil of Cordier, the favourite of the grave Spanish professor, was no flighty youth who would remove the ancient landmarks from mere love of change. Profound thoughtfulness, perfect control over every impulse of the animal nature, devout performance of prescribed duty, affectionate recognition of superior merit, and a keen, at times, it may be, an acrid, impatience of stupidity, arrogance, and injustice, were his characteristics. We said that the mind of Calvin had a structural affinity with that of Plato; in his studious boyhood and youth we cannot help tracing a resemblance to the school and college life of Milton. There was the same high intellectual cast of mind in each, the same scrupulous purity of morals, the same unimpassioned loftiness of character, suited rather for friendship than for love, defective in the wayward graces, the frolic buoyancy, the sweet negligence and naturalness, of youth, almost prematurely earnest and wise. Milton, "the lady of his college," a musician, or at least a lover of music from his infancy, had a more melodious nature, a deeper and more enthralling sense of the Beautiful, than Calvin. He was earnest, but his was the earnestness of the poet rather than the prophet, and, though his faculties could have made him successful in any department, he was comparatively weak on the side of logic. Calvin, though he had a powerful imagination, and though his style is constantly marked by that metaphoric brilliancy which is allied with genius, was not so finely responsive as Milton to the influences of the Beautiful; but his earnestness was more profound, and his logical faculty was probably as powerful as was ever possessed by a human being. In calmness and steadiness of mind, in superiority to agitation, in soundness of judgment, the palm must be allowed to belong to the Reformer. Studious, modest, and devout, rejoicing in obedience to all constituted authorities, his highest ideal of enjoyment a life of letters, the pale and silent youth, John Calvin, could have been discerned by no human eye to be one of those mighty and terrible men, whom the Almighty raises up in the critical ages of world-history, to pull down principalities and powers, and change the current of human civilisation.

In our next paper we shall consider that change in John Calvin by which he was fitted to effect those other changes to which he devoted his life. We mean his conversion.

cendancy. But this foolish and dangerous notion is not shared by the French people, and Napoleon III. must at length understand that, by continuing to yield to the suggestions of the Romish clergy, he would dig an abyss beneath his very throne.

It is most curious and instructive to consider, in this point of view, the proceedings of the Emperor. When France was united in the Crimea to Protestant England, the issue of the enterprise tended to advance our national power. When the Emperor associated himself with the Liberal party in the campaign in Italy, the results were satisfactory. In China, even, where the French again were identified with the English, the expedition succeeded, at least partially. But when Napoleon III., instead of acting in concert with the Protestants or the Liberals, has endeavoured to support the pretensions of Roman Catholicism, he has encountered almost insurmountable obstacles, and his sole desire is to relinquish, so soon as honour will allow, these unfortunate expeditions. What a warning! What an instructive lesson! It is the repetition of what has been taking place in France for the last three hundred years. France has always lost somewhat of her strength when she has taken in hand to satisfy the exigencies of the Papacy, and she has always gained, to some extent, by an alliance with Protestant States. This uniform testimony of history, both past and contemporaneous, must open the eyes of the most ignorant.

PASTORAL OF THE BISHOP OF MONTAUBAN AGAINST THE LIBERAL CATHOLICS.

I have several times spoken to your readers of the controversy which exists, in the present day, between the old Roman Catholics and those who may be called the Liberal, or neo-Catholics. This quarrel is far from being ended. On the contrary, it daily assumes larger proportions; and this must not surprise us; for, if we penetrate to the bottom of the question, we shall see that the entire Papal system is involved in it.

M. Doney, Bishop of Montauban—a prelate whose convictions are very sincere, but whose mind is narrow and bigoted—has recently published a long pastoral letter, in which he rudely attacks the Count de Montalembert, and all who endeavour to reconcile the Papacy with modern ideas. This bishop, who is honoured by Pius IX. with his particular esteem, absolutely rejects all such projects of conciliation. He sees in them a sign of diminished attachment, and almost of treason, towards the Holy See. His arguments are not worth the trouble of refutation; but it is well to give an outline of them, as a specimen of the maxims which are still maintained by a considerable portion of the Romish episcopate. Here is the substance of them:—

1. The Roman Catholic Church possesses a permanent supernatural principle. It is inspired by God, and consequently infallible.

2. In virtue of this constant Divine inspiration, all that the Roman Catholic Church teaches is true, and all that it ordains is good. To resist its doctrines and its precepts is to revolt against God himself.

3. This Church must possess and practice absolute liberty. No human authority has the right to impose any limits upon it; for man, prince, and people, must bend before the sovereignty of God, of which the Pope is the representative and interpreter here below.

4. As to heretics and schismatics, they have no right to be free, for that would be the freedom of error and evil. They can only be tolerated in certain cases and certain countries; but it is a deplorable necessity to which the Roman Catholic Church submits without approving of it.

5. Liberty of the press and liberty of discussion are bad, except under exceptional circumstances. The Roman Catholic Church affirms its dogmas, and does not subject them at all to discussions, in which reason and science are brought into play: this is the only correct method.

6. The people are children. They must be governed by authority, as a father governs the younger members of his family.

7. If, in a Romish country, a heretic or an infidel dares to dispute the teaching of the Pope and the clergy, he must be punished as a malefactor. He is even more culpable than a robber or a coiner of bad money, since he falsifies eternal truth, by which souls are saved.

8. This chastisement is salutary to the heretic or the infidel; for he is compelled to retire within himself; and by examining his conscience, he will be led to return to the right path. The Roman Catholic Church is a tender mother: she wounds that she may heal!

Such are the incredible propositions which are still put forth and maintained, in the nineteenth century, by eminent dignitaries of the Papal communion. They are the theories of the Inquisition and of Thomas Aquinas, brought out, with imperturbable assurance, to the light of day.

The Bishop of Montauban invokes, in which it contains of the position of the inferior clergy, as they are called. This work has evidently been written by some priest, who has withheld his name, or at least the materials have been obtained from such a person. It reveals the painful condition of the country clergy, who, being subjected to the absolute power of the bishops, and compelled to live upon good terms with the Jesuits, are deprived of all freedom of action and personal independence. If they display the least signs of resistance or liberalism, they are liable to be accused, oppressed, driven from place to place, and so reduced as to die of starvation; and they cannot have recourse to any human protection, for, except in very rare and serious cases, the Government never interferes in disputes between bishops and their subordinates. Can such a state of things, so contrary to the first principles of personal self-respect, human rights, and public justice, continue to last? The publication of the "Cursed One" is a symptom of the discontent of the inferior clergy, and in that point of view the book is of importance.

DEATH OF PASTOR FREDERIC MONOD.

You will have learned, from our religious journals, that Pastor Frederic Monod has been called from the land of the living. His decease had been expected for some months past; but his loss has not the less excited profound and universal regret. Our pastoral body will find it difficult to supply the great void which has been created by our friend's removal.

M. Frederic Monod affords a striking example of the influence which may be exercised by a man possessing firm convictions and a decided character, and who follows the Gospel path with unswerving fidelity. He had not the oratorical talents of his brother, Adolphe Monod. As a divine, he never fathomed the depths of theological science. As a writer, he never showed any remarkable talent. And yet, during forty years, he did an incalculable amount of good, first in his own family, and then in the Protestant Churches. Why?

Because he was a man of piety—a man of principle—a man of action—always ready to deny himself in order to serve the great interests of his Divine Master.*

INTESTINE DISCORDS IN THE PROTESTANT BIBLE SOCIETY.

The internal condition of French Protestantism is becoming more and more critical. The Orthodox and the Liberals, or Rationalists, are so opposed to each other, that their antagonism breaks out afresh upon every subject, and reappears at every step. For the moment, the quarrel turns upon the Bible Society. The followers of the negative school have a majority in the Paris committee. After having deferred for some time the execution of their plans, they have just decided that the Bible Society shall circulate different versions of the Scriptures, and they have even announced a new translation which shall be undertaken by unknown pens. Will these proceedings be allowed? Is the Bible to be abandoned to the attempts of the first comers? And are our flocks to be in peril of receiving from the hands of members of Bible Societies unfaithful or mutilated versions? The orthodox have grave duties to fulfil in relation to this matter, and they will not fail to adopt the right course.

YOUNG TAHITIANS IN FRANCE.

A son of Queen Pomare and four other young men from Tahiti have been sent to France, in order to study the languages and arts of civilisation. No doubt could exist as to the religious communion to which these young Tahitians belong. Like their parents, they are Protestants. Nevertheless, the priests, in an encroaching and tyrannical spirit, put their hands upon these young people, and succeeded in shutting them up in an ecclesiastical establishment, where it was intended to educate them as Romanists. But Pastor Grandpierre, to whom they had been recommended, made energetic remonstrances, and the French Government showed, under these circumstances, praiseworthy impartiality.

Lyons, January 7, 1864.

It will give you pleasure to hear that we have not only been able to carry on our work in peace, but that God's mercy has made an unexpected opening for us. All vexations from the Roman Catholics, to which we were at first so much exposed, are stopped. It is true our patients in the hospitals have still to

ITALY.

Florence, January 15, 1864.

THE WEATHER—THE PARIS PLOT—THE REPUBLICAN FACTION—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

Our weather is intensely cold. Nothing like it has been known for twenty years. I believe the North of Scotland is milder just now than Italy, where, for ten days past, the cold has frozen the fingers and benumbed the brain, detained the mails, killed off sentries by the dozen, and caused a vast amount of suffering among the ill-fed, lightly-clad poorer classes.

What a winter for the poor Poles, fighting for their independence! Here the sympathy for them is very strong, and breaks out in tirades against England's cold-shoulder treatment of their case. The Danish difficulty excites great attention, principally with a view of knowing whether parties will range themselves favourably or otherwise for a spring campaign here on behalf of Venice. The further attempt on Napoleon III.'s life by four Italians, and which is deplored and regretted on all hands, is of a piece with the policy of several of the extreme left party, who have withdrawn from the Italian Parliament, because an immense majority of the deputies carried a question against them touching the affairs of Sicily.

It is a fresh trial in constitutional government for Italy. She is bearing it firmly. The resignation of these red republicans, whose places are being filled with moderate and intelligent representatives, by the various constituencies, will be a great gain. The only pity is that Garibaldi has been drawn off with them, so that his name and reputation are in a fair way of being dishonoured. The great man has been so injudicious as not only to join this restless little faction, whose influence has been yearly diminishing, till it is now almost nil, but also to go into their schemes of overthrowing order and good government, for he has written a letter proposing the dismissal of Parliament, and the tenure by the King, in his own irresponsible hands, of all the authority of the realm. Such wild proposals emanate from men who have nothing to lose, and everything to gain, in a general overthrow, but who cannot any longer be regarded as lovers of their country. Meanwhile, the Government is pushing forward the construction of public works, in the form of highways, railroads, docks, and arsenals. Ex uno disce omnes. Before 1860 there were 1,647 kilometres of railway in Italy. From 1st January, 1860, to 1st January, 1863, there were added 752 kilometres; from 1st January, 1863, to 1st January, 1864, other 765; in all 3,165 kilometres now in use, and by 1st February next there will be 239 kilometres additional opened to the public. The municipalities of the country are awakening up to a new life, and showing a strong faith in the stability of the new régime, lighting their towns and villages with gas, opening up the old and narrow streets to suit an increased modern traffic, and introducing, as in Florence, the grand old English institution of policemen, to guard the interests of the burghers.

A TEMPERANCE SOCIETY INSTITUTED.

A few days ago—I regret to say on a Sabbath—the first "Società di Temperanza" (Temperance Society) was organised in Turin, on the model of similar associations in England. The inauguration took place in the Victor Emmanuel Theatre, which was crowded throughout with the working classes, and all the operative societies of the capital sent deputations with their respective banners and musical bands. Many leading citizens and philanthropic ladies gave their countenance to the meeting. The rules of the society were adopted, and a long discourse on the advantages of abstinence, and the thousand evils of intemperance, was read by Professor Luigi Chierici, who, with Signor Macchi and Baron Tecco, is the promoter of this movement, which proposes to rescue the poorer classes from habits of drunkenness, to elevate their moral tone, to convert the money spent in wine into deposits at the savings-bank, and to promote various schemes for their rational recreation and instruction. We hail this effort, begun under such high auspices, with great pleasure. Our home notions of Continental sobriety are very incorrect, owing to the absence of the drunkard from the streets of foreign towns in broad daylight. Happily, a better standard of propriety in this matter obtains on this side the English Channel, but drunkenness is a very common vice, nevertheless; the café is the great resort in the evening, and the consumption of rum, whisky, and strong drink generally, especially in Northern Italy, has of late years greatly increased.

THE KING'S SCRUPLES.

In the politico-religious department, a few more facts come out which show the obstinacy of the parties in the great and growing parish of St. Joseph, refused to baptize the child of Rear-Admiral Vacca, because Rear-Admiral and Deputy Scrugli was the godfather, stating that he had positive written instructions from Rome to prohibit any Italian senator or deputy from acting as godfather, as each and all of them were subject to the major excommunication of the Pope.

This resolute defiance of the authority of the young kingdom by the Pope, of which a thousand examples might be given, is producing a result which might have been foreseen, the withdrawal from Church and sacraments of the intelligent middle classes of society. I spent a Sabbath lately in Arezzo, a town of 13,000 inhabitants, where, as in most other places, the priests are furiously opposed to liberty, and was deeply impressed with the fact that the leading cathedral service was but poorly attended, and that only by the country people, while the great mass of well-dressed citizens were conspicuous by their absence. The sermon of the monkish preacher was unexceptionable, being an excellent moral address on the immortality of the soul; but the body of the clergy being vigorously reactionary in sentiment and conduct, the orator spoke to clownish auditors. What an opening for an Evangelical preacher! But just now there is none to send.

NEW PUBLICATIONS—EVIL INFLUENCE OF RENAN'S BOOK.

The Papal policy is giving occasion to an immense mass of writing, disagreeable enough, but which may possibly be useful to some. A new journal lies before me (Il Temporale), which, in combating the temporal power, gives us weekly a host of stories about immoral priests, entering with evident gusto into details, but proposing no Christian remedy, no scriptural Church, to heal the maladies of Church and State. An old Tuscan lawyer and schoolfellow of Pio Nono (whom he reminds of some ugly things of his youthful days at the Volterra College) has just published a popular pamphlet on the lives of the Popes, from Peter down to the present occupant of his chair, showing (after the work of Potter) the evil done to Italy and the world by the Papacy, but limiting his protest to the princely action of the Pope.

These are but samples of a flood of publications which are only fitted to disgust the people with Popery, but have no tendency to lead them inquiringly to the Saviour.

But the conduct of the priests in the matter of Renan's book is exerting a much worse effect, driving the masses into open infidelity, and violent antipathy to religion generally. Every town in the Peninsula, beginning with Rome, has had its triduum or novena of prayer and preaching. Multitudes have resorted to the churches to see and hear. In many cases the demonstration against Renan has only led to a wide circulation of his book among readers all unprepared by argument to meet his assertions. In others, as at Padua, the people have covered the walls of the town with placards announcing, "Death to the Pope! Death to the priests! Long live Renan!" because priestcraft has everywhere associated the work of Renan and the evil times of unbelief with the revolutionary movement in Italy and popular disobedience of the Pope's fatherly government. At Modena and elsewhere, the disturbances outside the churches led to the interference of the police. In not a few instances, Renanism and Protestantism have been inveighed against as twin evils, to be summarily rooted out, so that colporteurs have had a sore time of it, and evangelists have had a noble opportunity of expounding the truth. The weighty statements of Napoleon I., in St. Helena, with regard to the divinity of Christ, have been opportunely translated and largely circulated, while Mr. Appia, the Waldensian minister at Naples, has produced an unanswerable proof of the resurrection of Christ, which Renan passes by as incredible, maintaining that the history of the Saviour ended with His death. The able reply of De Pressensé, of Paris, is also in the field; but with these and other efforts, the antidote will be little known in comparison with the raging and infectious malady. The Church of Rome, by her foolish declamations against heretics—Renanist, Protestant, and liberal together—has given an extraordinary impulse to deadly unbelief in Italy. The infidel tone of many journals of late, and the reproduction of that old book of Baron d'Irbach, "The Three Impostors, Moses, Jesus, and Mohamet," are evidence sufficient of this sad truth. Our only trust is in the Word of God, so largely circulated by this time in Italy.

BIBLE READING PROMOTED BY RENAN'S WORK.

We are pleased to know of one case, we trust only one instance out of many, in which the Bible has been sought for and is being read side by side with Renan's work. It is vouched for by Dr. Revel, and is as follows: "A family in a high social position, Roman Catholic by tradition, education, and position in the world, began to read Renan's 'Life of Jesus.' The work interested does a sectarian work ; while he who, not content with establishing his own Church principles, calumniates other Churches which are also based on the true foundation, Jesus Christ, does an evil work.

"Let us, then, walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing, even Jesus Christ, and if in any other matter we be otherwise minded, God will reveal even this unto us."

I need not mention with what hearty empressment Dr. Revel received and printed in his Evangelical broadsheet these truly Christian sentiments, nor how useful they have been in checking the sale of a work which was well calculated to do immense mischief among the humble followers of Christ in Italy. On all hands the book has been denounced ; so that even the small Plymouthist circle which gave it birth must be convinced that they have overshoot the mark, and dealt their own finishing stroke. After the explicit protest of Dr. De Sanctis, it is to be hoped that his great name will no longer be quoted over Italy by these narrow-hearted, sectarian Plymouthists as a shield for their every act of bigotry, intolerance, and heterodoxy.

SCOTTISH BIBLE SOCIETY CIRCULATION.

A reply to the pamphlet of Rossetti has appeared from the pen of Professor Geymonat, under the heading, "Concerning the Work of God in Italy." It would be well to send a translation of it, with the translation of the offensive pamphlet, which will shortly be forwarded, to all the private friends and public societies in Great Britain, America, and France, interested in the evangelization of Italy. It is written in the charitable and forgiving spirit of love so characteristic of the author, but shows clearly how the Plymouthists are the very sectarians whom they so groundlessly assert others to be.

Through the kindness of Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn, I have been favoured with the statistics of sales of Bibles and religious books, during 1863, of the twenty colporteurs of the Scottish National Bible Society. Close upon 5,000 Bibles and Testaments, and nearly 50,000 religious tracts and pamphlets, have been sold by these men during last year. I am also happy to announce that the printed statement of the purchase of Palazzo Salviati here, for the Waldensian College and evangelization work, has appeared, and shows that, of the 7,000*l.* sterling which this magnificent gift of Messrs. Henderson, Burns, Macfie, Lenox, Barbour, &c., has cost, only 300*l.* remain of deficit. Proverbially the last 100*l.* is the most difficult to get in any subscription effort. I trust it will not be so in this case, but that some kind friend will at once relieve the anxiety of Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn, and enable him to announce his long-continued and disinterested labour happily concluded. The purchase of the building and the obtaining the purchase money has been as nothing to the remodelling of many parts of the building for missionary purposes, and the erection of church, schools, printing-office, &c.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

The united prayer-meetings have been held here and in other parts of Italy during the first week of January, as in former years, and we trust the blessing of the Almighty has rested on them. The six ministers of foreign and native Evangelical Churches in Florence presided on the six successive days in the Scotch Church, while pastors and laymen of various lands and tongues blended their hearts' desires at the footstool of the throne. When well arranged beforehand, there is no drawback to English and French, American and Scotch, Waldensian and Free Italian Church brethren, joining day after day in the same exercises of praise and prayer. We thank God earnestly for the Evangelical Alliance, which suggested such refreshing meetings, destined to be fruitful in excellent results in Italy. It is such a noble testimony of the real and true unity of the Church and children of God, in presence of the boasted but delusive uniformity of Popery. So highly have these reunions been relished in Genoa, that a monthly united prayer-meeting has been established, to be held alternately in the Waldensian and Dr. De Sanctis's church. Here there is a strong desire for a similar meeting, if we had only a suitable hall, on neutral ground.

PROTESTANT HOSPITALS.

Several conferences have been held lately in connexion with a proposal to supply the Florentine Evangelicals with a separate hospital. The cases of hardship and annoyance suffered by them in the wards of the National Hospital, at the hands of interfering monks and nuns, have been many and great, though latterly there has been less to complain of ; and when well-founded remonstrances have been made, the keepers who acted in concert with the offending monk or nun have been dismissed. Hope had been entertained for some time that a separate ward would be allotted to "non-Catholic patients ;" but the of the 6th Regiment of infantry stationed here. They meet in large groups for reading the Scriptures, prayer, and spiritual converse, and from sixty to eighty of them have just sent an appeal to Professor Geymonat to come and preach the Gospel regularly in their barracks. Thanks, therefore, to the warm friend of Italy who, in response to our last month's letter, has sent such a welcome donation to print soldiers' tracts, pithy and practical, leading the inquiring soul to the Saviour. Signor Pugno, lately settled at Brescia, has been appointed by the Waldenses as a travelling evangelist in Piedmont. He is a man of simple piety and of sound sense, and well fitted for this most useful career. We trust he is but the first of a band of travelling preachers.

Mr. Meyer, of Ancona, has been driven out of his meeting-house by a decision of the law courts, and obliged to hold his meetings in his own house, where he has just had the joy of admitting twelve persons to the first celebration of the Lord's Supper. Mr. Marchand has gained high repute in Elba because an eminent preaching monk, who fustily challenged him to a discussion, which challenge Mr. Marchand at once accepted, has disappeared, refusing to discuss publicly the verities of the Christian faith. The public opinion is so strongly favourable in the island to the evangelist, that, when lately turned out of his meeting-house, in Porto Ferrajo, at least half-a-dozen persons offered suitable halls belonging to them, and the Government has been petitioned to grant a small piece of ground, on which to build a modest church, like that which this month is to be opened for Evangelical service at Rio Marina.

THE WALDENSIAN COLLEGE.

There are fewer students than usual at the Waldensian College this winter, owing to some new arrangements in the Valleys. Among the six young men there is Mr. Trevers, who has for two or three years done an excellent work as missionary to the Italians in Dublin, and Signor De Vita, an ex-Salernitan monk, who has just written a first-rate tract on "First and Second Conversion"—that is, the genuine and the true, the conversion from Romanism, with which so many rest satisfied, and the conversion to God through faith in the one sacrifice of Jesus. I should mention that Mr. Ehni is associated, as Professor of Exegesis in the college, along with Dr. Revel and Mr. Geymonat, the former of whom takes the branch of ecclesiastical history, and the latter that of doctrinal theology.

MORE LABOURERS IN THE FIELD.

I am also happy to announce the recent settlement of additional missionaries in different quarters. An American minister, who has done good service in the East, has begun work in Milan, where there is such a remarkable opening on every side for Christian effort. The Rev. Mr. Wall, Baptist missionary from England, has broken ground at Bologna, a most central spot, where no well-directed labour has as yet been expended. The Rev. Mr. Morehead, a young American missionary, has associated himself with Signors Peccennini and Del Buono, and commenced operations in Sienna, which is surrounded by a large and interesting agricultural district, and where he has already been honoured to excite the ire of the priests, and thereby the attention of the people to the Gospel message.

Mr. Jones, the new English Wesleyan missionary, has pitched his tent in Naples, reinforcing the few brethren labouring among its immense population of 600,000 souls, and with the aid of Signor Albarella, opening several hopeful mission stations at Salerno and other places in the district of Naples. I feel grateful to God that these brethren have scattered so widely over the land, instead of clustering in one spot, and have been led to large centres from which they may radiate forth Gospel influences, without crossing the path of other workmen. Small as the number of native and foreign preachers is, we have had to lament in the past that so few have nobly preferred their own line of things to crossing the path of other brethren. This desire of entering in on other men's labours has not yet died out, for we find Mr. Williams, the British chaplain at Milan, thus writing, "There is now a regularly-appointed Waldensian evangelist in Como, and his meetings continue to have weekly increasing numbers. For a moment there was a danger, for as soon as others heard of Mr. Turin's audiences in Como, they sent an evangelist too, who appears not to have avoided disparaging allusions to those he should have regarded as brethren. But a little remonstrance from Mr. Turin has, we trust, aroused a better feeling, which ought to prevent a course so sadly suicidal, and hitherto so hindering to the evangelization of Italy. In a similar way the work at Pavia continues to advance, though another adversary has planted himself there, under the name of an evangelist, though, it is to be feared, he is only a politico-ecclesiastical. Yet, it is reported, Christian friends have aided such a work—of course through incorrect information."

of the people, is, generally speaking, opposed to the fundamental principles of Christianity, at least in their orthodox form, so that every observer is compelled to acknowledge a continually growing separation between the masses of our population and the Church. That opposition may, upon the part of a great number, be more or less unconscious; but among theologians, as among other learned men, there is a numerous party who have a regular and acknowledged system, which is nothing but Pantheism. The Berlin journal illustrates this tendency by examining and doing its best to refute a new book by Dr. Alexander Schweizer, of Zurich, one of the leaders of this party, which, as we are assured, reckons in its ranks the majority of the clergy of that Swiss canton. At the other extreme, as to religious tendencies, stands that party whose organ, in the North of Germany, is the Kreuzzeitung. The views advocated by this periodical have been called Prussian Christianity. But the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung protests against this designation, and justly contends that there is in Prussia a wholly different Christianity from that which has the imprudence to identify religion with a policy disapproved of by the immense majority of the nation. The same journal deplors, as we have often done, in these pages, that the ultra-Lutheran party should place itself in opposition to most of the efforts whose object is the propagation of the Gospel among our people, and that from a narrow, sectarian, and clerical spirit, which fears lest the working of religious societies should trespass upon the authority of the clergy. It especially blames that party for having thus paralysed the various operations of the Inner Mission, and makes them listen to some severe but wholesome truths as to the inability of clerical authority to bring under the power of religion the masses of the population, which are now beyond its influence. What is required for that purpose is not dignitaries of the Church, taking their stand upon their official claims, but men of God, imbued with His Spirit, who will preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ with a heart burning with love to souls. These serious truths come with the greater weight as they are presented in an influential journal, to which no suspicion can be attached of any leaning towards ecclesiastical radicalism.

CATHOLICISM AND PROTESTANTISM, ACCORDING TO DR. STAHL.

A recent publication, calculated to exert great influence in certain spheres of society in Prussia, shows how opportune and necessary are the warnings to which we have just referred. It is a posthumous work, by the celebrated Professor Stahl, edited under the title, "Parties in Church and State." It consists of academical lectures, twice delivered before the students of the University of Berlin and the object of which is, as the title indicates, to define and estimate, from a scientific point of view, the political and religious tendencies of the present age. Upon the political portion of the work we have not a word to say: in the eyes of Dr. Stahl society is dying a self-inflicted death between these two extremes—legitimacy and revolution—beyond which there is nothing. And properly speaking, according to him, the Christian principle is compatible only with legitimacy, and revolution always accompanies infidelity.

But it is especially his estimate of parties in the Church which is most characteristic of the tendencies with which the learned professor was identified. He was too sincerely a believer not to perceive, above all else, the great contrast between faith and infidelity. But his judgment as to the characteristics of the various Christian Churches have this especial feature—that always standing at the greatest distance from the Reformed Church, of which he knew and cared but little, he occupied himself with comparing Lutheranism and Catholicism. He remained a Lutheran, undoubtedly, but with such a leaning towards Catholicism, whose external authority had an imposing effect upon his mind, that, in his eyes, the truth was to be found in a medium between these two religions. The Romish tendency of some of its principles has long been a reproach to ultra-Lutheranism. It has often been defended against this charge. By what right? You may judge by some short quotations from Dr. Stahl's book: "With the Reformation, a new social principle entered the world. To develop and transform, by its means, the whole social system, was thenceforth the course of history. But as it went on, it speedily degenerated, and became Rationalism, and thereby Revolution." This is just the charge which Roman Catholic writers have brought against Protestantism, for the last three centuries, refusing to see that Rationalism and Revolution are far more frequently the growth of Roman Catholic than of Protestant soil. We ought, therefore, according to Dr. Stahl, to reform the very principle of the Reformation, and then he thinks that there would perhaps be found room, if not for union, at least for greater nearness and peace between on the number of the soldiers that the successful issue depends. The rumours of war, and the small number with which we are able to meet the powerful enemy, has been turned by our Lord to the furtherance of His kingdom amongst us. Generally the feeling prevails in Denmark that we shall sue for aid to the Lord, and to Him alone, and that all the events are in His powerful and gracious hand. I have spoken to several of our parishioners who have been made soldiers, and have gone out from their homes expecting to see their wives and children no more on earth, and I have been rejoiced to see the Christian spirit and the dependence on the Lord by which they were encouraged to bear their trials.

THE IMPENDING WAR WITH GERMANY.

I now beg permission to make an observation on the article from your German correspondent in your number for January. He says that in Schleswig "a good number of pastors" have refused to take the oath to the King, and made known their reasons for so doing through the press. As to the latter assertion, I shall not contradict it; but as to the former, the case is not quite accurately stated. After receiving your number I wrote to one of the rural deans of Schleswig, and he assured me that, so far as he knows (and he lives in the midst of these events), the "good number" is not more than one. Another, who acted as curate in a parish, refused to take the oath, and he was removed. The former was nominated a deacon last year, and has now been deprived. At Altona, Holstein, a riot was produced against one of the clerical body because he would not take the oath to the Prince of Augustenburg before he was acknowledged by the Diet of Frankfort. He was ejected, and the rioters proposed to nominate the Schleswig deacon in his place. Such is religion when mixed up with politics!"

SWEDEN.

Winsl6f, Christianstad,
December, 1863.

IMPROVED ECCLESIASTICAL LEGISLATION: THE NATIONAL CHURCH.

Our much-loved and popular monarch has very recently affixed his signature to three acts of great moment to our National Church. 1st. The miserable Sacramental Law of 1855, which threatened heavy fines, or imprisonment with bread and water, for any who, not being an ordained clergyman, should administer the Lord's Supper, and for all who should receive the sacrament at his hands. This unhappy enactment, of which I spoke at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in Paris that year, is now, both by the Diet and the King, abrogated. 2nd. The old law of 1686, which required that every person in Sweden who had been confirmed according to the Augsburg Confession, and particularly all officers and servants of the State, must at least once a-year receive the Lord's Supper, is also with a stroke of the Royal pen obliterated. 3rd. More than a year ago, the King presented to the Diet a proposal for a Convocation of the Established Church. Hitherto, the King has possessed the sole power of prescribing the catechism, psalm-book, liturgy, Bible version, &c., to be used in the Swedish Church. The Diet has accepted the Royal proposal, and the King has signed the act. Although the twelve bishops, and other dignitaries, are ex officio members of Convocation, and the mass of the people are to elect lay members in equal number with the clergy, yet we venture to believe that a step in advance has been taken. The King reserves a veto on the proceedings.

We must not forget that, during the last ten years, several liberal ecclesiastical enactments have passed the Legislature, especially (a) the abrogation of the Conventicle Law of 1726, which forbade Christian people to meet together for Bible-reading, prayer, and praise; (b) the severance of parish bonds, so that Church members may choose the clergyman from whom they wish to receive the sacraments, marriage, burial service, &c., which formerly were not permitted, as the parish clergyman must alone be applied to for such pastoral acts; (c) the passing of the Dissenters' Act in 1860, which permits seceders from the Church to form separate congregations or churches, but at the same time remain in the State Church, according to the provision: "No one, because of diverging views, may be considered separated from the State Church."

* Discrepancies between statements of German and Danish correspondents, upon the vexed question on which their respective countries are at issue, seem to be inevitable. As far as that question is treated in a religious aspect and with reference to matters of fact, it is desirable to give, briefly, such information as may reach us from either side. But we must deprecate a political feud being, in any way, fought out in these pages.—Eds.

so long as he has not entered the communion of another religious society tolerated in the kingdom."

When we combine these Church laws, whereby the rigid form of our State Church has been essentially modified, so that it can no longer be called "a palace of ice," as Dr. Krummacher, not without reason, designated it in Paris—but, on the contrary, the beams of the Sun of Righteousness cause the icicles to drop day by day, indicating their dissolution—have we not cause to bless our God, who doeth wondrous things amongst us, softening the hardest hearts? Serious Christians, differing from each other in their religious views, may now meet together within the liberal embrace of our State Church, hold their religious services freely, establish societies, choose their elders, teachers, and rulers; send out colporteurs and missionaries to Christian people and to heathens; establish tract societies and missionary associations, mission and colporteur schools, children's homes, and hospitals, &c. Yes, even the pastors of the State Church, who are spiritually minded, may be chosen, and have been chosen, as members or directors of voluntary societies.* Even free synods, with the pastor at the head, have been held in Stockholm and in the provinces. Lastly, we have a free Scandinavian Church Convocation, held alternately every second year in Christiania, Copenhagen, and Lund. What cause for joy for us do we not find in all this! What liberality on the part of our State Church! May we not with reason say that our Swedish State Church has, in a high degree, adopted the principles of the Evangelical Alliance?

THE DISSENTING BODIES—INCREASED LIBERALITY.

The earnest Christians in our land—not only Lutherans, but the so-called "Readers" and the adherents of the Baptist views, as well as Methodists, Moravians, and other separatists—have very largely partaken of the peace-bringing influence of the Evangelical Alliance.

Although in Sweden we have had little success in forming societies in connexion with the Evangelical Alliance, yet the great principles of the Alliance have penetrated deeply the religious consciousness of our people. How has this been effected without any great society? Doubtless thereby that many pastors, and also laymen, amongst whom Captain Berger may be specially named, have published information concerning the Alliance, and zealously distributed its basis, principles, and objects. These principles, too, are constantly held forth in all our religious meetings, and as they contain that which we already find in the Word of God, the Holy Spirit has given His testimony to the truth. As an example of this spirit, I may mention that the "Readers" holding different views have this year erected, near the great railway station, Hesselholm, about seven English miles from Winslöv, a large building, with a vaulted prayer-room, which will accommodate more than a thousand persons. The directors of this building are Lutherans and Baptists, and service is conducted by Lutherans, Baptists, and others, but only by such as acknowledge the doctrinal basis of the Evangelical Alliance. When this place was consecrated to its use, at least 2,000 were present, a great many of these, of course, outside the building.

VARIED EVANGELICAL EFFORTS.

The largest and best sustained association for spiritual effort and free preaching is the Fatherland Institution in Stockholm, which prepares and prints Bibles, Lutheran writings and tracts, and sends forth its colporteurs over great part of the land. In the South of Sweden (Skania and Blekinge), "the Christianstad Tract Society," standing in a friendly relation to the above-named institution, has for several years sought to do good in this neighbourhood, although it has not placed itself under the Stockholm Society, as several other tract associations have already done. The reason is, that we differ in some points, belonging more to the form than the life.

Here in South Sweden it has long been our practice to hold once, or oftener, each year, not only small, but also large gatherings of the people, at which all Evangelical Lutherans have taken part in our discussions. Our friends in Stockholm seem rather to dread open and free discussion, fearing that discord and party spirit might be the result;

* Whilst agreeing with my beloved brother in rejoicing over much that has recently been effected in favour of religious liberty in Sweden, the result of a wide-spread work of the Spirit, yet the English Observer must not suppose that there is religious freedom in Sweden as we understand the term. The Swedish Act, framed with consummate ingenuity to meet the case of the Baptists, offers to recognise, being the King's pleasure, existing congregations not Lutheran, but forbids to them the right of disseminating their views, or enlarging their communion by their own efforts, and surrounds separation from the State Church with almost insurmountable difficulties. This so-called Toleration Act has not, I believe, been accepted by the Baptists in Sweden. It is the same wise policy which gives greater freedom of action within the pale of the National Church.—TRANSLATOR.

but keeping before us the principles of the Evangelical Alliance, we have hitherto avoided everything of this kind. We in the South constantly remind seriously-minded persons of the necessity of establishing small associations, called parish societies, which elect their own officers, and appoint representatives to the larger meetings. These representatives take part in all decisions, and vote at the larger meetings, and they have the power to choose, by ballot or open vote, not only members of the direction, but also colporteurs. In Stockholm the management fills every vacancy itself, if I am correctly informed. I name these things only historically, without venturing to give a decided opinion as to which is the preferable arrangement. Meanwhile, we value highly our democratic liberty, and our friends in Blekinge and Skania are not willing to part with it. The managing members here are for the most part poor and in humble life, yet they are very independent.

In Smaland, the province nearest Skania on the north, there is a powerful association, under the direction of Pastors Ahlberg, Ostberg, and others, which has this year adopted, in great part, our liberal constitution. This society, which has existed for several years, appears to go beyond most other religious societies in our country in the establishment of schools, children's homes, institutions for the blind, deaf, and dumb, deaconess schools, and most important of all, a large school for training colporteurs, schoolmasters, and even missionaries, at the head of which we find the devoted Pastor Ahlberg.

The Fatherland Society in Stockholm has established an institution for training missionaries for the heathen, which is conducted by the highly-gifted and excellent Pastor Rudin.

RELIGIOUS PUBLICATIONS—REV. G. SCOTT—IMPENDING WAR.

Mr. C. O. Rosenius, a layman in Stockholm, continues for the twenty-second year to publish his deeply Evangelical and earnest monthly paper, called the Pietist, and more than 10,000 copies are issued monthly. Pastor Fjellstedt, formerly missionary in India, continues also to issue his Christian periodicals, the Friend of the Bible, and Lund Missionary Journal, which are nearly as old as the Pietist.

The church which the Methodist minister the Rev. George Scott, from England, erected in Stockholm is in possession of the Fatherland Society, and is truly a free church in Sweden. It was the same Pastor Scott who first commenced the Pietist. He was forced by popular hatred of his preaching to flee from Sweden. How changed would he now find this country to be, would he again visit his old friend here. He lives in their affectionate and indelible remembrance.

I close with a glad and hopeful glance towards the future of my beloved fatherland. The horrors of war threaten us; but if the Lord finds in our country as many righteous as His united mercy and justice require, He will shelter us, and His angels with their chariot of fire shall encompass us, and surround us for defence, as the waves of the ocean surround our north, and equally surround Old Albion.

Yours in Christian love,

CARL BERGMAN.

LABRADOR.

THE MORAVIAN MISSION TO THE ESQUIMAUX.

The United Brethren, or Moravians, who have long laboured among the Esquimaux in Labrador, have recently passed through severe trials. From letters not long since received, we gather the following details:—

Hopedale is the first of the stations named in the correspondence; it was established in 1782. The brethren write to say that of the Esquimaux Church they have no glad news to communicate, as it is a time of sifting and a real crisis. The increasing intercourse with foreign traders is changing the old patriarchal relations between the missionaries and the natives. Formerly, in time of need, loans could be made from the mission stores, to be repaid in times of plenty; but now, while they do not cease to borrow, the Esquimaux are prone to exchange their wares with traders, and often for injurious luxuries, such as brandy. There is a disposition abroad to avoid wholesome restraint, to become restless and even to murmur against the teachers and against God. To enjoy full liberty, some families have removed into closer proximity to the traders.

Nain is among the oldest of the stations, and from this it is reported that there has been some prosperity in the little church of 277 members. Meetings have been well attended, and the Lord's presence has been Home Intelligence.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

The Week of Prayer, at the commencement of last month, was widely observed, as in former years, in various parts of the metropolis and the provinces. The daily meetings at Freemasons' Hall, convened by the Evangelical Alliance, and announced in our last number, were well attended throughout the week—in fact, upon no previous occasion of the kind has the attendance been larger, or the interest awakened been more manifestly that of a deep and earnest kind. We subjoin an outline of each day's proceedings:—

MONDAY, JANUARY 4.—Lord Calthorpe (President of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance) occupied the chair. A hymn having been sung, Psalm ciii. was read by the Rev. W. P. McDermott, after which prayer was successively offered by the Rev. Thomas Nolan and the Rev. W. Bevan. The address on the subject of the day was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Cumming. The subject was: "Penitential Confession of Sin, and the Acknowledgment of Personal, Social, and National Blessings, with Supplication for Divine Mercy through the Atonement of our Saviour, Jesus Christ." After some introductory remarks on the nature of true devotion, Dr. Cumming proceeded to direct attention to the prayer taught by our Lord to His disciples. Taking it sentence by sentence, he made each petition the subject of appropriate comment, concluding the whole by a reference to the final deliverance of the redeemed from evil, when all the glory shall be given to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.—The succeeding prayers were by the Hon. and Rev. Baptist W. Noel and the Rev. Dr. Steane. The Doxology was then sung, and the Benediction pronounced by Dr. Steane.

TUESDAY.—The hall was densely crowded, and many persons were unable to gain admission. Captain Trotter presided, and the proceedings were commenced with silent prayer, after which a hymn was sung. The Chairman next read a portion of Acts vi. The subjects of prayer for the day were then announced—viz.: "For the Conversion of the Ungodly; for the Success of Missions among Jews and Gentiles; and for a Divine Blessing to Accompany the Efforts Made to Evangelise the Unconverted of all Ranks and Classes around us." The Rev. Dr. Jobson (Wesleyan) next engaged in prayer, after which the Chairman spoke at some length, and read many requests for prayer, which he commended to silent application. The Rev. S. Minton having led in prayer, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon was called upon to deliver the address of the day. On rising, he expressed a wish that more time were devoted to prayer. He would, therefore, begin by offering prayer, which he did with much power, introducing some of the touching appeals of the Litany. In the subsequent address, he spoke searchingly of the condition of Churches in which there are no conversions. If there was a Church which did not continually make converts, it would be well for it to ask itself whether it was a Church at all. He felt quite sure that in any Church where there was not a frequent accession of converts, the old members would soon fall off. It had been at prayer-meetings of such Church and had found the prayer gone through as machinery; but wherever a new convert was added, it was a blessing to the Church and to the old members, who felt that they were pushed forward, and must advance. If Churches did not a fresh fuel to their fire, there would be very little fire for a man to warm his hands at, although there might still remain a little warmth in the ashes. Even on the most selfish principle Churches must strive to make converts, or they would inevitably die out and become extinct. He strongly urged individual responsibility in the matter, setting forth, in a striking illustration, the condition of lost souls, while Christians, called, were taking their ease. He appealed every one present to do something that very day, let them speak of Christ to their next friend, pray, and not thus to act, was to play the hypocrite, and no blessing could be expected from such a course. In regard to the spread of infidelity, he remarked that its present flagrant avowal had taken place since the commencement of the meetings, three or four years ago; and he viewed it as an omen of Satan's alarm for his kingdom. It seemed as though God had let the devil loose among them to stir them up to renewed exertions. He trusted that God would deliver them from the sleeping devil, but (to use the term of Bunyan) "a roaring devil" was a blessing rather than the reverse. The best, the only effective way of meeting this outbreak, was by the increase of conversions—no infidelity could stand against this. While cordially sympathising with those brethren who looked to the coming of Christ as the hope of the Church, he earnestly deprecated a view of the Second Advent which would interfere with the direct duty of seeking the conversion of sinners. In the words of the Duke of Wellington to the clergyman who asked whether it was his duty to preach to the Hindoos, he would say, "Look to your marching orders!" And what were they? "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." The rev. gentleman drew to a close with some remarks on the nature and manner of prayer, urging Luther's example, in turning the promises into arguments and pleas for the fulfilment of God's own Word.—Several other letters, suggesting or appealing for prayer on special topics, were then read; one among them being on behalf of the bereaved widow and family of the deceased Pastor Frederic Monod.—At prayer by the Rev. Mr. Wilkie and two other gentlemen, the proceedings were closed with the Doxology and Benediction.

WEDNESDAY.—Lord Radstock presided. Epistle 11. was read, and prayer was subsequently offered by the Rev. E. Auriol and Colonel St. John. A special reference being made to matters upon which prayer was requested, in writing, by individual Christians—one of these being the Rev. Dr. Marsh. The Rev. David King, LL.D., then delivered the address on the subject of the day viz., Prayer—"For the Christian Church as a Ministry, for Sunday-schools and all other Christian Agencies, and for the Increase of Spirit Doxology was then sung, and the Benediction pronounced.

During the evenings of the Week of Prayer a series of meetings were held in Freemasons' Hall for devotional exercise and addresses, with special reference to the Second Advent. They were well attended.

On the afternoon of Lord's-day, January 10, an United Communion was held in the hall, which was filled in every part. The Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel presided, and delivered a practical address on the benefits of Christ's death. A short address was also delivered by the Rev. W. M. Bunting. Prayer was also offered by Mr. Baxter, Mr. Pearce, and the Rev. W. M. Bunting.

It is scarcely necessary to say, that neither was the United Communion, nor were the evening meetings, referred to above, held in connexion with the Evangelical Alliance.

THE BISHOPRIC OF ELY.

Dr. Turton, who has held the see of Ely since 1845, died on the 7th ult., at his London house, in Piccadilly, in his eighty-fourth year. He was the son of a surgeon at Hatfield, near Doncaster. In 1801 he entered the University of Cambridge, and passed through a brilliant university career. In 1827 he was made Regius Professor of Divinity, on the resignation of Bishop Kaye, and in the same year he became a prebendary in Lincoln Cathedral. Three years afterwards he was appointed to the Canonry of Peterborough, and was soon afterwards made dean of that cathedral; a preferment which he resigned in 1842, to become Dean of Westminster. Three years after that he was nominated by Sir Robert Peel to the Bishopric of Ely, which he held till his death. Dr. Turton's works are chiefly controversial, in opposition to the views both of Dissenters and Roman Catholics. In his theological opinions he was moderately High Church; but a complaint against him, especially of late years, was, that he was scarcely anything at all. The see of Ely comprehends within its bounds the University of Cambridge, and we need say no more to point out the responsibilities which attach to the oversight of that diocese; but the years and infirmities of the bishop precluded him from all active exertions, and it is averred that the duties of the diocese were left to take care of themselves. The practice of bishops resigning when they find themselves unable to discharge the duties of the office has but recently come up in the Church, and Bishop Turton did not see cause to follow it. On the other hand, it is but right to say that the whole of his moderate fortune, after a few legacies, has been bequeathed to public charities.

The new Bishop of Ely is the Rev. E.

Harold Browne, Norrisian Professor of Divinity at Cambridge University, and Canon of Exeter. It is understood that Mr. Browne's views upon all important points (except perhaps on baptismal regeneration) are thoroughly Evangelical. With a reputation for high scholarship, he combines a conciliatory temper and administrative talent. He graduated as a wrangler in 1832, and was afterwards fellow and tutor of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. In 1849 he obtained a prebendal stall, and became canon residentiary at Exeter, and vicar of St. Kenwyn, Cornwall. In 1854 he was elected Norrisian Professor at Cambridge. He was at one time Vice-Principal and Professor of Hebrew at St. David's College, Lampeter. The Bishop of Exeter is the patron of the vicarage mentioned above. Some time after his presentation, Mr. Browne found it necessary to write to a public journal, disclaiming the imputation of having obtained it on account of his being a partisan of the Bishop. He also quoted his lordship's testimony to the effect that he (Mr. Browne) had never belonged to any party. He had kept peace in a parish, which was shown, as soon as he left it, to be full of inflammable materials. That Mr. Browne should be able thus to address a polemical journalist, and to disarm hostile criticism by challenging scrutiny into his conduct and teaching, renders any remark as to the excellence of this appointment wholly unnecessary: "Once more I fearlessly appeal to those who are called Evangelical clergymen in my neighbourhood in Cornwall, whether for the last seven years I have not laboured, and that successfully, not for party, but for peace—whether I have not succeeded in conciliating persons of extreme opinions on both sides—whether I have not lived on terms of kindness and friendship, not only with Churchmen of both schools of theology, but with the Dissenters of my own flock—whether I have not gained the confidence of Wesleyans as well as Churchmen, and whether, instead of preaching on controverted doctrines, I do not steadily and constantly preach Christ as the Way, the Truth, and the Life?"

THE NEW DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

The installation of Dr. Stanley as Dean of Westminster took place at the Abbey, on Saturday, the 9th ult. Considering how long the name of the reverend doctor has been before the public, in connexion with this appointment, we might have expected the installation to take place sooner; but it is probable that both the appearance of the nomination in the Gazette and the installation itself, were purposely delayed till the expiration of the term allotted to Canon Wordsworth as canon in residence. Most of the other clergy of the minster were present, and the ceremonies were gone through in a solemn and impressive, but very quiet manner. The objections to the new dean have not been diminished, however, by time. Several of the laity and clergy of the county of Dorset have presented an address to the Prime Minister, remonstrating against the appointment; disclaiming any wish to narrow the basis of the Church of England as a National Establishment, but protesting against the position "now for the first time sought to be established, that the infallibility of our blessed Lord and the plenary inspiration of His prophets, apostles, and evangelists, are to be regarded as open questions, not disqualifying those who impugn them for places of trust and influence in the Church." It is also a significant fact, that the proposal for nominating the new dean to be one of the select preachers at Oxford has been negatived. We believe that only one vote was recorded in his favour.

THE CARDROSS CASE.

This case, which has occupied so much of the attention of the Free Church of Scotland for the last three or four years, has at last come to an end. The short history of the case is this: The Rev. Mr. McMillan, who left the Establishment with his brethren in 1843, was settled in charge of the Free Church of Cardross, where he continued for several years, till a charge of immorality—of indulging to excess in intoxicating liquors, if we recollect aright—was brought against him. The case was left for some time before the inferior Courts of the Church; but at last it was brought before the Commission of the General Assembly—a sort of committee of the whole Assembly, which, as all Presbyterians know, is appointed to take up the unfinished work of the Assembly itself, and has full powers to dispose of them as if it were the Assembly—and that body found the charges proved, and deposed him from his office. Mr. McMillan took advantage of some irregularities—apparent or real—in the mode in which the case was dealt with, and appealed to the Court of Session to find that the sentence against him was null and void, and that he was still minister of the Free Church congregation of Cardross. On this the Free Church deposed him from the office of the ministry altogether, which produced another appeal to the Civil Courts. The Church protested against the Court of Session entertaining the case at all, as they claimed that the Civil Courts had no jurisdiction over their spiritual censures; but, notwithstanding, the case went on for some time, and failed at last through a point of form. It was discovered by the judges that the General Assembly of the Free Church was not a body known to the law, and could not, therefore, be sued, as Mr. McMillan had sued it, under that name. He must begin his process all over again, and sue each minister and layman in the Assembly that was present at, and concurred in, his deposition, by their individual names. This was done, and a new process was commenced, setting forth the names of all who had in any way taken part in Mr. McMillan's deposition. It is this second process that has been given up. When the case came before the Court, a few weeks ago, Mr. McMillan's counsel rose and informed the Court that his client desired him to say he was now an old and a poor man, that he wished to spend the rest of his time upon earth in peace and charity with all men, and therefore he wished to withdraw from this suit. There was, therefore, of necessity, an end to the case.

THE NATIONAL BIBLE SOCIETY OF SCOTLAND.

The annual meeting of this society was held at Glasgow, during the past month, the Duke of Argyle in the chair. There was a large attendance on the occasion. From the report and from the Chairman's speech, it appeared that the annual subscriptions were increasing, though they had not yet attained that point which the committee thought might be expected from Scotchmen, considering all that Scotland and her sons owed to the Bible. The report of the operations of the society was very gratifying. The sale of Bibles by colporteurs had risen to a large amount, and was still increasing; and by their agency, and that of the Bible-women, the Word of God was conveyed to families inhabiting the lanes and wynds of the large towns, who but for these agencies would have remained sunk in a state of practical heathenism. Of foreign countries, the attention of the society had been principally directed to Italy. The Duke of Argyle then delivered an introductory address, in which he attacked the Bishop of Oxford's dogma, that the authority of the Bible rested on the Church—that is, as the bishop insinuated, on the priesthood system of the Roman Catholics and the High Anglicans.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

PERSIA.

The Rev. J. H. Shedd, from whom an interesting communication appeared in our number for November last (p. 541), on missionary effort among the Nestorian mountaineers, states that while in Koordistan he had taken part in the annual mountain conferences, which was attended by all the helpers, and by several other communicants. A variety of questions relating to the work passed under review, in essays, reports, and free discussions. "The native brethren are sanguine respecting the future, and for the most part are thoroughly in earnest. The one dark cloud upon the horizon is the occupation of Amadia by French monks." J. Shedd was absent from Oroomiah two months, and went as far as Mosul. "From Oroomi to Amadia the way was nearly all traversed on foot, in native snow-shoes and moccasins much of it amid snow and storms, wading mountain torrents and creeping over fall avalanches, at times with much fatigue and exposure." At Mosul he had the satisfaction of seeing Mr. Rassam, the English Vice-Consul, "the old and tried friend of the Nestorian" and consulting him in regard to several matters in the mountains. "The return was at a season of greatest beauty in the mountain valleys, and was every way delightful." Close contact with the work in the mountain districts has impressed the missionary more than ever before with its difficulties.

INDIA.

The baptism of no fewer than forty-one Christian converts took place lately at Kund pootoor, near Vellore (Presidency of Madras). The Rev. Ruthven Macfarlane, of the Church of Scotland's Mission at Madras, administered the sacred rite, assisted by the Rev. Joseph David, a native minister, who has been labouring at this out-station for some years. The entire number of converts is between sixty and seventy, but as some were engaged in railway works, at a great distance, they could not all be got together. They are of the Vallala caste or cultivators, and when their own field-work is slack, they go elsewhere in search of employment. Mr. Macfarlane says that in the preliminary examination which he held they acquitted themselves most satisfactorily, and so as to evidence at once their earnestness and the faithful teaching of the native pastor and his catechist. The adults, in fact, evinced a knowledge of Scripture truth "at least equal to what could be found among rural classes of our native land." Mr. Macfarlane's own words will best describe the baptism:—

After addressing them at some length, I proceeded to administer the sacrament of baptism, and to admit them into the Church of Christ, to the number of forty-one in all, including two young men from Vellore. The doors and windows were now quite closed up by groups of outside spectators, who behaved with much decorum, and were evidently much interested. The scene was deeply interesting. One old man, clasping his young grandchild in his arms, was evidently much moved. He and his wife came forward first to receive the sacrament, bringing with them their whole family to the third generation, their daughters, and their sons, and their sons' wives and their little ones. After service was concluded, all sat down to a little love-feast of fruit prepared outside by Mr. David.

Mr. Davidson, the Judge of Vellore, was present on the occasion, and justly observed that these people must be in earnest, else they would never have submitted to the painful labour of years in thus seeking after Divine truth. Mr. Macfarlane remarks:—

Their disinterestedness also is equally beyond question, for, as they truly say, they have no love of worldly gain; for they have no favour to ask of us, and we have none to confer on them—their only worldly result, in fact, which they can look for being a continuance of those petty persecutions which they have been for some time exposed to. These, I may observe, strongly and agreeably contrast with too many of our converts elsewhere, who cast themselves upon us, and look to us to maintain and provide for them. One small favour, indeed, they did ask at the close of the meeting—it was that they might have a girls' school opened in the village—a request that was readily complied with by Captain St. John Grant contributing a sum to defray all the preliminary expenses, and Mr. David kindly offering to look after its maintenance. . . . I believe that a spirit of inquiry is stirring the hearts of many others in this and the neighbouring villages.

The Bishop of Madras has visited the Propagation Society's mission in the district of Cuddapah, and reports favourably of what he saw. "The zeal which exists among the Kalsepaund converts," his lordship writes, "was put to the test by my inability to visit them. No less than seventeen, of whom nine were women, walked over to Mutialpaund to be confirmed, though the distance is more than thirty miles, and a considerable part of the route runs over a ghaut, and is peculiarly rough and difficult."

ground on the simple and teachable spirit displayed by these people, and the perfect confidence they would repose in the word of one whom they had come to consider their friend. The means to be employed would be simple, but would require an immense amount of patience and steady toil.

Messrs. Williams and Gregson, of the Baptist Society, have been engaged in preaching in and around Agra, often to large and attentive congregations. At the royal city of Morshah, Mr. Williams visited the palace, and had an interview with the rajah, with whom he conversed for an hour on the truths of Christianity. Bahadoor Tekum Sing, as the rajah is called, asked many questions concerning the religion of Christ, which were answered to his satisfaction. Whilst the missionary was relating to him the history of our Saviour and His apostles, he suddenly, but in a becoming manner, interrupted him, saying that some Europeans had told him that Christ never appeared in the flesh, and that, therefore, "His religion is vain." The missionary emphatically contradicted this, and assured the rajah that the evidences of Christ's incarnation were more numerous and stronger than the evidences of any other historical truth. He then earnestly intreated him to get a Bible, and to read it carefully and prayerfully, so that he might be able to judge for himself. In compliance with his own request, Mr. Williams, on his return home, sent the rajah a copy of the Old and New Testaments.

The Rev. W. Shoolbred, of the United Presbyterian Mission, gives some graphic sketches of incidents in a preaching tour among the Mugra Hills, and in which he was accompanied by the Rev. John Robson, during the last cool season. One speciality of the itineracy was the night-meetings, which gave tone and character to all the missionaries' operations:—

Even in the morning, except just at daybreak, it was sometimes difficult to secure an audience. And as the sun began to climb the east, one and another of the stalwart farmers, standing at the edge of the crowd with an unwieldy anchor-shaped wooden plough poised on one shoulder, and his yoke of bullocks held by a halter in the other hand, would begin to cast uneasy glances fieldwards; and at last unable to remain longer, but yet unwilling to go, would respectfully make his salaam, and say, "Giver of corn, and cherishers of the poor, your words are good; but the day is growing, and our work is great: I must go a-field, that the bairns at home may not starve." And so in the evening, till the sun was down, and the brief twilight had melted away into the gathering darkness, every man fit for a man's work was abroad in the fields. But then, through the thickening darkness, or the pale moon light, could be seen these stalwart hill-men trooping in by twos and threes; their approach announced by the pleasant music of a tinkling bell attached to the neck of the foremost bullock. And the cattle littered down, and their hasty evening meal of sour curds swallowed, they gather in crowds on the village Hatâi, or central platform, to discuss the news of the day, and solace themselves with the no too fragrant smoke of the howkah. Then, the toils of the day over, they will listen to you without distraction; and nothing will disturb the even flow of your discourse, except some louder gurgle from the howkah, as a broader-chested smoker indulges in a deeper inhalation, or the screech of a hungry ow in the tree overhead, or the howl of a melancholy jackal, borne in by the night breeze from the jungl all around.

On one occasion, Mr. Shoolbred was making his way alone to a large hamlet, chiefly inhabited by farmers, situated on a sort of platform, in a wild gorge of the Mugra, when he was overtaken by darkness:—

I had no lantern with me; in the village itself darkness and silence seemed to reign: and I was about to abandon all thought of halting to preach. Just then, on turning a sharp corner, I came upon a hut, in whose court blazed a cheerful fire. A man and two boys were seated near it, peeling lint with the rough outer husk of which the fire was mainly fed. Here was my opportunity. Leaping from my pony, I threw the bridle to the sais, and joined the busy group. After the usual salaam given and received, I sat down upon a stone bench, and entered into conversation with them about the lint in whose preparation they were engaged. Then, for the first time, in that lonely Mugra hamlet I reaped the advantage of my researches into the preparation of lint, prosecuted previous to leaving Scotland. As I detailed to these simple hill-men the complex process and ingenious machinery by which the beautiful, almost silky flax of Willayat is prepared, they listened with eager attention, mouths agape with wonder. "And now," I resumed, "I have come well-nigh ten thousand miles to teach you greater wonders than these, and to bring you glad tidings of great joy. But now, go call your brothers, and the village people, that all may hear the good news I bring." Up started the brawny farmer, scant clothing and ample beard whitened with shreds of the broken husk, and shouted in a voice that woke the echoes of that gloomy gorge; and his two sons started off in different directions to call together the people of the hamlet whom even that stentorian shout could not reach. Scarcely had the echoes died away, when from all sides answering shouts were returned; and clambering down steep rocks, atop of which small cottages were perched in a way that brought back vivid the wildest scenery of the Tyrol, and climbing up from lower platforms, came the hardy Mairs, some wrapped in their coarse blankets, and some shivering with the cold of that Indian winter night, while to my northern blood felt no more than pleasantly cool. Soon the court was full—crowded most in the neighbourhood of the fire. And leave asked from me, the howkahs were set in constant circulation; and for a full hour I broke down the bread of life to these rude and simple-minded men. The parting salaam was spoken, and my foot in the stirrup, when one from the circle came near, and holding his hands, said, "Cherisher of the poor, my brother is very ill in the house; will you have

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

CHINA.

The Rev. W. Burns, of the Amoy English Presbyterian Mission, having visited the Chinese capital, has met with unexpected encouragement. A lady writes from Peking :—

I certainly was not prepared to see my own countryman in the garb of a Chinaman ; and he has even gone the length of shaving the fore part of his head, and wearing a tail ! We are so delighted to have him with us, he is such a truly good man. The object of his visit is to try and get Sir Frederick Bruce to do something towards securing protection to Christians in the south. Contrary to all our expectations, Sir Frederick has given him a cordial reception, and promised to do all he wants. It will be a great advantage to all the other missionaries.

Mr. Burns has obtained from the Chinese Government, on behalf of native Protestants, a similar privilege to that granted a year ago to Roman Catholics—exemption from the duty of supporting idolatry and the ancestral worship. He has also embraced the opportunity of spreading the Gospel in the Imperial city.

At Shanghai, in consequence of the influx of destitute strangers from the provinces, there is great mortality. The missionaries feel that they have to supply the charities, as well as to preach the truths of Christianity. Yet relief, on a large scale, is not found to be of much advantage. The Gospel message is lost sight of by the people, while the charities are all in all. The Rev. W. Muirhead, of the London Mission, suggests that, in future, those who give evidence of religious concern should become more particularly the objects of Christian benevolence. He goes on to say :—

The efforts made by the Chinese to alleviate the sufferings of their countrymen are perfectly astonishing. Several associations have long been in existence that dispense an immense amount of charity to the thousands of needy and distressed all around. Soup-kitchens and clothing establishments have been formed, and from day to day hundreds are kept alive through their influence. During this year coffins have been also supplied for the dead, at the rate of four and five hundred a day, and everywhere these institutions are highly commended. Such are the circumstances of the people at present, that it is this kind of things which chiefly meets their views ; and when the Gospel is preached to them, a primary consideration with them is, what are the advantages connected with it ! Of course the Roman Catholics are wise in their generation, and act accordingly in this matter.

The country stations connected with Shanghai are in a promising condition. At one of them there are already fifty converts, and about half that number under instruction as catechumens. Mr. Muirhead announces the following wide-spread plan of operations :—

It is our design, however, to establish, under the care of native agents, about twenty stations and churches, and the whole under the vigilant oversight of the foreign missionary. As the work goes on and the country is tranquillised, it is resolved to increase the number of these to a hundred or so, extending through the province in every direction. We find the Roman Catholics are taking due advantage of the openings in the country.

A pleasing picture is presented by the Rev. Mr. Swanson, of Amoy, of the Khi-boey Christians engaged in building their chapel—some carrying wood a distance of five miles, others carrying stones, others again mixing the mortar, and another providing these Christian labourers with a good meal, whilst the missionary himself breaks the bread of life to a congregation of eighty or ninety under the shade of a tree, surrounded by a multitude of wondering heathen. "The whole scene," writes Mr. Swanson, "reminded me of my own land, and of a Highland communion Sabbath."

Six or seven thousand candidates undergo an examination for the Sien-tsin (B.A.) degree in the departmental city of Tungchowfoo. On the last occasion of the kind, the missionaries had a good opportunity for preaching the Gospel. The Rev. J. Laughton, of the Baptist Society, writes :—

The chapels were crowded. Scarcely any of these scholars had ever heard anything of Christianity before ; and it was with painful interest that I watched to see how these proud disciples of Confucius would treat the first announcement of the Gospel message. Some of them said that "Jesus was a great sage, and according to what the preacher said, he was a holy man ; some of them suggested that as there was a great Eastern sage, so it was probable that there was also a great Western sage, and this sage might be Jesus, who, perhaps, was in some respects equal to Confucius." Then they were told that the much-boasted system of morals, &c., of which Confucius was the founder, was fundamentally wrong in what it did teach (that self-love is the grand motive to virtue), and that it was equally defective in what it did not teach (man's duty to God). These things were exceedingly unpleasant to them, and many could not restrain their anger. When Christ was spoken of as the Son of the only true God, who became incarnate, and died for the sins of men, and now sits on the right hand of God as a Prince and a Saviour, some of them looked at each other, and sneered, and others made "game," while some burst into a furious rage of passion ; and the whole of them soon left, saying, "We may perhaps call again another day and hear more of this doctrine." I [think the latter part of the 17th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles could not have described better what Paul saw at Athens than what I witnessed. Some of them, however, came privately to the missionaries and discussed the points of dispute with considerable calmness and ability. I think some of them were convinced of the truth, although they were too stubborn to acknowledge it.

MADAGASCAR.

The story of King Radama being alive, is now stated, on the authority of Mr. Cameron (who arrived at Antananarivo in September last), to be entirely false. He says that the officer who was ordered by the Queen to remove the body from the palace, as well as the women assisting him, after having it in their custody for two or three days, identified it, beyond a doubt, at the interment, as that of the late King. The French, it is suggested, ought to be less violent in their demands upon the Queen to fulfil the treaties made with Radama, when it is known that were she to attempt to do so, "the people would probably send her after her husband." Mr. Cameron speaks with satisfaction of the favourable reception given to him both by the Government and the people, and describes the intelligence and consistency of the native Christians as deserving of high praise.

SOUTH AFRICA.

Bishop Twells has not only arrived in the Orange Free State, but has paid a visit to the old Basuto chief, Mosheh. We have before us the first instalment of his journal, after his arrival, from which it appears that he was accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Field, one of the Propagation Society's missionaries, whom he settled at a place called Smithfield, which contains about 500 inhabitants, two-thirds of whom are Europeans. The bishop announces that he intends to make the proper support of the clergyman a matter of first importance in every place. On his first Sunday in the Free State, he preached, at Smithfield, in the morning to the Europeans, and in the evening to the natives. He thus describes the latter service :—

I engaged Mr. Joseph Orpen [the mainspring of the Church movement at Smithfield], as interpreter, to translate into Dutch, and provided myself with a Dutch New Testament, Prayer-book, and Hymn-book. First I gave out a hymn and started it in Dutch. The people sang, or rather screamed it out; then Mr. Orpen read a chapter; then I spoke to them very simply, Mr. Orpen translating each sentence; then I made them stand and repeat with me the Lord's-prayer and Creed in Dutch. We concluded with another hymn and the blessing. I am told the people were very much pleased.

WESTERN AFRICA.

The upper stations of the Niger Church Mission have been visited by the Rev. S. Crowther, who sends home interesting accounts of their progress. At Onitsha, there had been fifty-three baptisms within nine or ten months, and there were then about forty-two candidates receiving weekly instruction. It appears, too, that these firstfruits, like those in the early days of the Abbeokuta Mission, have had to endure persecution, and have been enabled to stand the test. At Gbebe, Mr. Crowther found that the Scripture-readers had been very diligent in instructing the natives, and in visiting some of the villages in the interior; where they had been most cordially received, and invited to send permanent teachers. "Here," writes Mr. Crowther, "I had the privilege of baptizing two men and seven women in the presence of about 200 persons at the morning service; after which I administered the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper to eighteen persons, five of those who had been baptized last year being admitted for the first time." There was decided evidence also of the influence which had been acquired over the surrounding heathen.

When the King of Gbebe, Ama Abokka, was on his death-bed, and was giving charge to his head chief about his children, and the government of the town after his death, until a successor should be elected, he did not forget the missionaries, saying, "Suffer nothing to harm the Oibos; they are my strangers." When Mr. Joseph [a Scripture-reader] died the heathen natives showed great sympathy. According to their notions, they must honour his death as the death of a great person, by firing of muskets, a tribute of respect which was respectfully declined. They then proposed cooking a large quantity of food, to be feasted upon in honour of the dead; and when this was objected to, they brought a mat and 400 cowries, so as to bear their share in the expenses, and these were accepted, to the gratification of the chiefs.

Mr. Crowther, it will be remembered, is a native clergyman. How admirably he can adapt his communications to the yet unenlightened native mind, may be seen from the following incident :—

While Mr. Crowther was at Gbebe, one of the messengers of King Massaba, of whose intentions towards that town doubts were entertained, now that King Ama Abokka has died, being about to return to his master, Mr. Crowther took him round the mission premises, and showed him the school-room, and then the cotton gins and the press, and the bales which were produced out of it, which excited the wonder and inquisitiveness of everybody. "I asked him," says Mr. Crowther, "to deliver this message to his king, that we are an Anasara: 'There,' pointing to the schoolroom, 'we teach the Christian religion ;' pointing to the cotton gin, I said, 'This is our gun ;' and to the clean cotton puffing out of it, 'That is our powder ;' and I said, 'The cowries which are the proceeds of the operation are the shots which England, the warmest friend of Africa, earnestly desires she should receive largely.' The king was to judge from what the messenger had seen of our proceedings here, whether the efforts of England were injurious to the prosperity of a nation, or favourable to its peace and welfare."

Gbebe is not only a confluence of waters, but of languages, eight different tongues being spoken there. Thus the resident teachers require to be versed in two or three languages at least ; and so we read of a sermon being preached in three distinct languages, first Igbara, then Nupe, and then a third. Efforts are being made to give extension to Christian truth amongst the surrounding tribes :—

Mr. Joseph visited, before his death, his countrymen, the Bassa, at the back of the Iro mountains. They received him favourably, and promised to receive Christian teachers so soon as they should come. Mr. James Thomas has also visited his country people, the Eki tribe, on the upper part of the right side of the Kwara. They also received him cordially, and wished to keep him. It was the first time that a countryman of theirs had returned home from the far-famed white man's country. Some of these people who are resident at Gbebe have given a small piece of ground for the erection of a preaching shed, and helped, by their labour, to erect it.

The United Presbyterian missionary at Creek Town, Old Calabar, reports progress as to the justifiable opposition of the native Christian women to the law prohibiting their wearing decent clothing. The Old Creek Town conservatives, with the King at their head, have been compelled to give way, for the women have virtually procured the repeal of the law, by perseveringly disobeying it. But still, a gown is occasionally torn off their backs in the street :—

It is an old custom to prohibit women to come abroad on the day of the week called Iquan, and mischievous lads disguise themselves as a sort of egbo, and walk about the town, pursuing and beating any females they may find venturing into the street. Those who distinguish themselves by clothing are made special objects of persecution in such circumstances, but beyond this they have escaped. His Majesty seems to have felt that they were too many for him, and to have abandoned his crusade against clothing.

Sierra Leone presents the first instance in the history of Church-of-England missions in which a mission has risen up into a native Church ; and we are glad to learn that it is earnestly endeavouring to sustain its new responsibilities. The annual charges of the nine pastorate Churches is about 1,000*l*. Two years ago the native Christians contributed one-half this sum. A year later the collections had increased to 650*l*., and this, although great efforts are being made by them for the repair and building of churches. The educational establishments for the native youth, however, remain in the hands of the Church Missionary Society, and thus a careful supervision is exercised over the source whence will be derived candidates for the pastorate. Four Churches in the colony also continue to be supplied by the society's missionaries.

The work among the Bulloms, who occupy the shores of the Sierra Leone river, opposite the British colony, is full of encouragement. Commenced in 1813, this mission was relinquished four years afterwards, on account of the opposition arising from the slave-trade. The long-suspended work is now being resumed. Two native catechists have been stationed there, and the results of their labours are thus described by the Rev. G. R. Cniger, by whom the mission has been visited :—

I remained over one Sunday to administer the communion, and I confess I was not prepared to see our church so crowded with attentive listeners. The native king was present, who is favourable to our carrying on the work, but continues to practise his heathen ways. At the close of the service twenty-six remained to partake of the communion. Our congregation numbered, I think, 103, gathered, as I afterwards learned, from eight different villages on that coast. Many of them remained for the afternoon service, and then returned. There are many, of course, who still cling to their idols, but that we are able to show such results, after about two years of labour amongst such a people, is proof sufficient to convince the most sceptical that the Word of God, applied by His own Spirit, has lost none of its power.

The contiguous mission-field in the Timneh Country has been re-entered upon. The Rev. Charles Knodler, having been much moved by the condition of the "deeply fallen and fearfully depraved Timnehs," has made several journeys among them. The King of the Quiah Country promised the missionary all the assistance he could give, and his people appeared to lend a willing ear to the preaching of the Gospel. At Port Lokkoh he was kindly received by one of the chiefs, a venerable old man, and whose guest he became. Though a Mohammedan—

He made no objection to my conducting in his house, daily, morning and evening prayers, and, on Sunday, Divine service. Also in this town was a meeting called by the chiefs, and the Divine worship on the Sabbath, and seven or eight heathens attend their instructions. They are threatened from time to time, but the chief with whom they live is friendly to them.

From the populous island of Lifu (Loyalty Group), the Rev. S. Macfarlane gives the most cheering report ever received thence. Those who once sought the missionary's life, now invite his labours, and regard him with respect and affection. Both the young and the adult manifest a thirst for knowledge, sanctified by religion. Their advancement, too, in the habits of civilised life is wonderful. Men who a few years since were unclothed savages, revelling in the horrors of cannibalism, now hold their May meetings in as orderly a manner as a London audience in Exeter-hall. The sight, on the last occasion of this kind, excited the surprise even of the missionary. He writes :—

Really it is a perfect riddle to me how and from what source these natives get such a variety of good and appropriate clothing. They sat together, neat and clean, in love, peace, and order, who had formerly been enemies, and had eaten each other's friends and relatives. Some of them made spirited and appropriate speeches, drawing the contrast between the past and present, to which their countrymen listened with the greatest attention. Nearly all the remaining heathen on the island were present, and were exhorted and appealed to most pointedly and faithfully by their black brethren. The collections were also a decided improvement upon last year, although by no means what we desire and hope to attain. They amount to about 40*l.*—about 15*l.* in cash, and the remainder in cocoa-nut fibre. Heathenism on the island is fast becoming a thing of the past. The professed heathen are now few in number, and shorn of their strength. There has not been a heathen feast or a night dance on this island for some time. I suppose such practices are dead and buried, and will soon be lost in oblivion. The power and influence of the Gospel are felt and acknowledged throughout the length and breadth of this large island. The painted heathen and bearded Papist are alike arrested and subdued. A remarkable proof of this occurred some time ago, when the priests desired their followers to openly and flagrantly violate the Sabbath, by practising a number of games upon that sacred day. The natives, however, refused to take any part in the proceeding, saying they were afraid to do such things upon God's day. The attempt to establish the games was consequently abandoned.

All the efforts of the Romish priests to supplant the Protestant mission have hitherto proved abortive. They have strenuously endeavoured to establish out-stations on different parts of the island, but have utterly failed. They seek to prove the Bible insufficient as a rule of faith, but the people are passionately fond of books, and cling to it only the more earnestly. The priests came from New Caledonia, and the nominal Romanists, with the rest of the population, are only restrained from sending them back by fear of the French authorities in that colony. Indeed, the priests are already earnestly soliciting the aid of the secular arm.

An institution has been commenced at Lifu for training native pastors. Of thirty applicants for admission, twenty were accepted. Mr. Macfarlane is charmed with their "sparkling eyes and well-formed heads," and thinks, with Bishop Pattison, that the race is capable of rising very high in the scale of civilization and intelligence. As to their devotedness, we give the evidence in the missionary's own words :—

In my opening address, I spoke to the young men most plainly and faithfully of the dangers they would probably have to encounter, which might possibly terminate in their falling by the hands of their cruel brethren. They simply replied, "This is not news to us; we have already thought of and talked over all these things; we are not afraid; we do not care for our bodies, and no person on earth can injure our souls. If we die in the field, we die; if we live, we live; carume a nua koi Jenu—we leave it with Jesus."

Mr. Macfarlane reports, in his own district, 439 Church-members, 268 seekers, and 19 proposed for Church fellowship.

The Rev. James Calvert, of the Wesleyan Mission in Fiji, while on a tour among the islands, presided over a missionary meeting at Tavuki. Teachers and students from several other towns took an active part in the proceedings :—

They presented fifty-seven cans of oil, of five gallons each. The teachers took the lead, as an example, and in order that the cans may be at liberty for the people. Afterwards, the school children and others brought yams, fowls, sugar-cane, currants, native cloth, and two turtles, singing with high glee as they came and laid down these live offerings to my wife and self. At the close I addressed the people.

Bishop Staley writes from Honolulu in a strain of urgency for increased support. He speaks of his mission as "a mere fragment," "wretchedly supported" from home; "nay, likely to collapse, in a year or two, for want of funds."

we cannot speak of his antecedents, but he has produced a charming volume, and one which will, we hope, extend the interest already felt in this most important mission. Limiting himself chiefly to that aspect of the mission which concerns woman, the author, in twenty-two delightful chapters, tells facts which alternately excite our hopes and fears, our gladness and our regrets. If the American Churches had done nothing beyond inaugurating the mission to the independent Nestorians, as we may almost call them, they would deserve our gratitude. Those Nestorians have, under God, maintained an existence, and an ecclesiastical independence, for between fourteen and fifteen hundred years. Amid oppression and persecution, terrors and enticements, they have retained their ancient faith. Cast down they were, and are, but not destroyed; and the American missionaries of both sexes have laboured so diligently, and with such unmistakeable benedictions, that we cannot but recognise the hands of God in their experience. In addition to the life-like narratives and descriptions of this volume, it contains a few illustrations, which, no doubt, truly represent the objects designated. Our idea of the book is that it is one of the most agreeable missionary works we are acquainted with.

The Critical School and Jesus Christ: A Reply to M. Renan's "Life of Jesus." By EDMOND DE PRESSENSÉ. Translated by L. CORKRAN. E. Stock.

THIS able essay was first published in the Revue Chrétienne for August last. Candour, however, compels us to say that the translation is not so good as it might have been. The translator has often failed to catch the precise thought of the original, and he has failed in reproducing some of the proper names. On the very first page the "delicious shepherd" of Mr. Corkran is meant for the "berger délicieux" of M. de Pressensé, but it is clear that he intended to convey the idea of "charming," or even "delightful," rather than "delicious." So in other cases. Thus, on the next page Mr. Corkran falls into several unhappy renderings; for example: "There is nothing like it for knowing how to bury a dead religion under a heap of flowers, and for making apotheoses after the old Roman fashion, ridding themselves of what was irksome by causing it to disappear in a cloud of glory, witness their first king, suppressed the same moment he was deified." M. de Pressensé wrote no such execrable a sentence as this. Again, on the next page we read: "I find esprit and great charms of style, but I also find an ambiguity of diction, which masks the real thought, and which covers with a veil of unctious sentimentality an absolute void in point of belief." In this barbaric style the work runs on, and our fear is that much of it will not be understood.

The idea of adopting esprit as an English word, and writing unctious! As for proper names, we read of "Straus's book," of "Cakia Mouni," "François d'Assize," "Bouddha," "Pappias," "Tatien," "Bethlehem," &c. We are sorry that M. de Pressensé has found so incompetent a translator, as his reply to Renan is one of the most masterly we have yet seen. We do not mean that it is a complete refutation of the "Life of Jesus" of this clever writer, but that it undermines his fundamental principles. This task of destroying the very foundations upon which the new book rests, is performed partly in the stern spirit of the logical and historical critic, and partly in the spirit of withering irony. M. de Pressensé shows that the book is false in its philosophy, groundless in its criticism, unfaithful to its original, and grotesque as a picture. Therefore, M. Renan has failed in all his characters, as philosopher, critic, historian, and artist. Such as are able to peruse the original should do so, and we believe their only regret will be that, owing to the rapidity of its production, this valuable essay bears a few undeniable blemishes, and does not bring out some points so fully as we could have wished. The general course of thought may be gathered from the translation; but we must repeat, that it does not do M. de Pressensé justice.

The First Week of Time; or, Scripture in Harmony with Science. By CHARLES WILLIAMS. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

WE hardly know how in few words to describe the plan of this instructive, and even entertaining, book. The author's design is to bring out the harmony which exists between the Mosaic record at the beginning of Genesis and the facts ascertained by modern science. In working out this idea not much use is made of minute criticism of the sacred text, as the writer's object is not simply a scientific exposition of that text. Many of the more striking results of scientific inquiry are accumulated, and arranged in a series of chapters corresponding with the order of the Biblical record. By way of prologue, a chapter is introduced on Scripture and true science. After this come a series of chapters embodying the scientific results already referred to in the following order: The Structure and Plan of our Globe; God's Works in Eternity; The First Day of Time; The Firmament; The Waters; The Dry Land; The Vegetable Tribes; The Rulers of the Day and the Night; Races of Animals; and Man Physical and Moral. We can very safely commend this small volume as a very interesting contribution to the popular literature of Christian philosophy; but at the same time, we refrain from endorsing every one of the author's theories.

FOREIGN.

THE war cloud which, at the beginning of the year, hung so heavily over the North of Europe, has not yet passed away, and there is little prospect of peace between the Northern Powers of Europe. The complication of affairs which led to all the difficulty is certainly unexampled in the history of Europe, and displays an amount of excitement and unreasoning passion in the minds, not of individuals, but of whole bodies of men, which shows how much of work there yet remains for Christian self-denial to accomplish. It would be absurd to attempt to go into the merits of the dispute between Denmark and Germany; but it may be enough to say that the smaller States took advantage of the quarrel to endeavour to wrest the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein from Denmark altogether; and for this purpose they encouraged the claims of the Duke of Augustenburg. They took advantage of their numerical majority in the German Diet to carry out their own views over those of Austria and Prussia, which, as great European Powers, owed an obligation to the faith of treaties and of engagements entered into with the other European States that the minor German princes did not acknowledge. Austria and Prussia, therefore, have been obliged to set the decisions of the German Diet aside, and to occupy the disputed country on their own account and in their own name. The minor States, who knew well that this resolution was fatal to their plans, showed a strong feeling of resistance: and there was at one time reason to fear that the first scene of the war would be a civil strife among the antagonists of Denmark themselves. The overwhelming force of the great Powers, however, induced the smaller States reluctantly to give way. They are now pushed aside, and the quarrel is reduced to reasonable bounds, between Denmark on the one hand, and Austria and Prussia on the other. These last made their original demand, to repeal the obnoxious regulation which led to the whole dispute within forty-eight hours. To this Denmark replied by asking for time to consult the Estates of the realm, by whose advice the objectionable constitution was passed, and without whose sanction it cannot be constitutionally repealed. This request was so reasonable, that it was generally expected it would be complied with; but we regret to say they insist on their first demand. There will still, however, be an interval of a few days, which will give time for the mediation of other Powers. It would be a lasting scandal both to the statesmanship and the Christianity of the latter half of the nineteenth century if this quarrel—"a quarrel which few people care for, and nobody understands"—were to be allowed to work itself to an issue of war and blood.

The condition of France is at the present moment full of interest, both in a religious and political point of view. The speeches of the Opposition members in the Chamber of Deputies—such men as Thiers, Berryer, Jules Favre, and others—have awakened throughout France echoes of the old political liberties that were enjoyed under former dynasties, and the effect is apparent in the success of Opposition candidates wherever a new election gives an opportunity for their being returned. The Emperor is said to be greatly annoyed at the use which is thus made of the restricted liberty of speech he allowed; and in a recent reply to Archbishop Bonnehose, who came to Court on occasion of his being made a cardinal, he took occasion to express his regret and vexation that men who themselves had hardly escaped with their lives from the storms of revolutions, should be found again invoking the aid of the winds. The enemies of the Emperor insist that a stronger proof, both of his rage and his fears, is to be found in the plot which the police are said to have lately discovered in Paris, and the arrest of four Italians, on a charge of conspiring to murder the Emperor. It is certain that the men have been arrested, and certain, too, that they have confessed their crime, accusing the well-known Mazzini of having hired them for the purpose; but that charge Mazzini has indignantly denied. Whatever truth there may be in the story, it has produced little or no effect on the current of political events; there has been no reaction in the Emperor's favour; the demand for additional liberties, the dissatisfaction with foreign military expeditions, the discontent at Imperial extravagance, increase from day to day. In the Church the ferment is the same. The book of M. Renan still agitates religious society; and to it, as we learn from our correspondent, has just been added another, with the title of "The Cursed One," detailing the miseries of an unhappy priest who had the misfortune to come under the ban of the Jesuit societies.

The Protestant Churches are agitated as well as the Roman Catholics. The old controversy between the Orthodox and the Rationalist parties appears, at last, to be coming to a head. It seems that the Rationalists, having obtained a numerical majority on the Committee of the Protestant Bible Society, propose to use it in circulating a translation of the Scriptures in favour of their views. The Orthodox resist this with all their might, and in their efforts they will have the prayers and sympathies of true Christians all over the world. The cause of Evangelical truth has lost an able champion in the person of Dr. Frederic Monod, whose pen has often enriched the pages of this journal, and of whom an interesting memoir will be found in another page. We refer to the letter of the superintendent of a German mission in the South of France for an interesting account of the way in which the Emperor Napoleon was induced, at the request of the King of Wurtemberg, to remove many of the obstacles which stood in the way of the prosecution of their labours.

From Italy, as from France, we hear little else than accounts of the remarkable ferment which has been roused by Renan's work on the Life of Jesus. It is devoured with avidity by the rich and the middle classes, and is thus one sign among many of the thorough heart-alienation between the intelligent classes of that country and the Romish Church, which they see to stand in the way of their freedom, unity, and independence. Unhappily, the effect of this is to lead them to rampant infidelity, and the conduct of certain Protestants in the land does not always tend to rebuke that error. If ever there was a country or a crisis in which it was necessary that all who "hold the Head" should unite on the grand truths they hold in common, and throw into the shade minor differences, one would think that that country was Italy, and that crisis the present. Yet we find from the letter of our intelligent correspondent that the agents of the Plymouth Brethren have chosen this particular moment to make an attack upon the Waldensian and other organised Protestant bodies, as no better than the Church of Rome, and that the only true Gospel is to be found among themselves. Out of evil comes good, however. The bitter and unprovoked attack has roused the spirit of Dr. Des Sanctis, who is well known to have no special love for the Waldensian body, to come forward in their defence, and he vehemently repudiates the narrow sectarian spirit displayed in the attack. A curious trait in the personal character of King Victor Emmanuel is brought out in the letter of our correspondent. It appears that the stout-hearted and gallant soldier is superstitiously afraid of the censures of the Church of Rome under which he has been placed, and that there are moments when he shows an inclination to undo the work of his life, and earn the pardon of the Pope, by replacing the exiled bishops and restoring to the Pope his dominions. It may be imagined how much this vacillating state of the Royal mind will add to the difficulties and anxieties of the men who now govern Italy. In the meantime, it must not be supposed that the agencies for good are inactive. The Bible is circulated, largely through the efforts of the Scottish National Bible Society, to an extent unknown before; the Waldensian College has been opened in Florence almost free of debt, the principal funds having been raised by a few devoted friends in Glasgow and Liverpool, and the ill-natured attack of the Plymouth Brethren has had the good effect of welding the different Protestant agents in a spirit of more substantial unity than was before known. So that, upon a review of the whole state of affairs, there is reason for the friends of truth to "thank God and take courage."

The great war across the Atlantic shows few signs of coming to a close. Few signs, at least, to observers on this side the ocean; but it is to be observed that the Federals are just now more than usually sanguine that the war is near its end. They ground this on what they believe to be the signs of exhaustion in the South; and it is undoubtedly true that the glimpses we occasionally get into the state of the Confederate finances, for instance, show that they are in a state of all but hopeless collapse, their paper money having fallen about as low as the old French assignats. But it is forgotten that want of money never stopped a people fighting for their homes; and that it was when their assignats were at the lowest the French were most successful in repelling their invaders. It is not in the armies, at any rate, that the signs of exhaustion are apparent. In Virginia, the Confederates had begun movements in large force towards the North, and had captured several detachments, when their advance was stopped by the severity of the weather. So in the West, it is the Confederates, and not their opponents, who are resuming active operations. There is every reason to believe that the conscription is mercilessly enforced in the South. It has not been tried a second time in the North, and an attempt is made to get high bounties for enlistment to do its work. In the meantime, and whatever the issue of the war may be, it is consolatory to think that the negro race cannot fail to receive substantial benefit. They have already risen high in the social scale, and as the war goes on they rise higher. On New Year's-day four or five coloured gentlemen were admitted, with the whites, to pay their respects to the President. That one act marks a social revolution. It is calculated that one million out of the four million slaves in the South are already free; many of them work for their old masters at settled wages, which the Federal troops in the neighbourhood take care to see are paid. Even in the Southern States which have not yet been touched by the war, the negro is no longer in that hopeless, helpless, abject state he lately was; light is daily penetrating to the race; and if the war ended to-morrow, their masters could never again lord it over them as they once did. We congratulate our readers—it is the only subject of congratulation to be derived from this melancholy strife—on the fact that, whatever statesmen might have intended or intriguers planned, the way is now preparing for the happy solution of the great American problem—the future free condition of the negroes on the American continent.

Accounts from the Cape bring the information that Bishop Gray, of Cape Town, and the suffragan bishops whom he associated with himself in the cause, have found Bishop Colenso guilty of the nine charges of heresy which were alleged against him, and have pronounced judgment, depriving him of his office of bishop, and of all the rights and duties belonging to the office, unless he shall, before the 16th of next April, at farthest, make full recantation of his errors, in which case the sentence is to be considered null, as if it had never passed. We have nothing to say against the judgment, but we suspect that Bishop Colenso himself will not hold it of much account. There is strong doubt as to the right of Bishop Gray to sit in judgment over Bishop Colenso; and no doubt at all that Bishops Twells and Tozer, who are only missionary bishops, and do not even hold the letters patent of the Crown, have no such right. It is not in this way that the credit of the Church of England is to be vindicated. The same accounts state, as a rumour, which we sincerely hope will prove to be unfounded, that Dr. Livingstone has been murdered near Lake Nyassa.

By the Australian papers we learn that the various Presbyterian bodies in the colony of New South Wales, representing the Established Church of Scotland, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterian Church, formed themselves into one united body, as the Presbyterian Church of New South Wales. The completeness of the union was somewhat marred by the refusal of the body to receive the Rev. Dr. Lang and his congregation, apparently out of some local and personal jealousy; but it is supposed that this exclusion will be only temporary. Thus has happily been accomplished a union of bodies whose separation in a distant colony had no meaning, and which will make the one body much stronger than ever the separate portions could have been. We trust soon to be able to announce the union of two at least of these same denominations nearer home.

HOME.

The national heart has seldom been more deeply stirred than it was on the 8th of last month, by the news that the Princess of Wales was on that day safely delivered of a son. The birth seems to have been premature; it was, at all events, unexpected. The preparations had all been made in town, where also the medical attendants were engaged, but no time was left to send for either; and the future Sovereign of England (as we trust) was brought into the world by a country practitioner, hastily engaged for the purpose, and with fewer preparations made for his reception than fall to the share of the child of a common day labourer. So nearly the extremes of high and low sometimes meet in this world. We need not say that these little difficulties were only temporary, that female ingenuity speedily extemporised the necessary habiliments for the Royal babe, and that in a short time all the small annoyances were at an end by the arrival of the more costly articles of dress from Marlborough House. Even the forms of the Constitution prescribed to verify the birth of an heir to the British Crown were able to be complied with, for, by a happy accident, the Earl Granville, President of the Council, had arrived at Frogmore on an invitation to dine with the Prince and Princess; and though it may be supposed his dinner was spoiled, he was able to certify, as the Constitution prescribes, that the little stranger was no supposititious child. The public, however, turned with indifference from points like these, to fix their eyes upon our beloved Queen, who, on the news of the joyful event, hastened up from Osborne to attend at the bedside of her daughter-in-law, and to hail with more than maternal love and blessing the appearance of the Royal infant, who, we may fondly hope, is destined to continue her line, and reign over the children's children of her present subjects. Her appearance, as she moved about on this occasion, in the presence of her people, was that of one animated with the flush of a new hope, having once more an object worth living for, and stirring her with a new life; and we believe the feeling was universal, that this new blessing which Almighty God has given to her and to the people, may be made the means of weaning her from her deep sorrow, and recalling her to the active duties of that throne which she has now the prospect of seeing perpetuated to the third generation.

From all parts of the world whence the intelligence has had time to reach us, as well as from all parts of our own country, we receive cheering accounts of the earnestness and zeal with which the opening year was signalised by the observance of the Week of Prayer. It formed, in many places, a holy neutral ground—a sort of “God’s truce”—between the jarring of kindred, but often rival, denominations. There is gratifying evidence that every year these calls to united prayer are more heartily responded to, and more generally complied with.

The important Bishopric of Ely—the duties of which, for a considerable time, were most inadequately discharged, if discharged at all—having been vacated by the death of Dr. Turton, has been conferred upon the Rev. E. Harold Browne, Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. Mr. Browne has won golden opinions for his possession of those qualities which eminently fit him for the oversight of the diocese which includes Cambridge University. Of that University he has hitherto been one of the most distinguished ornaments; and his appointment to the episcopate, the Premier has earned another title to the thanks of all sound Protestants.

The Presbyterians of Ireland are about to apply to Parliament for an increase in the amount of the endowments allowed them under the name of the regium donum. A deputation of their body waited on the Lord-Lieutenant the other day, backed by a goodly array of members of Parliament, to secure his good offices with the Government on the subject. Their wish is to have the average allowance of 75*l.* a-year raised to 100*l.* The way in which it is distributed is something like the following: A minimum sum is fixed, we believe at 40*l.* which the congregation must contribute; if that is done, the Government supplements with a certain sum from the regium donum; if the congregation raise a larger sum, the larger amount is given, and so on up to the maximum. Thus the largest and wealthiest congregations receive the largest amount of the endowment; while in the case of the smallest congregations, instances have been known of ministers subscribing a considerable portion of their own salary in order to entitle themselves to the Government grant. It is, in fact, shrewdly suspected that the grant, instead of strengthening, paralyses the liberality of Irish Presbyterian congregations. The Lord-Lieutenant held out no hope to the deputation of success; and the ministers must have read the signs of the times to ill purpose if they entertain a different expectation.

The question of appointing Roman Catholic chaplains to gaols has occupied the attention of the magistrates in several counties during the last month. The discussions that have taken place at these meetings show how repugnant the spirit of the new act is to the principles and feelings of English gentlemen. There are few cases in which its main provision—the appointment of a chaplain—has been acted on; but where it has been adopted, all the magistrates content themselves with the alternative allowed of appointing a Roman Catholic priest at a fixed salary, who will visit the Roman Catholic prisoners, unless expressly desired to be excused from his services. This is not exactly what the Roman Catholics anticipated; and we may look for the controversy being renewed, year after year, the dispute being now removed from the Imperial Parliament to the county meetings of the magistrates. Something has been gained, however. The Roman Catholics are constrained to admit that there is no country in the world where they have more friends than in England; their complaint now is that the people at large distrust them. How cause for that distrust their own conduct has given it would be a profitable subject for them to inquire.

THE LATE DUCHESS OF GORDON.

"DIED, at Huntly Lodge, Aberdeenshire, on the 31st January, her Grace the Duchess of Gordon." This announcement has filled many hearts with sorrow, aggravated by some degree of surprise ; for although the Duchess died in her seventieth year, her last illness was short, and her death almost sudden, and she was not herself aware of being dangerously or even seriously ill before she had sunk into complete unconsciousness of all around her. No member of the Church of Christ in Scotland could leave a wider blank by removal, or be more deeply lamented by a large circle of mourners far and near, in all ranks, and of all denominations. The spectacle was deeply affecting as the funeral passed through Huntly. All work was suspended in the town, the shops closed, the places of business vacated, and the schools set free, one object engrossing rich and poor, young and old. At the gate of the lodge the funeral was met by a large procession of many hundred mourners, and by nearly seven hundred children from the schools built and supported by her Grace. In the town it was lined on both sides by crowds with sorrowing hearts and weeping eyes ; the spectators gazing with no vacant or curious stare at the plumed hearse, followed by the carriages of the more immediate mourners, but looking with wistful grief on the last they were to see on earth of their beloved and honoured lady ; and the mourners comforted in their own affliction by the rare sympathy of a sorrow at once so wide and so deep. Her life had been passed amongst them for half a century, with the exception of a break of nine years spent at Gordon Castle ; it had been mingled to nearly all with their longest, to most with their earliest, and to many with their happiest associations ; many were mourning for the loss of a personal benefactor, and all as if for the loss of a personal friend. Conveyed thirty miles by rail, the funeral passed through Elgin, in the midst of deep silence and respect and universal regard, to the burying vault of the Dukes of Gordon, in that most noble cathedral ; the coffin was placed beside her husband's, in the last space that remained untenanted by the deceased wearers of the ducal coronet and their children ; and till time shall be no more, the vault was for ever closed on the last and the best of an illustrious race, who had ennobled the title far more than it could ennoble her.

On the following day the first man that we chanced to meet, thinking that he spoke to a stranger, made these remarks in these exact words, while the tear moistened his aged eye : " This is the greatest calamity that ever befell this district ; of a' the dukes that reigned here, there was never nane like her ; there's nane in this neighbourhood, high or low, but was under some obligation to her, for she made it her study to benefit her fellow-men ; and what crowds o' puir cratur's she helped every day ; and then for the spiritual, Huntly is Huntly still in a great degree, but he gude that's been done in it is a' through her." The next but one upon the road was a soldier, who had seen hard service in the Crimean trenches, amidst the flowing blood of friend and foe. His countenance was changed by the force of a sorrow only beginning to subside ; it was too evident that his tears had been both many and bitter ; and even now he could not command his strong emotion, but broke out at once : " You know that I have seen much to render my heart callous, but I never was unmanned till now ; I never knew before how tenderly I loved that honoured lady." Let these two suffice out of many ; such tributes are not paid to characters of every-day occurrence. But we can scarcely hope to unveil the secret of her power over the hearts of men, except in the general statement : By the grace of God she was what she was ; and His grace bestowed upon her was not in vain, but she laboured more abundantly than all; yet not she, but the grace of God that was with her.

Elizabeth, Duchess of Gordon, was the only child and heiress of Mr. Brodie, of Arnhall, of the ancient Morayshire family of Brodie of Brodie. She was born in 1794, and was married in 1813 to the Marquis of Huntly, the most popular nobleman in that part of the country. She had been carefully educated, brought up in the highest principles of moral uprightness, and kept far from all associations fitted to contaminate the mind or blunt the moral susceptibilities; a training that can scarcely be too highly prized. But she was a stranger to the covenant of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world; and after her marriage there was much in the brilliant circle in which she moved to beguile the heart with the seductions of time and sense, and extremely little to lead her soul to the truth as it is in Jesus. How far she was herself at this time from any serious thought may be gathered from a single incident: an old uncle found her reading a novel on the Sabbath, and chid her for the impropriety, though he could not guide her further in the way of life. But there were several ministers in the Church of Scotland of eminent piety related not remotely to the young Lady Huntly by the ties of marriage; these bore her on their hearts as a special burden before the Lord, and after some years their earnest prayers were heard on her behalf.

The first direct instrument in the Lord's work upon her heart was a humble one; the rich and the poor meet together, the Lord is the Maker of them all; and the little captive maid of Israel, that waits on Naaman's wife, directs the lordly leper to the true source of healing. The Marchioness repaired in summer to a Highland residence of the Dukes of Gordon; and there she found a pious servant who had been left in charge of the house, whose fidelity she could appreciate, though she could not discern her grace. The mountain clanswoman could not but welcome her youthful lady with joy and pride, as so meet to wear the honours of the name; so tall and graceful in form, so beautiful in countenance, so noble in her bearing, so engaging in her manners, so full of life and mirth. But she was deeply grieved with her entire thoughtlessness for her immortal soul, and found occasion to drop some little seed of counsel on the heart that seemed so hard. There it lay unheeded for a time, but in due season the rain descended from above and the root began to strike.

The next influence was one that seemed not favourable, but adverse. In the large circle in which she now moved she was brought, for the first time and unexpectedly, to witness vice bearing a bold front that did not seek to veil itself from society. Her conscience was deeply wounded, and she was driven to her knees and to the Word of God. Her friends began to call her saint and Methodist; and she concluded, with characteristic vigour, that since she had got the name without deserving it, she might as well seek and find the reality, and become a saint indeed. She was knit to the Marquis with a most intense attachment, which only grew with length of years throughout his life; and his memory seemed more deeply cherished every year till her own death. In the end she trusted that the same Lord called him who had awakened her; but now he had no more thought of things eternal than she had herself at their marriage. But her attachment and regard were fully reciprocated on his part; although he could not sympathise, he neither despised nor thwarted her in her choice; and he had seen so much of the world and its emptiness, that he rather liked her choosing the domestic life which she now preferred.

But Lady Huntly had not yet found Christ; and if the first arrow in her heart was in the lonely Highlands of Scotland, and the second amid the gaieties of England, the last seems to have reached her in Geneva, that old citadel of the Reformation. A pious Swiss lady in that city appears to have been at length the means of leading her mind to the truth as it is in Jesus, and there He said himself to her soul, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest."

With her feet once fairly Zionward, she soon discovered in London a ministry that would guide her to the green pastures; she searched out a school companion with whom she could hold sweet fellowship; and she read the old divines with an intelligent earnestness that resulted in singularly clear views of scriptural truth, with a most discriminating judgment of her own, from which no opinions of others could move her. Her progress throughout was marked by the deliberation and slowness with which she took every step at first, and then by the firmness with which her foot was planted on the ground that had once been gained. The fulness of righteousness in Jesus Christ imputed to every believer, the penal satisfaction to Divine justice on the Cross, the Divine sovereignty and eternal election, the love of God to a perishing world, the work of the Spirit in renewing the heart, the fruit of the Spirit in holiness of life, the joyful assurance of faith and the lively hope of life everlasting, were both firmly grasped by her as doctrines of Scripture and practically submitted to, received, and rejoiced in with her whole heart.

Side by side with her glorying in the Cross of Christ as all her hope, there was a prompt, patient, and courageous taking up of the Cross and bearing it after Jesus. Her Christian character was thoroughly practical from the first, and the knowledge of the Lord's will throughout was followed step by step with walking in the Lord's way. Two deeply-rooted natural dispositions made her carrying of the Cross often peculiarly painful. One of these was an intense love of order, with dislike of all change, and deep aversion to disturb the settled economy of the social world; while the firm witnessing for truth, and the earnest spreading of the Gospel message, often led her into steps which to a heedless world or a slumbering Church savoured only of innovation, and seemed like "turning the world upside down." The other was great natural amiableness of disposition, in which her friends rejoiced as one of her chief attractions; but which she spoke of, with a mixture of severity and truth, as an excessive desire to please everybody, and often lamented as one of her most easily besetting sins. Her position of rank and influence, with ample means at her command, placing her in the midst of a wide circle, her talents and accomplishments rendering her a most attractive centre, and a marked and fascinating individuality of character—all gave a power of pleasing many in various ways, with a corresponding temptation to please the world in its more plausible demands. But grace so sanctified nature wherein it was innocent, and so overcame it wherein it was evil, that she boldly and steadfastly carried the Cross through all gainsaying and reproach; and at the same time so walked in love, so providing things honest in the sight of all men, so thinking of whatsoever is lovely and of good report, so immovable in her friendships of every kind even when they proved unworthy of her, so kind and faithful to every dependent, and so urbane to all, that even those whose views most differed from her own probably admired and loved her more as she was by the grace of God, than as they would themselves have had her to be.

After long and mature inquiry, along with much prayer, she became an attached and decided member of the Free Church of Scotland, and a munificent contributor to its various funds; but she ever cherished a most catholic and loving spirit to every member of the Church of Christ. A brother or sister in the mere outward Church was little or nothing to her; but a brother or sister in the Lord, by whatever other distinction known, or in circumstances however humble, was always dear to her for their common Saviour's sake.

acter, and brought out in beautiful relief in what might be regarded as the most prominent of all her works. Soon after her widowhood in 1836, and her consequent return from Gordon Castle to Huntly Lodge, she began to invite godly ministers, both from the neighbourhood and from a distance, for Christian fellowship and religious exercises; ministers who could enter into each other's sympathies, for it never occurred to her that "the life, literature, and doctrine," which sufficed for a Presbytery, could constitute a man of God. Those meetings were often singularly refreshing and fruitful, especially when, after an interval of absence, they were resumed in later years with a special view to conference amongst the ministers themselves. They were continued to the last, and one of a very impressive kind took place within three weeks of her death; she had invited the next for what turned out to be the day after her funeral. Yet she looked on this as merely giving her house to the Lord's servants; she interfered in no way with their arrangements, and counted it an ample recompense that she and her friends should afterwards hear of the more interesting topics of conversation. It was exactly the same when latterly she gave her grounds for large gatherings of people for the preaching of the everlasting Gospel. Before this time the ministerial meetings had been often followed by more public exercises in the Church; and the quickening of the ministers by conference was not without a marked effect in the quickening of all their congregations. For the last four years one of the parks was thrown open to the public for two days in Midsummer for prayer and preaching. From far and near many thousands eagerly assembled, with much awakening in the earlier years and abiding fruit, and always with deep solemnity, interest, and impression. Her house in every room was occupied with ministers and gifted laymen of all denominations and from all quarters; yet the Duchess was nothing in it all: it was very little good she could do in the world; throwing open her house to the Lord's servants to make their own arrangements, and her grounds to the people to hear God's Word, called for no personal interposition on her part, and no gratitude from them towards her. So also in her munificent gifts for missions, for the poor, for religion, for education; if her liberality was half refused, as being too great, she answered, "I am such a useless log, I can do no good directly to any body; but I have got a little money from the Lord, and the only service I can be of is to give it away for Him."

Her love for the means of grace, for the Word and sacrament and prayer, was most intense, and literally insatiable and boundless. Others may have excelled in grace, the Lord only knoweth; but we have never known man or woman, old or young, who exceeded her in love for the means of grace. The Word and prayer in secret, the Word and prayer in private, the Word and prayer and the Supper of the Lord in the meeting of His people, were loved and resorted to with unwearied perseverance and unceasing delight. Under bodily weakness she was often revived by a continuance in religious exercises which would have fatigued others in health and strength. Her spirit and habits were altogether the reverse of some who affect spiritual independence either of the regular ordinances of the Gospel or of more occasional opportunities; and till within a few days of her death, through frost and rain, sleet or snow, she was always in the house of God, at whatever effort, and always in time. Few ought to have been less dependent on outward means, yet none ever valued those means more highly, or improved them more earnestly; and her joy in the Holy Ghost, her assurance of the love of God, her steadfastness in holy walking and fruitfulness in all good works, amply proved how invaluable the means of grace are, and by the Lord's blessing how eminently effectual for growth in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Her increasing fruitfulness with increasing years was marked and evident to all who knew her. Others sometimes fade in old age ; grace seems in them to become less lively by abatement in the warmth of the natural affections or by the world occupying more space in the heart. But with her the growth was constant and decided, and only more abundant in the last three years of her life. Jesus Christ alone is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever ; but He hath said, Because I live, ye shall live also. He loved her, and gave himself for her, and revealed himself to her ; and having loved, He loved unto the end, and through grace she abode in His love. Continuing to love Him who had first loved her, she brought forth fruit in old age to show that the Lord is upright ; and to the very last hers was the path of the just—"Like the light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

The Duchess had built various schools, and largely assisted in the building of several churches in Scotland ; but her religious sympathies were not limited to her own country. From an early period of life she was frequently abroad ; she took a deep and helpful interest in the maintenance and spread of the Gospel in France, Italy, and Spain, and cultivated the friendship of many Christians on the Continent. Amongst these, she cherished a special love and esteem for the late Archduchess of Hungary, whose spirit was truly kindred with her own in love to the Lord Jesus Christ, zeal for the honour of His name, and desire for the salvation of souls.

Her end was rather sudden, and she left no parting words, and bore no dying testimony ; for she was not aware of the approach of death, when she became unconscious to all that was passing around. This may have been ordered lest others should exalt her above measure, for all His saints must decrease, that Christ alone may increase. But three years ago she was brought to the very brink of the grave, and lingered long on the borders of the eternal world. She was then filled to overflowing with the joy of the Lord ; she spoke one by one to her friends and servants, and in such a manner as deeply to move the hearts of all. The Lord our Righteousness, as she testified at the time, and often afterwards repeated, was then revealed to her in transcendent glory, with such rays of heavenly brightness, that she seemed hardly to know whether the illumination was merely spiritual or of the nature of a trance or vision. The issue of the chastening and of the holy rapture was in richer and riper fruits of the Spirit, in greater abundance of love, joy, peace, meekness, gentleness, goodness, faith, and patience.

The Duchess had a remarkable power and perseverance in intercessory prayer, and never forgot any person or object that had once engaged her interest. A thoroughly characteristic instance occurred a few months before her death, when one morning she said to her maid before rising, "I have been engaged with three things this morning that are all so different, and yet all occur to-day. I have been thinking of the Queen, who is to make her first public appearance to-day at Aberdeen, to inaugurate Prince Albert's statue ; of Mr. M——, in London, who is to preach to-night for the first time in what was a dancing academy in his parish ; and of John's (a young man who had formerly been in her service) examination this afternoon."

One of her great delights for several years had been to commit hymns to memory. These she loved to repeat at any time ; till her strength failed she would sing or hum them over in the early morning hours before she rose, and when weaker would rehearse them mentally. There were two which she had repeated with great earnestness to her friends within the last fortnight of her life. One was that founded on the dying words of Samuel Rutherford, "Glory dwelleth in Immanuel's Land," commencing thus :—

The sands of Time are sinking,
The dawn of Heaven breaks ;
The summer morn I've sighed for,
The fair sweet morn, awakes.

Dark, dark, hath been the midnight,
But dayspring is at hand ;
And Glory, Glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's land.

CALVIN'S CONVERSION.

The other is entitled "Rest," and begins—

My Saviour, thou hast offered rest,
Oh give it, then, to me ;
The rest of ceasing from myself,
To find my all in Thee.

Before sinking into unconsciousness and lying down in death, the last words she was heard to utter were taken from this hymn :—

In Thy strong hand I lay me down.

Having thus spoken, she fell asleep in a deep insensibility to all around ; and two days later, on the Sabbath evening, she fell asleep in Jesus, her soul entering on the rest of the everlasting Sabbath. It is narrated of one of the Dukes of Hamilton who died in early youth, that he called his younger brother to him the day before his death, and said, "To-morrow you'll be a duke, and I'll be a king." This beloved mother and princess in Israel wears the ducal coronet no more ; but her spirit mingle with the kings and priests above, and with them she casts her crown of glory before the Throne, saying, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive honour and glory and power: unto him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God, unto him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

CALVIN'S CONVERSION.

WHEN Calvin studied in Montaign College, about the year 1527, there was an agitation in Europe which made itself felt wherever men met together, and which was peculiarly potent in the seats of learning. The angel of the Reformation had cast the fire of God from his censer upon earth, and there were "voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake." The halls of Montaign College resounded with disputes on the new doctrines which had been promulgated in Germany, and, after what we have seen of Calvin's boyhood, it cannot surprise us to learn, as we do from D'Aubigné, that he "was at first in the number of the most inflexible adversaries of the Reformation." The history of that spiritual revolution by which he was converted from a devout and humble Roman Catholic into the greatest enemy by whom Rome was ever assailed, is one of the most interesting passages in the whole range of biography, and no small part of the value of D'Aubigné's recent volumes on the Reformation is due to their containing a clear and adequate representation of its leading facts and principal stages. In truth, it is when we enter the cell of Luther at Erfurth, or the chamber of Calvin at Paris, that we find ourselves at the fountain-heads of the Reformation ; and in no way can the contrast between the religion of Protestants and the modern religion of Romanists be so vividly exhibited as by tracing, in representative men on each side, that great change in the personal character which each believed to be conversion to God, which determined the subsequent activity of each, and which resulted, on the one hand, in reformed Christianity, and, on the other, in resuscitated Romanism.

The father of modern Romanism is Ignatius Loyola. No man can be named who represents more fitly or more fairly what has been best in the religion of Rome for the last three hundred and fifty years. He is a man whom Roman Catholics need not be ashamed, and of whom they are not ashamed. In his honour they have erected in Rome "two princely temples, with painting and many-coloured marble ;" his statue they have set up in "massive silver," his bones, "enshrined amidst jewels, are placed beneath the altar of God." To him, more than to any other man, is due the credit or the shame of having given to Romanism a new lease of life after it received the deadly wound of the Reformation.

No intelligent Romanist, therefore, can complain if we take Ignatius Loyola to afford an example of that faith, that devotion, that scheme of Christian belief and of Christian life, which, since the sixteenth century, Romanists have deemed superior to the religion of Protestants. In Calvin, on the other hand, whose spiritual experience at the turning point in his life resembled, in all essential respects, that of Luther in the same crisis, we are, for our part, ready to accept a representative Protestant. The reasons which induced him to leave the path beaten for him by the saints and martyrs of ten centuries, which made him choose another way, another truth, another life, from those set before him by the Church of his boyhood, which gave him courage to proclaim the Church of Rome fallen and apostate, and to call on all the true children of God to come out of her, appear to us satisfactory. Here, then, we have, so to speak, the history of the mighty schism of these last centuries in small compass and comprehensible form, all the vital points brought out with the clearness of miniature painting. The conversion of Loyola, and the conversion of Calvin—according as we prefer the one to the other of these, shall we be Romanists or Protestants. Let us endeavour to discriminate the systems, by a vivid apprehension of the differences in the spiritual history of the men.

Don Inigo Lopez de Recalde, as we learn from the impartial and accurate Ranke, was the youngest son of the house of Loyola, one of the first in Spain. Its chief had the distinction of being invited by a special document to the Spanish Court on occasion of swearing allegiance. Inigo, or Ignatius, was born at the castle of Loyola, in Guipuscoa, about the beginning of the sixteenth century. He was bred at the Court of Ferdinand the Catholic, in the train of the Duke of Najara. It was the period when Romanism was in its greatest vigour in Spain, and when the chivalrous devotion of the Spaniards to their faith was deepening into that intense and steady glow which burned so conspicuously for at least a hundred years in the south and centre of Europe. The Moors of Spain had been but lately subdued, and the battle-cries which had followed the victorious standards of Spain in her war against the infidel awoke boundless enthusiasm in the nation's heart. From the Spanish Peninsula had sailed those expeditions which opened a new world to the adventure and cupidity of Europe, and it was in the name of religion, by the authority of the Pope, that the sons of Spain took possession of countries whose soil appeared to teem with gold and silver. Ignatius Loyola was profoundly imbued with the inspiration of the time. He delighted in fine weapons and handsome horses, read the Amadis, and strove to win the honours of knighthood. Nor was it only in externals that he aspired to realise the ideal of mediæval chivalry; he was fired with ambition to be himself a romantic singer, and composed a romance of chivalry, with the first of the Apostles as hero. Such was his life before he was twenty-one—a life strangely contrasted with that of Calvin, when viewed as a preparation for deciding momentous questions touching the power of the Church and the way of salvation, but having nothing malignant in it, nothing coarsely or meanly bad, nothing worse than geniality, fancifulness, and brilliant eccentricity. At the age of twenty-one, he was struck down in the siege of Pampeluna by the French; both legs were injured; and defective medical treatment added to his misfortune.

Stretched on a sick bed, Loyola found solace in chivalrous romances, and read also the life of Christ, and some of the saints. "Fantastic," says Ranke, "by nature, thrown suddenly out of a path which seemed to promise him the most glittering future, excited by his illness, and by the same cause compelled to remain inactive, he fell into the strangest condition in the world. The exploits of Saint Francis and Saint Dominic, set before him in his books in all the lustre of spiritual renown, seemed to him worthy of emulation, and as he read of them he was conscious of valour and capacity to emulate them, and to rival those canonised heroes in self-abnegation and audacity. Frequently, however, thoughts like these gave place to ideas of a more worldly character. He painted himself to his own imagination as he would seek out the ladye-love to whose service he should devote himself—she was to be a countess, he said, no duchess, but something far better than these—he fancied how he would address her in delicate and sportive terms, how he would prove to her his devotion, how he would practise all knightly exercises in her honour. Now was the one kind of phantasy which transported him; now it was the other: each took its turn."

By degrees, however, the more, perhaps, because it became evident that he would never again shine in the fray or in the tournament, the spiritual reverence gained upon those of a more material cast. The transition was gradual, and the imagery of the romantic poetry was at first transferred to the more spiritual visionings. He saw two camps and two armies, the one that of Jerusalem, the other that of Babylon, the one that of Christ, the other that of Satan. On the one side stood all the good; on the other all the bad: the hosts were equipped and ready for mortal combat. Christ was a King who announced it as His resolution to subdue all the lands of the faithless. Whosoever would serve with Him must feed and clothe himself as He; must endure the same hardships and watchings; and must entitle himself to share in the rewards of victory. Thus did Loyola's dreams of worldly chivalry convert themselves into a chivalry whose ideal consisted in the exploits and austerities of saints. When he had proceeded to a certain point in this strange development, "he tore himself from his father's house, bade adieu to his relations, and ascended the mountain of Montserrat; not in contrition for his sins, not urged by any specially religious want, but, as he has himself declared, merely with a wish to accomplish as great deeds as those through which the saints had attained renown—to undertake as severe penances as they, or still severer; and to serve God in Jerusalem. He hung up weapons and armour before an image of Mary; he undertook before it, a different kind of watch from that of chivalry, but with express reference to the Amadis, where the practices of the knightly watch are so precisely stated: kneeling or standing in prayer, his pilgrim's staff ever in his hand. He gave away the knightly dress in which he had come; he provided himself with the coarse raiment of a hermit, whose lonely dwelling was hewn out in the naked rocks of the mountain." The spell in which he had involved himself asserted its might over him with ever-increasing potency, his enthusiasm mounting gradually to the pitch of mania. Entering a Dominican monastery, he subjected himself to the severest mortifications. He rose to pray at midnight. Seven hours out of the twenty-four were spent on his knees. He lashed himself three times a-day. Peace, however, seemed to fly his embrace. He read in the life of some father that God could be propitiated by abstinence from food. For a whole week he tasted nothing. But for the command of his confessor to take nourishment, he might have killed himself in these maniacal extravagances. At times his melancholy rolled off, but it speedily returned, and occasionally prompted him to commit suicide. He lived in a world of his own feelings and phantasies, brightened now and then by rays of troubled and uncertain light from legendary histories. Those are weighty words of Ranke's: "We do not find Loyola that he searched the Scriptures." He made up his mind, on purely subjective grounds, that those suggestions which solaced and delighted him were from the Spirit of God, and that those which pained and exhausted him were from Satan. "One day he seemed to awake from a dream. It came upon him with the force of a tangible reality that all his pains were temptations of Satan. He resolved that from that hour, he should shut himself off from his past life, that he would ne-again open or touch his wounds. This is not so much an attainment of rest as a resolution." By a determined effort of will, he crushes down his apprehensions and discontents; no light, that we can hear of, visits him from Heaven; no reasonable, intelligent, persuasion is formed that he has passed from a state of sin into a state of acceptance; there is no glimpse of pardon through the sacrifice and the righteousness of Christ; there is no reference to the Word of God.

The spiritual condition and the religious activity of Loyola were now virtually settled. He had many subsequent experiences, and he undertook a systematic course of classical, philosophical, and theological study; but he had already steeled himself against change, and no new guiding star arose on his soul. He was by nature all passion and enthusiasm, the emotional faculty developed out of proportion to the intellectual, a creature of impulse and imagination; but with this order of mind was singularly united in his case the instinct of obedience. He was a soldier and a Spaniard; to obey seemed, in his eyes, to partake of the character of duty, irrespective of the nature of the command. When disease added its disturbing element to the other ingredients of agitation in his soul, he was prepared to become a St. Francis, a St. Simeon Stylites, a mad hermit of the desert, anything that was sufficiently wild and extravagant; and he clung with rapture to a Church which, while finding a channel for the feverish excitement of his mind, provided him also with full gratification for his instinct of obedience.

How different from this was the transition by which the great Reformers passed from subjection to the Pope to belief in the Bible! We are all familiar with Luther's struggles in Erfurth, and his unconquerable persistence in the study of the Word until the message of salvation broke like dawn upon his soul. The robust, sagacious, healthy-minded and healthy-hearted German was not the man to be put off with dreams and illusions, with intense impressions originating he knew not whence, with the romantic piety of eremites or knight-errants. He was loyal, indeed, as he was brave; profoundly attached to what he had been accustomed to hold sacred; but he felt that obedience to man may, in certain cases, be a sin, and not a duty. In the conversion of Calvin we have a still stronger contrast with that of Loyola than is presented by the conversion of Luther. There was in Luther an emotional and imaginative heat which bore some distant resemblance to the excitability of Loyola. He could see visions, though he was too wise to believe in them; he could feel with passionate intensity, though he brought all his feelings to the test of the law and the testimony. But the light of Calvin's intellect was, to use Bacon's image, naturally one of the driest ever possessed by man. It is not too much to say that he was removed by centuries, in respect of intellectual development, from the fiery Biscayan youth, who hung with childish wonderment and childish credulity over legends of warlike saints, who hoped to move God by starving himself for a week, and was in so many respects a mere anachronism of Don Quixote. Young Calvin, enjoying the best culture of the age in Paris, was in the front rank of the world's enlightenment; young Loyola was yet thrilling with the enthusiasm of a superstition which once had been beautiful, which had babbled in sweet fairy tales to the infant intelligence of Europe, but which was now in hopeless decay. Should we turn upon these two youths the telescope of history, as they appear in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and endeavour to pronounce upon their destinies apart from the actual knowledge we possess concerning them, our decision would be that Calvin was specially fitted to act as high priest in the marriage, then about to be celebrated, between Reason and Faith in Europe, and that Loyola was of all men most likely to insist that Faith should still wear the hood of superstition, and that Reason, an outcast from the Church, should be left to go her own way, to Infidelity, to Atheism, or whither she would. But we must look more particularly at that transition by which Calvin was prepared for the mighty task before him.

We have seen that, in disputes with his fellow-students on the new doctrines proclaimed by Luther, Calvin took the side of Rome. He rebuked his cousin, Pierre Robert Olivetan, who had already abandoned the errors of the Romish Church, and who was deeply versed in Scripture. He prayed to the saints to intercede for this poor heretic. He was shocked with the novelty of the doctrines which Olivetan drew direct from the Scriptures, and repelled his arguments with energy and anger. Yet there was an influence in what Olivetan said which he could not shake from his mind. "There are many false religions," urged his cousin, "and only one true." A lover of unity in the depths of his soul, Calvin did not hesitate to assent. "The false," proceeded Olivetan, "are those which men have invented, according to which we are saved by our own works; the true is that which comes from God, according to which salvation is given freely from on high." This was more than Calvin would allow; nor would he listen as yet to Olivetan's admonition to search the Scriptures. But when we follow him into his chamber, we perceive that he is ill at rest. Two principles, each of great power in his soul, contend for the mastery: the one is deference to the teachings and traditions of the past, modest distrust of his own judgment, reverence for the opinion of those whom he looks upon as his superiors; the other is love of truth. In his heart of hearts he wishes to get rid of these novelties, and to live and die in the faith in which he was born; but he will not stifle conviction, he will not trample down what may, after all, be the truth of God. His modesty, his habit of obedience, render him careful, patient, earnest in examining what is set before him as truth; they do not shut him up to a foregone conclusion that it is heresy. It was at this point that a subtle and deadly poison insinuated itself into the heart of Loyola. He believed intensely, he obeyed devoutly before he had satisfied himself that the belief was not a delusion and the obedience not a bondage. "Obey your earthly superiors," he cried, with an emphasis which overlooked the question whether obedience to earthly superiors was consistent with obedience to God. In Ignatius himself the deviation from the line of rectitude was, to human observation, slight; but in his tenet of implicit obedience to the Church lay the essential iniquity of Jesuitism, the baneful and accursed doctrine that the God of truth can be served with a lie. Calvin could not smother the doubt which arose in his soul, but from the depths of his distress and agitation he called on the Most High to send him light. "O God, illumine me with Thy light!" It was a simple prayer, but it contained more than Loyola put into seven hours of petition to the saints and the Virgin.

But he was yet far from the goal. A whisper reached his instructors that John Calvin, the lad of brilliant genius, so admirably adapted to be a pillar of the Church—so decorous, submissive, and devout—was becoming infected with the new heresies. They called him before them, and, according to the measure of their light, spoke to him earnestly and affectionately. Was it not, they said, the height of wisdom to obey the Church? Did not man's highest dignity consist in justification wrought out by works? Calvin exclaimed that he was miserable on account of the burden of his sins. This was well, they told him, but mercy could be obtained. By confession, by absolution, by persistence in good works, the memory of offences could be blotting out; and if anything remained defective, were there not penances and purifications?

It was sweet to Calvin to hear the voice of authority discoursing in these homely accents, and inviting his soul to what appeared to be the certainty of repose. His heart yielded to the tender yet mighty enchantment, and he resolved with all his strength of will that he would take the path commended by those kind advisers. He set about performing good works; he confessed; he gave every satisfaction the priests chose to demand. But the burden of his sins was not removed; he shuddered before the terrible face of an angry God; and, returning to his advisers, he asked them what he should do. They bade him try the saints, and a momentary relief was the result of his despairing cries for their intercession. He tried to escape into the quiet regions of study, and buried himself once more among his beloved books. But neither the flattering assurances of priests, the fancied intercession of saints, nor the delights of study, could lull Calvin to sleep in a refuge of his. "Every time I descended into myself," he thus described his state in other days, "every time I raised my mind to God, the extremity of horror was upon me." So penances, no satisfactions, could medicine his soul; and the more he sought to apply anodynes to his conscience, the more keenly was it pierced through by the arrows of the Lord. "Thus," says D'Aubigné, "step by step did Calvin descend to the lowest depths of despair; and quite heart-broken, and looking like one dead, he resolved to take no further pains about his salvation. He lived more with his fellow-pupils, he even shared in their amusements; he visited his friends in the city, sought such conversation as would divert his thoughts, and desired, with the Athenians of old, either to tell or to hear some new thing. Will the work of God, begun in his heart, remain unperfected?" That was now the question of questions for Calvin; and, looking to the sequel, we may say that it was the question of questions for Christendom.

The moment was indeed critical for the young man. He was trying to escape the Divine eye. He had turned to the priests, and found their nostrums futile; he had turned to the world, and to the charms of study. Would he now be content? Would he tread the flowery path of letters and scale the heights of intellectual fame? Would he for ever turn away from these irritating novelties? Would he settle back into plausibilities and illusions? Would he heal the wound of his spirit slightly? Would he sear his conscience and deny his God? If we were inditing a hero-worshipping biography, we should reply that Calvin was incapable of this; that he started like a giant from his slumbers, and pressed onward towards the gates of truth and of light. But Calvin himself would have been the first to remind us of that sublime and profound counsel of the Word of God: "Turn thou from man whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of?" Calvin himself would have been the first to tell us that he would have forsaken God if the Almighty had withdrawn His Spirit from him. This much, however, we may say, that, since his spasmodic efforts to obtain peace proved, as they were likely to prove, unavailing, the intellect of Calvin was too clear and penetrating, and his moral courage too great, to make it possible for him to disguise the essential question at issue, namely, whether this gospel of his cousin Olivetan's was the true Gospel or was not. He saw that the new teachers were in earnest—this truth was written for him in martyr-fires. Their faith brought them peace: this was plain from the joyous confidence of Olivetan and his friends in that Christ whom they had found in the Scriptures. He had tried the Church and the world; reason and fairness demanded that he should make trial of the Saviour.

Then the change came. The crisis is thus described by D'Aubigné: "A great trembling came over him; he paced his room as Luther had once paced his cell at Erfurth. He uttered (he tells us) deep groans, and shed floods of tears. He was crushed beneath the weight of his sin. Terrified at the Divine ~~Revelation~~, like a leaf tossed by the wind, like a man frightened by a violent thunder-storm, he exclaimed, 'O God! Thou keepest me bowed down, as if thy bolts were falling on my head.' . . . Then he fell at the feet of the Almighty, exclaiming, 'condemn with tears my past manner of life, and transfer myself to thine. Poor and wretched, I throw myself on the mercy which Thou hast shown us in Jesus Christ I enter that only harbour of salvation.'" He now found the peace for which he had long and vainly sought, and with all the powers of his soul he drank from that fountain of light which had been opened to him in the Scriptures. This was no blind resolution to crush down all scruples and misgivings, like that of Loyola—no irrational conclusion that, on account of fasting, penance, and the prayers of saints, the Most High had been appeased—no cold fit of superstition naturally ensuing after the hot fit had passed away: it was the calm and intelligent appropriation, by faith, of that righteousness which man lost by the fall, and which was again wrought out for him in the life, the death, the resurrection, of the Mediator between God and man.

P. B.

BISHOP COLENZO ON THE DELUGE.

THERE now lies before us Part I. of the Bishop of Natal's well-known work on the Pentateuch, with the significant words inscribed on the title-page, "Fifth Edition, revised. We are surprised to find that, notwithstanding the revision spoken of, a very obvious scientific error still meets us on the threshold of the volume. The Bishop has been showing that very formidable difficulties attach to the belief that the flood was literally universal over the world. He is aware, however, that many Christians believe that these difficulties may be almost entirely removed by supposing that the flood, though extensive enough to submerge all that part of the earth inhabited by man, still was not universal over the globe. In his eagerness to render this refuge untenable, he vehemently contends that the language of Scripture seems to point at absolute universality, besides which, mathematical and physical science entirely overthrows the notion of a partial deluge. To quote his own statement on the latter point: "No is anything really gained by supposing the deluge to have been partial. For a waters must find their own level on the earth's surface, without a special miracle of which the Bible says nothing, a flood which should begin by covering the top of Ararat (if that were conceivable), or a much lower mountain, must necessarily become universal, and in due time sweep over the hills of Auvergne," &c. To the same effect he adds in the preface of Part II.: "He (i.e., an inquirer) will find also that mathematical and physical science, as well as the plain texts of Scripture equally forbid our believing in a partial deluge, since that involves a universal flood." No retraction or modification of the opinion now expressed has fallen under our observation; we therefore assume, liable of course to correction if we err,* that it is still entertained by its author. If so, then unquestionably Bishop Colenso has fallen into a serious scientific error, as he will have pointed out to him if he make application to any of his geological friends. It is now the universal belief of those most competent to judge, that partial deluges are produced, not by the elevation of the sea, but by the subsidence of the land. Prior, indeed, to 1802, geologists were accustomed to reason, as the general public still do, on the contrary hypothesis; but in that year the celebrated Professor Playfair, in his "Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory," pointed out the difficulties inherent in the view then generally entertained

* Since this clause was put in type, the fourth volume of Colenso's work on the Pentateuch has appeared. On glancing over it, we find that he has not yet abandoned the view expressed in the foregoing quotations from his earlier works. Thus at page 207 he says, with unabated confidence "But, indeed, the waters of a deluge that could cover 'the high hills that were under the whole heaven,' and the 'mountains' in Armenia, must have found their level on the surface of the whole earth, unless the law of gravitation was suspended, by another stupendous miracle, for the space of twelve months."

and introduced the hypothesis which has since met with nearly universal acceptance. As it is of importance to indicate some competent authority for the statement now made, we subjoin an extract from the anniversary address delivered, in 1846, before the Geological Society of London, by Mr. Leonard Horner, its President that year. He says :—

Such comparatively modern changes in the relative level of the land and sea were ascribed by the earlier geologists, and are by some still ascribed, to a rising or sinking of the sea. Playfair nearly half a century ago, combating this opinion, maintained by the Swedish naturalist Celsius, demonstrated the untenable nature of such a hypothesis. It was he who first showed that these changes of relative level are alone explicable by the movements of the land; and that a permanent change of level of the sea in detached regions of the earth's surface is physically impossible. "The imagination," he says, "naturally feels less difficulty in conceiving that an unstable fluid like the sea, which changes its level twice every day, has undergone a permanent depression in its surface, than that the land, the terra firma itself, has admitted of an equal elevation." In all this, however, we are guided much more by fancy than by reason; for in order to depress or elevate the absolute level of the sea by a given quantity, in any one place, we must depress or elevate it by the same quantity over the whole surface of the earth, whereas no such necessity exists with respect to the elevation or depression of the land. To make the sea subside thirty feet all around the coast of Great Britain, it is necessary to displace a body of water thirty feet deep over the whole surface of the ocean. It is evident that the simplest hypothesis for explaining these changes of level is that they proceed from the motion, upwards or downwards, of the land itself, and not from that of the sea. As no elevation or depression of the sea can take place but over the whole, its level cannot be affected by local causes, and is probably as little subject to variation as anything to be met with on the surface of the globe." (Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory, p. 446.) Notwithstanding that this manswerable doctrine was thus clearly laid down so far back as 1802, we still find geologists of authority speaking of the sea having risen or fallen, in their endeavours to explain certain phenomena.

Speaking of the frequency with which the land has risen and fallen in past geological time, Mr. Horner adds :—

That land in various parts of the earth has undergone movements of elevation and depression, and that it has been subject to such oscillations at all times up to the present day, admits, I think, of no doubt; without, therefore, going quite so far as my friend Mr. Darwin, who tells us that "daily it is forced home on the mind of the geologist that nothing, not even the wind that blows, is so unstable as the level of the crust of this earth;" still I believe, it may be safely affirmed, that the stability of the sea and the mobility of the land must be acknowledged to be demonstrated truths in geology.

Our readers will pardon the length of this extract, which will have answered its purpose if it impress upon them the geological doctrine so often reiterated, and which has so obvious a bearing on the case of the Noachian deluge. From what Playfair and Horner state—and it would have been easy to adduce also other authorities—it is evident that geologists do not admit that either mathematical or physical science interposes any difficulty in the way of accepting the idea of a partial deluge. Nay more, they hold that the submergence of large portions of the world beneath the deep, while other parts of the earth have remained unflooded, is not merely a possible occurrence, but has been an oft-repeated phenomenon of all bygone time. Thus Mr. Darwin shows that, during a modern part of the secondary period, the greater portion of the continent of South America must have subsided in mass; then after a time been raised anew from the waters, finally sinking again. Thus also sea-shells, many of them of species still existing in northern latitudes, have been found at Moel Tryfane, near the Menai Straits, at an elevation of 1,392 feet above the level of the ocean, plainly indicating that at a period, geologically considered, quite recent, though earlier than the historic, or probably even the human epoch, the mountains of North Wales were at a least a quarter of a mile lower than at present, and in large measure submerged under the sea. Or to take one illustration more, recent investigations have shown that oscillations of level, due principally to subterranean movements, are even yet taking place on the Caspian Sea, near the primeval seat of man; and partly from this, partly from other causes, old buildings are seen at some places beneath the waves, at others high upon the shore, yet so perforated by marine animals as to indicate that at one period they too must have been beneath the water.

The view, then, held by those who believe that the deluge of Scripture, though extensive enough to destroy all the human race with the exception of Noah's family, yet covered but a limited part of the world, is not open to the objection from physical science which Bishop Colenso brings against it. It is not held, as he supposes, that the sea rose far above its ordinary level, till it overtopped the highest mountains, and yet that somehow, even without the aid of miracle, gravitation failed to act upon the water, and hence the partial was not converted into a universal flood. The idea entertained is that what had happened many times previously from natural causes did so once again, but on this occasion miraculously; that, at a certain period, divinely indicated beforehand, the earth began slowly and imperceptibly to sink beneath the feet of the guilty generation that had rejected Noah's preaching. As it gradually went down into the depth, rents would run in all directions from the sinking territory, some of which would soon communicate with the ocean, "break up the fountains of the great deep," and let its whelming water in. Disturbances at the same time were made to take place in the firmament overhead and the rain fell heavy and fast, adding, in no slight degree, to the fearful terror felt, by swelling into a foaming and resistless torrent every rill that trickled down mountain side, though in reality it was the influx of ocean rather than the continuous discharge from the clouds above that made the swelling waters rise. One by one the inferior eminences sink into the abyss and disappear; and, finally, the highest mountain peaks are buried in the depths. Now, with the exception of the ark, which seemed like a tiny speck upon a limitless ocean, nought is anywhere discernible, excepting only sea and sky. When the appointed time comes for the removal of the fearful visitation, the waters slowly assuage; or, to use scientific language, there is a slow upheaval of the land, till at length it reaches the level which it occupied before. No Christian, so far as we know, has, within recent years, gone so deeply into the subject as the lamented Hugh Miller, in lectures seventh and eighth of the "Testimony of the Rocks;" and his fine poetic imagination enabled him to depict the scene of the Noachian deluge with unrivalled power.

It is not our object in this article to examine the language in which Holy Scripture describes the extent of the flood. All that is needful to our present purpose is to remind inquirers that the destruction of the old world will of course be described by the inspired writer in ordinary human language—in other words, in the language of appearance, if not in the technical terms for which geologists contend. Astronomers, as every one knows, are quite satisfied to speak of sunrise or sunset without any uncalled-for allusion to the rotation of the earth. And if geologists have been successful in introducing correct language in regard to the oft-repeated oscillations of land and water, of which they have obtained satisfactory evidence, let it not be forgotten that even they require an occasional warning ex cathedra, like that in 1846, to prevent them from lapsing into the heresy of using the language of appearances like ordinary men. To constitute the Bible a book not for learned societies, but for the human race, it was necessary that it should avoid scientific terms; hence we do not read that the land subsided, but that "the waters stood above the mountains." The foregoing remarks are obviously completely fatal to the objection which the Bishop of Natal derives from physical science against the doctrine of a partial flood. And be it observed that the position he takes up in this matter, though manifestly founded in error, is held by him with such undoubted confidence, that he brings it forward continually in the prefaces to the successive portions of his work on the Pentateuch, as if he would make it, with a few other difficulties also mentioned in his prefaces, to use a military phrase, the very key of his position. Yet it is manifestly unfit to bear the brunt of battle, as we doubt not Bishop Colenso will himself discover after a time. Should this article ever fall under his notice, we would intreat him to admit the possibility, to say no more, that, if a stumbling-block in the way of faith, which he had deemed absolutely insurmountable, can be thus easily passed, other difficulties, to which he himself attaches less importance, may also somehow admit of satisfactory solution.

R. H.

THE LATE MR. GEORGE HITCHCOCK.

GEORGE HITCHCOCK was born in the village of Southmolton, in Devonshire. His mother was an earnest Christian, and for many years a member of the Congregational Church at Great Torrington, where she anticipated by only a few years the entrance of her son George into the joy of his Lord.

George Hitchcock spent the first years of his business life in Exeter, thence he came up to London; and whilst engaged in some of the large metropolitan establishments, obtained that knowledge of his own peculiar aptitude for business, and that maturity of experience, which prepared him to start for himself on Ludgate-hill, and subsequently justified his opening the more extensive establishment in St. Paul's-churchyard.

His remarkable abilities for his calling, and the extraordinary energy, which never seemed to fail him, soon became known; and overcoming every obstacle, he speedily upreared a large and lucrative business. Early and late he was to be found attending to the details of management. He engaged every assistant, watched with keen eye their individual character and capabilities, while his example, not less than his command, gave life to the whole machinery. In the year 1841 some pious young men were led, in God's good providence, into Mr. Hitchcock's service. The hours of business were then extremely late, and the general character of the young men was very dissipated. It ought also to be distinctly confessed that up to and after the year 1841 the principal was a thorough man of the world. Bitterly did Mr. Hitchcock afterwards lament the ungodliness of his earlier London life. His own description of himself as a "brand plucked from the burning," is, perhaps, the most true and apt—"a great sinner saved by great grace."

It was in this uninviting field, and under such circumstances, that one of the above-mentioned pious young men started a mutual improvement society, while another began a weekly prayer-meeting. Both these efforts grew into importance and efficiency. A Bible-class and a Young Men's Missionary Society were afterwards formed in the house.

Mr. Hitchcock heard of these movements, and did not discourage them. On the contrary, to the surprise of all, he manifested an interest in them, and showed marked kindness to those who had become conspicuous as ringleaders in the unwonted stir which now agitated the intellectual and moral circles of his establishment. Nearly two years passed thus, during which the prayers of God's servants in the house were answered in the conversion of several young men; but the petitions put forth for the principal seemed unavailing. At last, however, to their unspeakable joy, a great and decided change was observable in the spirit and conduct of their employer. Doubtless in answer to their prayers, he was brought under the faithful preaching of a pious Evangelical clergyman, through whose instrumentality our Heavenly Father brought this wanderer home to himself. In the autumn of 1843 he began to express concern for the spiritual welfare of his young men, provided a chaplain to conduct morning worship, and sought by various means (as himself was wont to put it) to redeem the past. He then became president of the recently-formed Young Men's Missionary Society, and continued to attend its annual festivals, with his family, until the time of his last illness.

A missionary spirit was thus fostered among his employés. Some have gone forth from his house of business to the mission field; others have entered colleges and universities, to prepare for the ministry at home. Not less than seven of his young men were preparing at one time for the Christian ministry; and some of them are now in this metropolis ministers of Independent and Baptist Churches, while one at least is a clergyman in the Church of England.

Mr. Hitchcock became also the treasurer and munificent patron of the Young Men's Christian Association, a society originated by his partner and son-in-law, and one which, with the Early Closing Association, is second to none in the widespread good it has conferred upon the young men of England. The sentiments universally expressed by the committees of the various religious societies and by the Evangelical press in general; the wail of sorrow which rose from all who knew his worth, at the loss sustained by the Church on earth at his death—will convey some idea of the esteem and love which enshrined the memory of this just man.

Nor were the young men of his establishment and of the metropolis insensible to his labours and generosity on their behalf. When he first joined the Early Closing Movement, a splendid Bible, with a suitable address and inscription, was presented to him by the members of his own house.

Some years afterwards, when he took a still further step in abridging his hours of business, an incident took place which reveals his growing moral influence over young men, and which should encourage other employers to enter upon a similar righteous course—his assistants pressed upon his acceptance a massive silver ink-stand, with the following significant text inscribed after his name: "He despiseth the gain of oppressions." (Isaiah xxxiii. 15.)

Subsequently, several hundred young men in and out of London subscribed and presented to Mrs. Hitchcock an admirable portrait of Mr. Hitchcock, painted in oil, and executed in life size by Sir John Watson Gordon.

A narrative of the last twenty years of the life of Mr. George Hitchcock would tell of his princely and catholic benevolence to societies and individuals, of his noble transparency of character, united to sagacious discrimination, tact, and power, in dealing with men. Great was his known success as a witness for Christ, and how much more will the future unfold.

The following incident may supply an illustration of the simple methods by which he used to impress religious truth upon the minds of strangers whom he met. At church one Sunday morning a lady was admitted to his pew. As she was a stranger, when the time for praise came he offered her his hymn-book. The hymn to be sung commenced with the words, "My God." Mr. Hitchcock took his pencil, and with a significant manner underlined the word my. Nothing was said on either side, but after the lapse of a considerable period a lady called at his office, and introduced herself by the mention of this circumstance. She had left his pew wondering what sort of man that could be who could so think of God as his God. Thoughtfulness resulted in religious conviction, prayer, and conversion; and the object of her visit to him at this time was to beg him to see and to instruct in the way of faith her dying husband, an officer of some rank, who, conscious of his dying condition, wanted to see the man who had such confidence in God. This service of love was gladly accepted by Mr. Hitchcock, and led to results full of joy and hope.

tion has therefore been deferred. The most significant feature in this discussion is the speech of the Duke de Morny, who is in the full confidence of Napoleon III. He said, in so many words: "If, in concert with the Holy Father, they would afford to him a high position (grande situation), worthy of the head of the Roman Catholic religion, is there one of us who would hesitate to give up Rome to the Romans, and to withdraw our troops, who, after all, are, to the Romans but foreign bayonets?" These words reveal the intentions of our Government, which is weary of the occupation of Rome, and seeks to obtain terms of accommodation between Pius IX. and Victor Emmanuel. The Ultramontanes have become alarmed and irritated by the Duke de Morny's speech.

The question of Mexico has given occasion to longer and more exciting discussion. M. Thiers strongly condemned this expedition, undertaken at the solicitation of fugitive Mexicans (the exiled bishops), who had taken their dreams for realities. The illustrious orator cannot understand why the Imperial Cabinet should have yielded to the wishes of these men of the old régime. He believes that the best plan to adopt would be to enter into arrangements, as soon as possible, either with Juarez, or with some other representative of liberal sentiments, in order to free ourselves from an affair which costs much money and blood, without any reasonable prospect of success. The majority of the Legislative Chamber did not, it is true, vote in favour of the amendment supported by M. Thiers. But this debate has shown, most completely, that all France is desirous of the prompt evacuation of Mexico.

It is curious and instructive that the general-in-chief of the French army, M. Bazaine, has excited the resentment of Monsignor Labastida, Archbishop of Mexico. And why? Because he has not despoiled those who have acquired ecclesiastical property, and has authorised the opening of a Protestant chapel in the Mexican capital. Indè ira. The Monde, the organ of the Jesuits, asserts that "the introduction of Protestantism into Mexico is a misfortune and a humiliation." Archbishop Labastida declares, for his part, that religious liberty is an outrage upon the faith. That is to say, these incorrigible champions of Papal despotism, after having employed French bayonets to shed the blood of their enemies, would now fain become absolute masters of Mexico, and revolt against their protectors, who stand in the way of their restoring the theocracy of bygone ages! Take in hand the cause of the Jesuitical faction after this! The first time you oppose them, you will meet with ingratitude and hatred. Certain, Napoleon III. must be very disgusted with the conduct of those whom he has endeavoured to serve at the expense of his popularity.

THE POPE REMONSTRATING WITH THE PRIESTS OF LYONS.

I mentioned in one of my former letters (December, 1863, p. 579) the controversy which had broken out between the Archbishop of Lyons and the clergy of his diocese respecting the Breviary. You remember that Cardinal de Bonald, a poor tool of the Jesuits, ordered the priests to make use of the Roman liturgy, and that the parish priests and their curates, seconded by the canons of the cathedral, flatly refused to obey their spiritual superior. The quarrel subsequently assumed larger proportions. The French Government and the Pope have interfered, in a direct way, and thus I have some fresh details to relate, which may prove of interest to your readers.

It must first be remarked, that all the clergy (ninety-nine priests out of every hundred) were of the same mind in their acts of opposition. In vain have the partizans of the Cardinal-Archbishop showered upon them the odious epithets of disturbers of the peace of the Church, rebels, enemies of the Holy See, &c.; the clergy disdained this abuse, and maintained that they had a right to retain the old liturgy of Lyons. It is as well to add that the laity of the city and the diocese have made common cause with the priests against the Archbishop. And then observe that the Minister of Worship and Napoleon III. himself declared for the priests, and against the pretensions of M. de Bonald. The French Ambassador at Rome received orders to give his warm support to the remonstrances of the Lyonnese curés and canons.

What has occurred lately is this: A deputation of the clergy, consisting of five respected ecclesiastics, went to the city of the Vatican, with a petition, signed by 1,400 priests, or almost the whole of the clerical body, in order to ask the Pope to allow them to retain their old Breviary.

Pius IX. found himself in a very embarrassing and disagreeable position. On the one hand, how could he disavow without dishonour Cardinal de Bonald, who had simply obeyed his own command? But, on the other, was it possible to displease Napoleon III., to resist the direct and pressing interference of the French Ambassador, to answer book, the Prince de Broglie supposed that it would also accept a refutation of that sceptical romance. He therefore forwarded to the editor of the Revue his thoughtful and well-written composition. The Prince de Broglie is a distinguished historian, an accomplished man of letters, and a member of the French Academy. He was well entitled to expect that his contribution would be inserted. But the editor peremptorily refused, notwithstanding the entreaties of M. Guizot and other illustrious men. What must we conclude from this fact? That the proprietors of the Revue des Deux Mondes are not afraid of attacking Christianity, and believe that it would be contrary to their interests to defend it. Here is a sad symptom of our religious condition. Infidelity finds the door open to address the entire country; religion is only allowed to speak in periodicals of an inferior class.

This same Revue inserted, I admit, a laudatory article upon M. Alexandre Vinet, whose name is honourably celebrated in the Evangelical world. But M. Vinet is represented by the writer of the article as a liberal Christian rather than as the advocate of revealed truth. This was an argument for religious liberty, not the indication of a wish to favour the Gospel, and we must confess that the most influential literary organs do not at all sympathise with religious things. This is one of the effects of the vulgar and superstitious Romanism patronised by the Jesuits.

In a recent sitting of the French Academy, Count de Carné, who delivered the opening address, was coolly listened to, while M. Viennet, who replied, was warmly applauded, as he pronounced a panegyric upon Voltaire. These are signs of the times. Literature is becoming separated, more and more, from religion.

SPREAD OF LIBRARIES FOR THE PEOPLE.

If we glance at another sphere of intellectual activity, it is consolatory to see that generous citizens are devoting some portion of their means to the diffusion of knowledge among operatives and the peasantry. You will not be surprised to learn that those who set this good example belong, for the most part, to the Protestant communions. The impulse has been given by the departments of the Upper and the Lower Rhine, in other words, by Alsace, where the adherents of the Reformation are very numerous. M. Jean Dolfus, mayor of the industrial town of Mulhouse, himself a manufacturer, and possessing a large fortune, has taken the initiative in this movement.

The object of the association is to establish in each little town or village a local library (bibliothèque communale), from which, for very small consideration, good books may be borrowed. The books embrace the entire circle of human knowledge—history, science, the natural sciences, the fine arts, special treatises on manufactures, political economy, &c., &c. These local libraries are to be kept distinct from the parochial or congregational libraries, which especially contain religious and edifying works; but they will afford each other mutual support. In the words of the first report, the two institutions will be parallel, and not hostile.

M. Jean Dolfus and his friends ask nothing from the Government but liberty of action. They have found much sympathy among the pastors. But the Romish priests of Alsace oppose, more or less openly, the establishment of local libraries. This dislike is easily to be accounted for. The Popish clergy, who generally consider superstition as the best guarantee for the preservation of their authority, are by no means desirous that the humble classes should cultivate their intellectual faculties. An enlightened nation ceases to believe in false legends, in false miracles, relics, and in the virtue of pilgrimages. But M. Jean Dolfus, and those associated with him in the work, do not suffer it to pass on account of the objections of the clerical party. They proceed onward with a firm step, and already a certain number of local libraries have been established. Let us hope that the other departments of the empire will, with laudable emulation, enter upon the same course. Universal suffrage, which exists in France, demands citizens capable of choosing their representatives with discernment.

CHARITABLE ESTABLISHMENTS OF M. JOSEPH BOST.

I have more than once spoken to your readers of the admirable charitable institutions, founded by the Rev. John Bost, at Force, in the department of the Dordogne. Perhaps no Protestant in this country, during the present generation, has displayed greater zeal or evinced a more marked spirit of devotedness on behalf of the suffering class than this gentleman. He has gathered, five distinct establishments, all forms of human wretchedness—foundlings, young girls who were exposed to evil influences, idiots, and paralysed and epileptic persons of both sexes—those unfortunate beings who never found a refuge anywhere, and who, under certain circumstances, were even

III. Asile de Silof, intended to receive boys who are idiots, blind, or afflicted with incurable chronic disorders.

IV. Asile Eben-Hézer, intended to receive female epileptics.

V. Béthel, intended to receive boys who are epileptic.

These five asylums contain 200 unfortunate beings. Demands for admission are numerous, but all our houses are full, and for the present we cannot enlarge them. These children have come to us from all parts of France; some from Switzerland; some belong to poor English working people, or have been left orphans in our country.

The Earl of Shaftesbury, as recommending our asylums, wrote, in 1858, date of June 8: "There are none in any part of the world which are more entitled to the sympathy and assistance of Protestants and all who take an interest in the advancement of humanity and sound Evangelical religion."

Indeed, the blessings which have been connected with these institutions have surpassed all we could expect. The children of the Famille Evangelique who have left us are now scattered throughout the world as servants or nursery governesses. The accounts we receive of them are such as to cheer our hearts, and are a living proof that the Lord has blessed the works of our hands.

If we turn to the four other asylums, what an assemblage of destitute beings they shelter, but how often have we witnessed the power of Divine grace in those dying ones, who, sobbing, exclaimed, "Tell all the friends of the asylum we know Jesus; that we are going to a place where all our sorrows and pains end. Dear Bethesda, I entered this house murmuring, not knowing God was a Father to me, though His hand was pressing heavily upon me." The love of God has been also very clearly manifested in the teaching of the idiot. Some death-bed scenes have shown us that these unfortunate and so long uncared for imbeciles had loved their Saviour, and in full peace were commending their souls in His hands.

The chief magistrate of our county, a very intelligent Roman Catholic, told us once, after long visit he had made in our asylums, "You preach the true Gospel by words and by works. I am deeply impressed with what I have seen and heard. Protestantism is not what has been taught to us in schools—a barren religion, unable to produce charity and love. Faith for salvation of souls, and works as a token of reality of faith, are here exemplified. Be of good cheer. God will bless you."

There is but one very sad side in our work and joys. Our financial situation requires from our friends a great effort, to bring us once for all out of troubles. The foundation of these asylums has required large sums of money. In our last report, printed in 1860, we had a debt of 35,000*fr.* Since then, the two new asylums for epileptics have been opened, and increased our debt to the amount of 3,000*fr.* Last year I was about to make an errand of love to ask our friends to clear off our old debt; but the Lord laid me down, and for three months the medical men despaired to see me restored to life and health. At the present time, though better, I am partly confined to my room, and ordered to be quiet.

Prayer, and writing to our friends such appeals as this, are the only means left to me to find relief in my anxieties.

The bankers who had advanced the above-mentioned sum, 38,000*fr.*, have expressed their wish to have this sum returned in the shortest delay. The 1st of March next has been fixed; but I trust they will wait a few days longer, in order to allow me to make known to all our friends our present wants. But time is pressing.

And now, dear brethren, I leave this earnest appeal in your hearts. If once the debt is cleared off, I do trust that our yearly subscriptions will balance our expenses.*—Yours sincerely,

JOHN BOST.

BELGIUM.

PROGRESS OF THE EVANGELICAL SOCIETY.

The twenty-fifth report of the Evangelical Society of Belgium exhibits an array of facts which must be alike interesting and encouraging to all who are concerned in the evangelization of the Continent. It presents a general view of the state of religion in Belgium twenty-five years ago; briefly shows the character and extent of Protestantism at that period, and the poverty of its resources; and next, gives a statistical summary of its subsequent progress, and a picture of Protestantism as it now exists.

The report reminds us that Belgium was, twenty-five years since, the most Popish country in the world; that even the infidel portion of the nation was persuaded that Christianity and Popery were one and the same thing:—

Protestantism was confined to seven congregations, for the most part very small. Four of these were composed entirely of foreigners; the three others of Belgian Protestants. These three comprised a population of 6,700 souls, being the full number of Belgian Protestants at that period.

The seven pastors at the head of these seven Churches were all foreigners; they received their salaries from the Government. Four of these were orthodox and pious men, who took part in the foundation of the Evangelical Society; the three other pastors were strongly opposed to the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, and to every work of evangelization. These seven Churches still exist, and four others are added to their number; they have thirteen pastors paid by the Government, and compose that section of Belgian Protestantism salaried by the State. These eleven Churches form no part of the Evangelical Society; one of them was formed by the labours of the society, but separated itself from it ten years ago.

The Evangelical Society was founded at the close of the year 1837. The first attempts at evangelization, which led to the formation of the society, were essentially due to the agent of the

* Subscriptions will be received by Messrs. Ransom and Co., 1, Pall Mall East; by Messrs. Nisb and Co., 21, Berners-street, Oxford-street; and at the Office of Evangelical Christendom.

British and Foreign Bible Society, Mr. W. P. Fidd. The committee was composed of three of the pastors mentioned above, of the agent of the Bible Society, and of two or three brethren who also came from abroad.

The Belgians had no part in this work at its commencement, for the simple reason that no ~~new~~ Belgians, acquainted with the Gospel, were to be found, except among a small group of men working in the coal mines, at a village not far from Mons, and who had recently quitted the Romish Church.

The work of the society divides itself into four principal parts:—

1. Preaching, properly so called, by which missions are first formed and then Churches.
2. Primary schools, which are at once a means of evangelization outside the precincts of the congregations, and of the development of religious knowledge within it.
3. The publication and printing of tracts and of religious books.
4. The circulation of the Holy Scriptures and of religious works, which, in its turn, is subdivided, and comprises the colportage, a book-shop at Brussels, dépôts in the provinces, and the gratuitous distribution of tracts. Let us begin with the

PUBLICATIONS.

The society has printed 252 different works, of which 183 are in French and 69 in Flemish; a considerable number of these works have passed through several editions, and in all 410 editions have been issued. Of the above 252 works, 44 are original compositions.

Among these publications are comprised three magazines, two of which are monthlies, the Christian Reliquary, and the Glanceur Missionnaire, in French; the third, Pluemsch Evangelieboek, is in Flemish.

The total number of copies printed in French and in Flemish amounts to 1,216,432, which have cost 113,600*fr.* (4,544*l.*). The sum total of the donations made by the London Religious Tract Society for this object is 43,793*fr.* (1,751*l.* 15*s.*).

CIRCULATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES AND OF RELIGIOUS BOOKS.

There have entered into the central dépôt of these publications 1,300,000 copies of different works. There have issued from it 1,006,022 copies. The Holy Scriptures are not included in this enumeration, because the Evangelical Society draws from the dépôt of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and from this dépôt there have issued 272,315 Bibles or New Testaments.

During the first seven years of its existence the Evangelical Society employed only one colporteur; in the past fourteen years it has had in its service, regularly, from eight to ten. For the course of the last twenty-five years these colporteurs have performed an amount of work equal to that of about 150 colporteurs working for one year. In the last three or four years the most important part of their occupation has been that of Bible-sellers. They have ready access to houses for selling the Scriptures, giving simple expositions, and for prayer.

The book-shop, founded at Brussels in 1848, is the only Evangelical or Protestant establishment of the kind that has ever existed in this kingdom. It handles all the Evangelical publications that appear in the French language. There have issued from its storerooms, since its foundation, 150,000 copies of different works in various languages.

CHURCHES, STATIONS, AND SCHOOLS.

The society has at present twenty Churches and stations, at the head of which there are eighteen pastors and evangelists. Three of these Churches are composed partly of Protestants by birth, and partly of Roman Catholics converted to the Gospel; but the latter are the majority. The remaining seventeen are composed entirely of converted Roman Catholics. There are many of them in which you will find only one single member of Protestant origin, and whose pastors were themselves formerly Roman Catholics. In two of them there is not to be found a single individual who ever belonged to Protestantism. They are spread over the great towns and principal centres of the industrial population. Six to seven thousand souls reclaimed from Popery are joined to these twenty Churches or stations. These twenty Churches are in the principal towns and chief centres of population, having branch congregations and Sunday-schools, and twelve day-schools regularly attended by 675 children.

The number of attendants at these various chapels amounts to more than four thousand. Besides these, thousands occasionally hear the tidings of salvation by the preaching which takes place in the cemeteries and elsewhere. We may safely estimate at several hundreds of thousands the people to whom the message of mercy has been proclaimed within the last twenty-five years.

AGENCY.

The labourers of the society are forty-six in number, consisting of twenty-three pastors and evangelists, including the evangelist of the deaf and dumb, fourteen schoolmasters and mistresses, eight colporteurs and Scripture-readers, and an agent for the book-shop and dépôt for publications.

Of these twenty-three pastors and evangelists, ten have come out from the Church of Rome; three belonged to the clergy. With the exception of two colporteurs and Bible-readers, all the teachers but one belonged themselves or their parents to the Romish Church. Ten ministers of the Gospel have sprung from these Churches, and six young men are at present pursuing theological studies.

RESULTS.

Prejudices of old standing, which raised a formidable barrier between the Gospel and the Belgian people, have been overthrown, or rudely shaken. Numerous conversions, bearing the seal of the Holy Spirit's operation, have made the title of Evangelical Christian honoured far and wide by the happy moral transformation they have wrought.

For eight years past, the society has founded every year a new Church; and at this moment, if it had the needful resources of men and money, it could set to the work three new preachers of the Gospel, and some colporteurs acting as Bible-readers.

It appears to us, then, that the Belgian Evangelical Society is clearly entitled to ask more effectual aid from the friends of the Gospel than it has hitherto received. Its existing resources are insufficient to meet the pressing wants of the populations it is now evangelising. It cannot even support the labourers whom it now employs, if more efficient help be not afforded to it.

The present deficit is 21,000*fr.*, or 840*l.* sterling. This is a burden beyond the strength of the administrative committee to bear. Let those who can stretch out a helping hand not hold back; once more be it remembered, it is a work of God that is in urgent need of help.

SWITZERLAND.

THE CANTON DE VAUD, AS VIEWED AFTER THIRTY YEARS' ABSENCE

Lausanne, February 8, 1864.

Allow me to give you some account of the religious condition of the country where, in the good providence of our God and Father, I now am, after an absence, in France and Belgium, of thirty years. In the interval, much harm has been done. The old and excellent habits of former days have disappeared, to make way for what now meets us everywhere—French civilization, with its train of infidelity, religious indifference, and worldliness. But the religious revival which took place from 1820 to 1830 was not arrested, in spite of the persecution, of every kind, to which not only the Dissenters, but even pious members of the National Church, were exposed. It must be acknowledged that if it has lost in intensity, it has gained greatly in extent. The Free Church, in which Evangelical doctrines are carefully maintained, has formed forty-two parishes, included in which are several out-stations (annexes). It has also some ten missionary stations in connexion with efforts for evangelization. It has established a Theological Seminary, which reckons, at the present time, forty students; a preparatory theological seminary; and different classes of schools for both sexes. A goodly number of chapels have been built. All this has been done in the space of fifteen years, in spite of the opposition of the Government and the ill-will of the people. There are, in this city, two chapels, each containing from 800 to 1,000 people, and which are well filled every Sunday morning, though there are four National churches, one German congregation, and one English; with others, composed respectively of Wesleyans, Congregationalists, and Plymouth Brethren—not to mention a spacious Roman Catholic church—and all for a population of 20,000 souls. That which must nevertheless grieve the observant Christian is the absence, for the most part, from public worship of the stronger sex. Neither in the Established nor the Free Church do they constitute more than a fifth part of the congregations. Then there is a general desecration of the Lord's-day, rendered the more obvious and even painful to pious persons by intemperance. In all directions, in an evening, you hear the noise of bacchanalian songs, people promenading, or drunkards carousing at the public-houses. The evil has made so great progress, that philanthropic persons have endeavoured to interest the employers of the working people in efforts to check the drunkenness which now prevails, and proves so fatal to the public prosperity and the well-being of the individual. Reading-rooms are about to be opened, in which opportunity will be afforded for recreation and amusing games without the temptation to drink intoxicating liquors. This movement has obtained the cordial support of a rich Russian lady. Public lectures, for men only, free of charge, have been established in the south part of the city; they embrace all sorts of topics calculated to interest the working class, and are delivered thrice a-week. Other lectures, on subjects of a higher class, are given by professors, at the Industrial Museum, with which the Russian lady mentioned above has presented our town, admission to which are obtained by the payment of a very small sum. At the present time, M. Vuillet is delivering a course upon the principal personages who figured in the English Reformation. M. Guinand is about to commence a series upon the Prophet Isaiah. M. L. Burnier gave us, last year, a very interesting and instructive one upon the writers who have treated upon the religious education of women.

But the most striking indication of the revival among our population is the extreme interest which has been taken in our town in the course of lectures delivered by Professor Ernest Naville, of Geneva (the brother of the President of the great Conference), on the "Heavenly Father." This course was commenced in the Casino, but continued in one of the National churches, which will seat 1,200, but, on this occasion, was occupied by at least 1,400 persons. Men only were admitted. The enthusiasm of our people for this professor, and his able and pious lectures is indescribable. Three-quarters of an hour before the lecturer commenced, not a seat could be had. Two hundred persons, at least, had to remain standing for more than two hours. Oh, how much I then regretted that we had not, at Lausanne, your magnificent Exeter Hall, for many persons were unable to obtain admission. But the elevated and becoming tone of the professor's address his accents, which one felt must go to the depths of the Christian heart; his constant appeals to the reason, fairly enlightened, and to the conscience, otherwise than as blinded by passion and prejudice; his similes and comparisons, always both rich and fresh, and remarkably apposite; and, lastly, his quotations, borrowed now from the Book of books, and anon from the writings of the philosophers and poets of the present day, not excluding even those of a Proudhon—the whole at once so harmonious, so ingenious, and so persuasive—made a powerful impression upon the hearts of my fellow-countrymen, and led them, not indeed at once to Christ, but to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and ruined the cause of atheism, pantheism, deism, and every belief but that which acknowledges "our Father which art in heaven." It is, no doubt, sad that there should be any necessity to give such instruction to a people who call themselves, and who once were, Christians. But the evil which was done to us by the philosophy of the eighteenth century, the French Revolution, and the wars of the Empire, was very great, and we feel the results of it still. During the ten concluding years of the last century and the first twenty of the present, no one had an ear for the Lord's voice; it was sophists, muskets, and cannon, which alone had the privilege of making themselves heard. The consequence was that throughout Europe (my own country not excepted) it was necessary again to commence enlightening the masses upon the most elementary points of the Christian faith.

You will doubtless learn with pleasure that at the close of M. Naville's course of lectures, the Syndic (or Mayor) of Lausanne took occasion to pay homage to the talents and noble and pious convictions of the professor, remarking that it was from these convictions that he had derived the fire to which the people of Lausanne had hastened with such extraordinary eagerness, for their own warmth and enlightenment. He added, that having eloquently established the claims of the truth, especially with respect to our Heavenly Father, it was for him to proceed with the work thus commenced, and to set forth Him who is the Truth, because He is the Son of the Father. He believed himself able to speak on behalf of his fellow-citizens, by requesting M. Naville to grant them this favor. In bidding him Adieu, therefore, he added Au revoir.

The ladies thought that they might, in turn, enjoy the teaching of the professor; but his health has not allowed him to comply with an invitation, for that purpose. It must be added that M. Naville has also given public lectures to his fellow-citizens at Geneva, and that there, also, a highly-respectable audience thronged around him. His exertions have brought on an affection of the throat.

Returning to my canton and my native city, you may form an idea of the emotion which I experienced to hear the voice of our chief magistrate making so decided and open a confession of the truth as it is in Jesus Christ; and when that Christian voice ceased to be heard, my emotion became still greater, and tears filled my eyes as I listened to the applause which the public gave, not to the eloquent professor, but to the pious magistrate. I confess that at that moment my conscience strongly condemned me for my unbelief; I was compelled to own that my God and Father had done more during the preceding fifteen years than I had ever dared to hope or to pray for. The same sentiment was expressed, a few days afterwards, by Pastor E——, at a love-feast held in a hotel where, some time previously, a party of demagogues concerted their attacks upon religious liberty and upon every form of serious religion. This pastor, who, in 1848, was compelled by persecution to leave the country, told us that he could scarcely believe his eyes or his ears as to what he had seen and heard during the week which had elapsed since his return. So this brother thought it his duty to put us on our guard against what he deemed the danger of religious liberty, which, said he, is a traitress like Delilah, causing to slumber upon her knees the most valiant and vigorous of the Lord's army. May we be delivered from any such fatal slumber!

A word respecting the Evangelical Alliance. The meetings of the Alliance are confined, among us, to public assemblies, composed of different denominations, at which addresses are delivered on Christian union, and at which sometimes the Lord's Supper is celebrated. There is no restriction as to the persons admitted—no distinction between members and non-members. We have, consequently, less order and much more of vagueness than in your organization. I also regret to have to tell you that there is scarcely any intercourse between the various denominations. They know and tolerate each other, and that is all; the love of Christ does not constrain them to demolish the wall which ecclesiastically separates them, or even to stretch out their hands over it. We see, at Lausanne, none of the pastors, and, I fear, very few of the members of the National Church attending the monthly meeting in connexion with the Evangelical Alliance. The Wesleyan minister and some members of his congregation are the only persons, apart from the Free Church, who exhibit any wish to perform an act of brotherhood. Nevertheless, I have the pleasure of informing you that, at Moudon and at Cossonay it is otherwise. In this last town the meeting of the Alliance was held in the National Church, and in both towns the movement for promoting the union of God's people was headed by the national pastors. E. P.

ITALY.

Florence, February 16, 1864.

INTERESTING STATISTICS: BIBLE AND TRACT CIRCULATION.

Here are two statistics which will rejoice the friends of truth in Italy: During the year 1863 there have passed through the depôts in Italy of the British and Foreign Bible Society, for sale, 28,000 copies of the Word of God. Of these, 19,000 have been vended by the colporteurs of that society, 5,000 by the colporteurs of the Scottish Bible Society, and the remaining 4,000 by the various religious book depôts and through the efforts of other parties. This is a considerable increase on the sales of the previous year, though falling short of the circulation in 1861. The principal sale has this last year, as during 1862, been effected in the North, where I am sorry to hear that the military have been less accessible than formerly, owing to the opposition of the officers. The colporteur is always more successful when freely admitted to the barracks than when he accosts the soldier on the street, so that the very various sales among different regiments depends on the attitude of the officers and chaplain. Here the colporteur has been of late unhindered in his movements, although several officers, seeing the quantity of Testaments and tracts which were being greedily read by the troops, made inquiries of Miss Burton and others as to the character of the literature, and expressed themselves satisfied. The clerical papers have spoken bitterly of this, and have so industriously spread the calumny that all these books were offensive to mother Church, and destructive of the holy faith, that one bigoted sergeant burned a few Testaments, and had one poor soldier placed under arrest for nine days, under the charge of disobedience, because he refused to give up his copy of the Scriptures to be consigned to the flames. The persecution was foolish, for the man has been doubly assiduous, since regaining his liberty, in searching the Book of God; and other sergeants and corporals have come forward more boldly in sympathy with Evangelical truth.

The other interesting statistic is that 4,000 francs worth (160*l.* sterling) of religious publications, belonging to the Evangelical Italian Publication Society, has been sold during 1863 at the tract depôts and by the colporteurs of the Scotch Bible Society. This only for books printed since the Claudian Printing-press was established here, early in 1861. In addition to these, there have been sold all over the country a great quantity of the books printed by the same press in Turin, previous to 1861; also the books of the Geneva Society, which have had a large circulation, as almost all the popular works of Dr. De Sanctis are in their list; and also the books of various other friends of Italy. This fact speaks volumes for the energy displayed in seizing the present great opportunity for disseminating, in works of all sorts and sizes, the truth of the Gospel throughout Italy. From the rapid increase of such books, and of the facilities for their sale, we have no doubt that this youthful Italian sister of the Religious Tract Society will be able to note still greater progress next year.

INCIDENTS IN THE WORK OF A COLPORTEUR.

The diffusion of the truth calls forth the greatest opposition of error and superstition. Here is a quotation from the journal of a colporteur, who averages about 4*l.* a-month in his sales. It is a quotation similar to hundreds which might be submitted, and shows how little romance there is in the work of God in Italy: "From Loretto I went to Recanati, a village of 5,000 inhabitants, and set up my stall, as usual, in the public square. Half an hour afterwards, six gentlemen and a canon came and asked me if I had Renan's book on the 'Life of Jesus.' I replied that I had not, but added that I had the 'Life of Christ,' written by more trustworthy persons than Renan—namely, the Apostles, who had lived many years with Christ, and were in His company for forty days after His glorious resurrection. The canon paid me great attention. One of these gentlemen bought a Bible, but the others wished Renan's book, and so went away. The priest, however, remained, examined all my books, and said that they were no injury from the inclemency of the weather. 'Look here,' said one of those miraculously preserved from cough or cold to a member of our Church; 'look here, you Protestants, who don't believe in the Madonna, and say if I am unwell, who have waded barefoot and uncovered in the procession? Ah, the Madonna, the Madonna; what miracles she performs!' The statue of the Immaculate remained eight days at the cathedral before returning to her fixed abode; and during this time all Palermo pays its respects to the holy image, and all the other Madonnas of the town are taken to visit the leading Madonna. Every evening processions parade the towns, loudly chaunting Ave Marias and Paternosters. Every family, with the father at its head, wends its way to the cathedral, one member carrying a crucifix, another a candle to present to the priests, and all reciting Latin prayers. The strangest part of the business is, that the Senate of Palermo, led on by the Prefect, goes through the same ceremony, dressed out in their robes of office. Not only are masses continually celebrated in honour of the Queen of Heaven, but during the week of festivity all the statues and images of the Madonna in private houses and in the public streets are splendidly illuminated day and night, and the glories of the Blessed Virgin are celebrated with the pleasing harmonies of Calabrian and Sicilian airs. I should not forget to mention that every day closes amid scenes of drunkenness, ribaldry, and strife, in which blood is frequently shed. Such is the people to whom I am sent to preach the Gospel. Do not wonder, then, if I have no great progress to note, for Satan and his satellites reign with undisputed sway. The educated classes believe in nothing. They are rabid disciples of Renan, and one of their organs, the Hammer of the Priests, propounds the blasphemies with all its force. The people are in the deepest ignorance. I have asked many tradespeople and sailors, and find that hardly one can read or write; so that they are easily hoodwinked by the priests, who domineer over women, and, through them, over the men, by means of the confessional."

GERMANY.

Frankfort, February 16, 1864.

THE WAR IN SCHLESWIG.

So then, since my last letter, the German conflict has ended in war! In war, contrary to the expectation and desire of Germany itself as well as of Europe; in war, because it has pleased the Governments of Prussia and of Austria to invade Schleswig after the troops of the Confederation had already occupied Holstein. What do the Cabinets of Berlin and of Vienna mean? What are their secret designs? Such is the question which public opinion in Germany is asking. This question has hitherto found no reply; but as this invasion of Schleswig has taken place contrary to the advice of the Federal Diet, and even in opposition to the sentiments of the Prussian and Austrian Chambers of Deputies, which have refused to vote the expenses of the war, this question, it must be said, inspires everywhere nothing but mistrust and fear. Every one seeks and dreads in this extreme measure some scheme of personal policy, without which nobody can explain why these two Governments should stand in open opposition to the Federal authority of which they form a part. No one expects from a man like Herr von Bismark generous and national inspirations; but what excites astonishment, and what is an enigma more insoluble than all others, is that a minister of such worth as von Schmerling, who has transformed Austria by new institutions—above all, that the Emperor of Austria, who was, a few months ago, on the point of creating a new era for Germany, in spite of Prussia—that these two men, we say, come all at once to form a league with the Cabinet of Berlin for an anti-national enterprise. We must wait till the time comes to resolve all these obscure questions, and to confirm or dissipate these fears. God only grant that time may not be fated to bring a European war, of which some inconsiderate men shall have assumed upon their own heads the terrible responsibility!

THE PASTORS OF HOLSTEIN AND THEIR BRETHREN OF GERMANY.

Amid these great events, there is an episode of an altogether moral nature, which continues to preoccupy the minds of religious men in all Germany. I told you in my last letter that the Holstein pastors and professors of theology had not at first felt bound by their consciences to refuse the oath to the new King of Denmark. Why had this not been demanded of them in all haste before any one of the political questions was settled? Because, in the deplorable system of State Churches, governments always succumb to the temptation to make of religion an instrument must not be lost sight of, because they exactly characterise the tendencies of a certain party.

THE CONCORDAT IN AUSTRIA.

If such is the state of religious liberty in a Protestant country, how can we wonder that its progress is still so slow in the Catholic empire of Austria, which has been so long under the absolute domination of the Jesuits? It is known that the Austrian Government, since it entered on the track of liberal institutions, has been applying to the Court of Rome to obtain certain modifications of the Concordat. The most profound mystery has hitherto reigned over these transactions. An Ultramontane pamphlet, which has just appeared at Mentz, has all at once thrown some light upon the darkness. Observe, if we must believe this publication, what the concessions sought by Austria are reduced to, and which it is not yet altogether sure of obtaining: 1. Transition from one confession to the other [from Romanism to Protestantism] shall be free in future. 2. As it regards mixed marriages, the Catholic priest shall be allowed to hallow them by a passive attendance, as it has been practised in Hungary since 1841, with the consent of the Holy See. Moreover, these marriages shall be recognised as lawful, even when they have only been performed by the pastor of the non-Catholic party. 3. Those who contract a mixed marriage may give a written promise to bring up their children as Catholics, but this promise must remain simply a moral act, and never become the ground of judicial proceedings. 4. In cases where there is no promise made, or if one of the parties afterwards refuses to fulfil it, the sons will follow the religion of the father, and the daughters that of the mother. We see from the very nature of the concessions sought for, what a tyranny the arrangements of the Concordat exercise over the religious education of children in the bosom of families. We see again that this tyranny is not only ecclesiastical, but is sanctioned by the civil law, and may give occasion to legal prosecutions and penalties. There is a power which is great in a very different way from the obscure dealings of the Austrian Government with the Court of Rome. It is the power of opinion, enlightened with the light of liberty, before which this darkness of the middle ages will be soon dispersed.

THE BAPTIST CHURCHES IN GERMANY.

A few words more, before I close, on the actual state of the Baptist communion in Germany and in the North of Europe. The Churches of this denomination form together an Alliance (Bund), which sits every three years at Hamburg. There they discuss together the interests of the Kingdom of God and the particular labours which have been entrusted to them for the advancement of that kingdom. The ninth assembly of the Alliance was held last year, on July 8—11 at Hamburg. We borrow from the printed report of the session the following facts:—Almost a hundred delegates of Churches were present, among whom was the Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society of London. During the three preceding years these Churches have increased 4,658 members received baptism, which brings to 11,275 the total number of members of Churches belonging to the Alliance. In the same space of time 327 new stations were founded, at which the Gospel is preached by the ministers of this communion. The Swedish delegate showed that eighteen years ago he was the only Baptist Christian in his country, and that now that small kingdom counts 176 congregations, representing almost 6,000 members. Among the religious questions which were discussed during the sittings, we first notice the following: "To what kind of conversions ought the preference to be given: to those which are prompted by revivals, or others?" The assembly, while it inclined rather towards a gradual development of the work of conversion, yet recognising the undeniable fruits of great spiritual movements, thought that the wisest course was to leave the question undecided, and was agreed only on this point—that they ought to abstain from provoking those religious movements by artificial means. One fact, cited by the Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society of London, produced a decided impression upon the assembly. It was that, during the great revival in Jamaica, where almost 5,000 converts were added to the Churches, most of those who had experienced physical agitations afterwards fell away. The assembly was also occupied with Sunday-schools, Christian liberality for the advancement of God's kingdom, and persecutions suffered by Baptists in Poland, Russia, and Saxony. On this last subject we observe with joy that the conference expressed with energy its disapprobation of those Baptist ministers who allow themselves to make violent attacks upon National Churches. This spirit of intolerance is the more honourable to it that those attacks for which some of its members are often justly its northern border, and by treaty with the Transvaal Boer Republic, he bound himself and the colony to drop all existing treaties with native tribes, and in compliance with the demands of the Republic, to cast off native friends as well as foes from supplies of ammunition, even for hunting their game or defending themselves against the lions and noxious animals of their countries. But though thus badly treated by the colony, or at least its Government, our chief, N. Waterboer, has shown no disposition to revenge himself on them. On the contrary, he has ever befriended the colony, when he could be of any service to it. So I must also say he conducts himself to all his white neighbours—those of the colony on his south, those of the Orange Free State on his east, and those of the Transvaal Republic on his north-east. Of late—say three years ago—the Governor of the colony, Sir G. Grey, showed Chief Waterboer friendship, by renewing to him the annual sum of 150*l*. Of this, it was suggested that 50*l*.

Other societies have joined us of the London Missionary Society, years ago, such as the French Society, who labour mostly among the Bassutos, and the Wesleyan Society, who labour among the Barolong. God has also blessed their labours.

I might, in conclusion, mention, as showing the progress that the Gospel has made, that our people endeavour to contribute of their substance to support the work of God among them. Six years ago I received contributions to the amount of 98*l*.; but that was the highest I ever got from the people in one year—I mean our district of Griqua Town. But of late years the drought has been so distressing, that our people could not contribute more than 80*l*., then 74*l*.; last year it equalled only 50*l*. We hope, however, with the return of fruitful seasons, that their contributions will also rise in amount.

GREENLAND.

PROGRESS OF THE MORAVIAN MISSION.

The severe weather which, in our February number (p. 85), we described as having prevailed, last year, in Labrador, was equally felt on the opposite coast of Greenland. One of the missionaries states that a winter so long and cold, and marked by such scarcity, had not been experienced in that country for a century. At Lichtenfels, at the evening meetings, the oil in the church lamps could not be kept burning, as even when it had been warmed just before, the lamps went out almost as soon as the people assembled. Hunger for bodily food prevailed, but of desire for spiritual sustenance there was little indication. "At the beginning of the winter," writes one of the brethren at this station, "we looked over our stock of provisions, particularly fish, and felt the cheerful conviction that it was quite sufficient to enable us to assist our Greenlanders. However, it turned out otherwise, for not only was this supply entirely consumed, but a great part of our own store of European provisions had to be expended, and we were even obliged to borrow some from the factory. Besides this, we distributed all the warm clothing which we had received from friends in Europe, and had to purchase additional materials from the factor. I am sorry to add, that, very often, little or no gratitude was shown for these efforts to relieve the prevalent distress." The same writer complains that the thoughtlessness of many of the people has never manifested itself in so distressing a manner as last year: "They live carelessly; and when we seek to arouse them, they put an end to our efforts by not coming to church or to us any more, in order to hear a word of exhortation.

If only a person dies peacefully at last—and this is the usual result of the diseases common among the Greenlanders—they think nothing else than that he has had a happy end, and has gone to heaven, whether he has fallen asleep in Jesus or not."

A more cheering account is presented of New Herrnhut (the oldest of the stations: established 1732). Mr. Herbrich expresses himself as being filled with joy and thanksgiving by what he saw and heard on visiting the out-stations. At one of these, all who had been excluded from Church-fellowship, having expressed deep sorrow for their sin, and having shown for some months that they had experienced a real change of heart, the missionary was truly glad to re-admit them. With regard to things temporal, also, the same people have taken warning from their recent troubles, and have begun to be more active in the seal-hunt and fishing, in order to lay in a stock of provisions for the winter; on this point, they had previously persisted in disregarding the earnest exhortations of the missionaries.

From Lichtenau comes the mournful tidings of the death of the gifted and experienced missionary, Mr. Caspar Kügel. He was about setting out to visit a portion of the members of the congregation living at a distance, a fellow-labourer at the same time going on a similar errand in another direction, when he was seized with inflammation which in a few days ended fatally. He was of course, unable to proceed on his journey but he expressed his resignation to the Lord will, and insisted upon his colleague setting out at once. "Whilst the brethren and sisters were singing verses at his bedside, he

FINAL JUDGMENT ON "ESSAYS AND REVIEWS."

The long-pending litigation against Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson, for alleged heresy in their articles in the now well-known "Essays and Reviews," was brought to a conclusion by the judgment of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, on the 8th ult. The lords of the Council by whom the appeal was heard, some months since, were the Lord Chancellor; Lords Cranworth, Chelmsford, and Kingsdown; the Archbishops of Canterbury and York; and the Bishop of London. These were now present, as concurring in the judgment, except the two archbishops. The judgment, we regret to say, was in favour of the appellants, and the decision is thus authoritatively pronounced that the teaching contained in the "Essays and Reviews," though condemned by nearly all the bishops, is yet not contrary to the doctrines of the Church of England. It is true, the Lord Chancellor, who delivered the judgment, reminds us that their lordships deal only with the extracts laid before them, and give no opinion as to the character, scope, and tendency of the whole work; but the fact still remains that the passages which the accusers deliberately selected as being the very worst in their two essays are now authoritatively pronounced to be not contrary to the Articles of the Church. It must be remembered that of the many charges originally brought against the rev. gentlemen, some were negatived in the Court below, and others were abandoned on the appeal, so that the Court had only two charges to deal with in each case. Both of them were accused of denying the Divine inspiration of the Scriptures; and, in addition, Dr. Williams was accused of denying the efficacious merit of the atonement, and Mr. Wilson of denying a final judgment and the eternity of future punishments. The following are the more salient points of the judgment delivered by the Lord Chancellor:—

These appeals do not give to this tribunal the power, and therefore it is no part of its duty, to pronounce any opinion on the character, effect, or tendency of the publications known by the name of "Essays and Reviews;" nor are we at liberty to take into consideration, for the purposes of the prosecution, the whole of the essay of Dr. Williams or of the essay of Mr. Wilson. A few short extracts only are before us, and our judgment must by law be confined to the matter which is therein contained. If, therefore, the book, or these two essays, or either of them as a whole, be of a mischievous and baneful tendency, as weakening the foundations of Christian belief, and likely to cause many to offend, they will retain the character, and be liable to that condemnation notwithstanding this our judgment. With respect to the legal tests of doctrine in the Church of England, by the application of which we are to try the soundness or unsoundness of the passages libelled, we agree with the learned judge in the Court below, that the judgment in the Gorham case is conclusive: "This Court has no jurisdiction or authority to settle matters of faith, or determine what ought in any particular to be the doctrine of the Church of England. Its duty extends only to the consideration of that which by law established to be the doctrine of the Church of England, upon the true and legal construction of her Articles and Formularies." By the rule thus enunciated it is our duty to abide. Our province is, on the one hand, to ascertain the true construction of those Articles of Religion and Formularies referred to in each charge, according to the legal rules for the interpretation of statutes and written instruments; and, on the other hand, to ascertain the plain grammatical meaning of the passages which are charged as being contrary to or inconsistent with the doctrine of the Church, ascertained in the manner we have described. That only is matter of accusation which is advisedly taught or maintained by a clergyman in opposition to the doctrine of the Church. The writer cannot in a proceeding such as the present be held responsible for more than the conclusions which are directly involved in the assertion he has made.

With these general remarks we proceed to consider, in the first place, the charges against Dr. Williams. All the charges against Dr. Williams were rejected by the learned judge in the Court below, or given up at the hearing before us, except the charges contained in the 7th and 15th articles. The 7th article, as reformed, sets forth certain passages extracted from pages 60 and 61, and from pages 77 and 78, of the volume containing Dr. Williams's essay, and charges that in the passages so extracted Dr. Williams has advisedly maintained and affirmed that the Bible or Holy Scripture is an expression of devout reason and the written voice of the congregation—not the Word of God, nor containing any special revelation of His truth or of His dealings with mankind, nor the rule of our faith. Dr. Williams has nowhere in terms asserted that Holy Scripture is not the Word of God; and the accusation, therefore, must mean that by calling the Bible "an expression of devout reason," and therefore to be read with reason in freedom," and stating that it is "the written voice of the congregation," Dr. Williams must be taken to affirm that it is not the Word of God. We are satisfied that, whatever may be the meaning of the passages included in this article, they do not, taken collectively, warrant the charge which has been made, that Dr. Williams has maintained the Bible not to be the Word of God nor the rule of faith.

We pass on to the remaining charge against Dr. Williams, which is contained in the 15th article of charge. The words of Dr. Williams which are included in this charge are part of a supposed defence of Baron Bunsen against the accusation of sinnes a certain time appointed by God's justice." This Article was omitted from the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion of the year 1562, and it might be said that the effect of sustaining the judgment of the Court below on this charge would be to restore the Article so withdrawn. We are not required, or at liberty, to express any opinion upon the mysterious question of the eternity of final punishment, further than to say that we do not find in the Formularies to which this article refers any such distinct declaration of our Church upon the subject as to require us to condemn as penal the expression of hope by a clergyman that even the ultimate pardon of the wicked who are condemned in the day of judgment may be consistent with the will of Almighty God. We desire to repeat that the meagre and disjointed extracts which have been allowed to remain in the reformed articles are alone the subject of our judgment. On the design and general tendency of the book called "Essays and Reviews," and on the effect or aim of the whole essay of Dr. Williams, or the whole essay of Mr. Wilson, we neither can nor do pronounce any opinion. On the short extracts before us, our judgment is that the charges are not proved. Their lordships, therefore, will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the sentences be reversed, and the reformed articles rejected in like manner as the rest of the original articles were rejected in the Court below—namely, without costs; but inasmuch as the appellants have been obliged to come to this Court, their lordships think it right that they should have the costs of this appeal.

At the conclusion of the judgment the Lord Chancellor said:—

I am desired by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of York to state that they do not concur in those parts of this judgment which relate to the 7th article of charge against Dr. Williams, and to the 8th article of charge against Mr. Wilson.

REPRESENTATIVE OPINIONS ON THE JUDGMENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

The opinions of the various religious organs as to the real import of the recent judgment, and its bearing upon the future of the Church of England, differ not a little. The High Church Guardian—whose veering, for some time past, towards the Broad school may be viewed as one evidence among many of the growing influence of that party—takes the matter with great equanimity. It is unmannerly to cry out, when things have gone wrong, "We always told you so!" but thus it does address the prosecutors in this suit and those who urged them on. The risk was far too great, and the gains, in the event of success, could be but small. The gravity of the result is not denied; but—marvellous conclusion—the Bishop of Salisbury and Mr. Fendall have established by law that which the Essayists only published as their individual sentiments. These are the words of the Guardian:—

Had the Bishop of Salisbury and Mr. Fendall

established their case, they would have made it clear that the opinions incriminated are unlawful and they might even have silenced two unsound teachers; now that their case has broken down, they have secured for those opinions a recognised place within the limits of the Church of England as by law established.

Yet the real dimensions of this result—the theological value and importance of the decision—are not so great as at first sight they appear to be. Upon the only question vital concern to the Church the two archbishops parted company with their colleagues. For the rest, the judgment "may be unfactory to many;" but yet—

A reflecting person will readily perceive that the Established Church must always find difficulty in suppressing novel and strange doctrines. The State cannot establish the Church without the Church having a fixed body of statutes and written instruments wherein the privileged faith and practice are set forth. These once adopted by the State, become thenceforward legal documents, subject to legal and technical modes of interpretation. The Judicial Committee, having expounded the Church's code in this way, has exonerated Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson from legal culpability. Be it observed, however, that the obligations of a clergyman of the Church remain just as they did before this unhappy trial. He will still be bound in honour and conscience, as witnessed by his promises and subscriptions, to believe heartily as the Church has received, and to minister honestly as the Church prescribes. The doubtful point is and always has been how far obligations of this sort can be enforced on the unwilling by law. There always have been, and there always will be those who will avail themselves of the imperfections attending on the administration of human justice to do and say things from which a finer conscientiousness would have made them abstain. There will, however, we may hope, never be many clergymen who will be content to hold office in the Church whilst contravening in their public teaching the manifest spirit of her whole doctrine, and the clear significance of all her institutions. But if such there are, they must, as it seems, except in some few very extreme cases, account to their Maker only for their sin.

The English Churchman, on the other hand, thinks that there is real ground for apprehension. "That anomalous and incompetent Court of Final Appeal," in which the Ecclesiastical is overborne by the Lay element, is the source of the mischief, and "the whole theology of the Church will unless the Christian public reclaim, and demand a restoration of a legitimate Ecclesiastical Constitution, pass into the hands of secular lawyers." But the Churchman evidently believes that the Christian public will not reclaim, and that so the faith will suffer.

The Record (Evangelical), while regarding the judgment as decidedly adverse to the

"these comprehensive judgments, just as they are legally, may do in some degree the work of the Liberation Society"—that is to say, tend to the abolition of National Churches.

The Inquirer (Unitarian) glories in the decision :—

Thus ends this famous trial. No longer can our bibliolaters endeavour to establish their dogma in our courts of law. The idea of "criminal proceedings" or "penal consequences" hanging like a Damocles sword over the heads of those who bring scholarship and piety to the intelligent interpretation of the Bible as of all other books will no longer be a hindrance to a free scientific theology. . . . An impossible uniformity will cease to be desired ; and the benefits of an inevitable variety, springing out of the natural development of our various characters, will be thankfully recognised. For these blessings to the Gospel of our country [!] let us avow our obligations to the brave but much-defamed Essayists and Reviewers.

We shall not attempt to compendiate the opinions of public men upon this subject, but it is obvious that as they closely scrutinise the judgment, it grows rather than diminishes in importance. The Rev. F. D. Maurice thinks it "lucid and beautiful," hails the "vigorous and courageous application of the legal intellect" to ecclesiastical controversies, and predicts that theologians will be able henceforth to use plainer language. Dr. Pusey, addressing the Record, deems the time come when "the pressure of the common enemy of unbelief" must draw closer into one band all who love our Lord as their Redeemer and their God, and the Bible as being indeed the very Word of God. The decision, he says, "judicially sanctions an unprincipled use of words which would be accounted flagrantly dishonest in any ordinary transactions between man and man. The recent miserable, soul-destroying judgment requires the united action of the clergy and laity to repudiate it." Mr. Robert Baxter suggests the adoption by the great body of the clergy and laity of a petition to the Queen.

CLERICAL SUBSCRIPTION.

The progress of dissatisfaction with the existing state of things in the Church of England in the matter of subscription to her Articles when entering the priesthood, and strict obedience to her Formularies when fulfilling its offices, has at last attracted the attention of both Church and State. The Government have appointed a mixed commission of clergy and laity, "to consider and revise the various forms of subscription and declaration required to be made by the clergy of the United Church of England and Ireland on ordination, or on appointment, admission, or induction to any ecclesiastical dignity, benefice, curacy, lectureship, or office, and to report their opinion how far they may be altered or simplified consistently with due security for the declared agreement of the clergy with the doctrines of the Church and their conformity to its ritual."

The very appointment of such a commission may, no doubt, disturb some minds, as implying a doubt of the absolute perfection of the existing order of things ; but a glance at the names of the commissioners will satisfy them that the measure is dictated in no unfriendly spirit to the Church. The two English and the two Irish Archbishops stand at its head ; the clerical element largely preponderates among the laymen are such men as Mr. W. pole, Mr. Napier, late Lord Chancellor of Ireland ; and the most revolutionary names that appear on the list are Lord Ebury and Mr. Bouverie. The report of this commission will be looked for with supreme interest.

The Church has, however, been beforehand with the State in considering this matter. In the last session of the Convocation, a committee was appointed to draw up a report on the subject of subscription ; and at an otherwise pro forma meeting of the Convocation, at the beginning of the month, the report was presented. The committee pointed out that, by two sections in the Act of Uniformity, the clergyman, on ordination, was only required to give his assent and consent to "the use of" all things contained in the Prayer-book ; while, by another section, he is required to assent "to all and everything contained in the book." The remedy suggested by the committee is to render these sections consistent, and to require from the clergyman his assent to "the use of" all things in the Prayer-book. The report was not discussed ; but Archdeacon Denison, standing as usual on the old ways, gave notice that when the discussion did come on he would oppose the change.

With regard to the burial service, the burden of which has of late pressed with more than usual weight on tender consciences and for which the bishops themselves undertook to find a remedy, the Convocation has also taken action. A committee was appointed last session, and their report was now brought up. It discouraged any alteration in the burial service for the dead, but recommended the exercise of discipline for the living. The law does not require the burial service to be read over persons dying excommunicate. Let excommunication, then, divested of all the temporal penalties with which in olden times it was associated, be applied to all notorious evi keedars were sentenced to two years' imprisonment, for not making known to the authorities intention of the woman to commit the crime.

We again hear of the rumours afloat in Southern India of the predicted advent of a king, who is to rule the whole country, and drive out the English. The Rev. E. Sargent of the Palamcotta Church Mission, says :—

With reference to this personage—Vasanta Rayer—some say he is only a spiritual person; we who move about and get the people to speak with us freely, know that this is a misrepresentation of the case. Our catechists and Christians have it constantly thrown in their teeth by the heathens that their day is coming, that the English Government will run away, &c. . . . You must suppose from my taking up such a subject that the whole country is ripe for a revolt. No such thing. But ignorant people do not know what to think or do, except as they are moved by other influences such as their oracles."

Mr. Sargent says he considers these oracles to hold the same position now that Chuppaties did in the late revolt. He adds : "Every conceivable blessing is promised to those who read these oracles, copy them, and forward them to places beyond. Monday is apart as a day of worship to these oracles. In short, the popular mind is engrossed with the subject."

Amid other evidences of the decay of Hindooism, is the fact that its adherents are pressing for a modification of the law by which, about twelve months since, the Government relinquished all connexion with endowments for idol worship, and handed them over to native management. At a meeting of the Hindoo inhabitants of Madras, the maladministration of these funds by the trustees was the subject of loud complaint. The correspondent of a daily journal writes :—

The confessions of the speakers were frequent and pathetic ; that the temples are falling in ruin, that the holy idol services are neglected or badly attended, that the priests are immoral in their lives and peculate the funds. In fact, some spoke as an orthodox Pagan might be supposed to do before Constantine's time, when he saw Christianity everywhere beginning to overturn the idols, even use as churches the idol temples. One speaker said : "The present decayed state of our temple is manifest to every one. The causes which have brought about this deterioration it is unnecessary here to specify." Government having, after a century's unhallowed support, left Hindooism alone, we see its own votaries sadly confessing that it is dying, proving, by their appeal to Government to surrender its support, that it has no inherent vitality, and must yield in time to the effect of Christian missionaries, schools, and Government.

CHINA.

We mentioned, last month, the visit of the Rev. W. S. Swanson, of the Amoy Presbyterian Mission, to Khi-boey. On his return thence he went to Bay-pay. He had been informed that four persons, who had become interested in the Gospel, had so impressed the fellow-villagers in this neighbourhood with what they had heard, that the four had increased to twenty-nine (all males), and that the whole village, with the exception of one or two persons, had renounced idolatry, and were keeping the Sabbath ; that many had broken or buried their idols, and that some had destroyed their ancestral tablets. The reception he experienced at this village—Liong-Bun-Soo—Mr. Swanson says that he is unable to describe ; his words will give a better idea of it than ours :—

Poor people, they rushed about me, and with the most lively demonstrations of joy welcomed me. I was so struck and overcome with such a sight, that my feelings I cannot express. We met in the open air, and I preached to them from the first part of John iii. It was with the utmost reluctance they would allow me to leave them. Young and old planted themselves in the village gate and opposed my going ; and it was only when I told them that there were others of their country who had claims upon us that they were willing to let me go.

MADAGASCAR.

It appears that the spirit and tendency of the present Government of Madagascar well as the personal views of the Queen, are not in favour of Christianity. She is described as a firm believer in the religion of her ancestors. "The diviners are always at hand, nothing of importance is ever transacted without their being previously consulted. Her favourite idol is kept in the palace, whilst she is there herself, and accompanies her when she goes out." The missionaries and the native Christians, however, remain unmolested, the policy of the Government appears to be one of religious freedom for all classes. The Prime Minister is now all-powerful ; he has married the Queen ; but the alliance is unpopular.

In view of the course which may be adopted by the French, in consequence of refusal to carry out the provisions of the Lambert treaty, there appears to be some hesitation about immediately proceeding with the erection of the memorial churches. The London

Berea, Makuatling; also the Wesleyan Mission at Thet' Unchu. We were very kindly and heartily received by the missionaries, and there was not the slightest sign of dislike to our proposed Church Mission in this populous and important country. On the contrary, all expressed a pleasure that the English Church intended to enter upon the work. One of them said he only wished I would send two missionaries at once, instead of one. I heartily wish I had the men, and the means, to enable me to do so. Some of the French missionaries have been at work thirty years, and have large congregations at their station. But they say the country is so extensive, and the population so great (near 200,000 they told me), that after all they have only been able to touch the work. They appear to be men of simple and devoted lives, and are all thoroughly acquainted with the language (Sesuto).

We mentioned, last month, the bishop's interview with the Chief Moshesh. He described the old chief as a very remarkable man, and goes on to say:—

He wished to know whether I had come in consequence of the representations he had made to Bishop of Capetown and to the Queen of England, and whether the Queen had sent me. He said, "I have had relations with the British Government for thirty years, but have never seen an English clergyman before." His son George, who was educated in Capetown, acted in part as interpreter. The chief said, "Go through my country, and fix upon a spot for a station. I will agree to anything you like. You are at liberty to make your choice." The following day (Sunday) the old chief came down from his mountain, and I preached to him, the French missionary kindly interpreting sentence by sentence. Several hundred of Basutos were present. It was a remarkable scene. I talked with Moshesh about his son Jeremiah, at St. Augustine's [College, Canterbury], little thinking that the day was so near his end. I hear that the news of his death was a great grief to Moshesh.

From the Wesleyan missionaries, who are labouring with their accustomed zeal in different districts, amid a widely-scattered population, we hear again of the distress which has been occasioned by the heavy drought, which had lasted three years. One of them writes from Orange River:—

The widespread insolvency among merchants and others, and the great scarceness of money, has placed our people, financially, in a most unfortunate position. The cattle-murain, and the death of tens of thousands of sheep, have increased this. The money difficulties have been almost overwhelming. Families in good circumstances have been brought to ruin and poverty. This has seriously affected our subscriptions, and money returns generally; but it is something over which we have no control. The high prices of provisions throughout the district has been unprecedented, rendering it next to impossible for the missionaries to live at all.

A minister at King William's Town speaks of having, within about eight months, ridden between four and five thousand miles, in order to fulfil his duties, and adds: "The expenses incurred are very great, and but inadequately met by a preacher's allowance here." A third, at Natal, refers to places which can be visited only twice in three months. He mentions having been, several months before, at Fort Buckingham, where he found seventy soldiers stationed, and goes on to say:—

No minister had visited the place before, nor had the glad tidings of great joy ever been published there till that day. The eager attention of all, and the tears I saw standing in some eyes indicated the fulfilment of the Master's promise, "Lo, I am with you always." In the evening we held another service, when it seemed as if a blessed influence was shed on each worshipper. When I left the evening service, a young man was waiting for me, anxious to know whether he could not attend our nearest place of worship on the Sabbath. Alas! that was thirty miles away, and there we have service only once in six weeks.

WEST AFRICA.

The war in the Yoruba Country, notwithstanding its adverse influence upon missionary operations generally, has yet brought the Church of England Society's agents into contact with people inaccessible before to Gospel light. One of their number at Abbeokuta writes:—

I suppose more people of Ijaye have joined the Christian Church in Abbeokuta in one year than there did all the years Ijaye was occupied. I am also told that perhaps ten persons of the Ijebu town called Makun, destroyed in the war, have joined the Church in Abbeokuta.

The sufferings to which missionaries are sometimes exposed are seen in the case of the Rev. Mr. Reed, of the American Baptist Board, who is stationed in Oyo, one of the places in the Yoruba Country, the communication between which and the coast has been cut off by the war. Messrs. Wood and Ashcroft, of the Church Mission, however, by special permission of the chiefs, succeeded, after some difficulty, in reaching it. Mr. Reed was overjoyed to see them:—

He has been sorely tried for the last three years. The only white faces he has seen during that period were Messrs. Bühler and Lamb, for about two hours last Christmas. In order to get food, he has been obliged to sell everything he had that would bring money. He has parted with his knives, forks, spoons, crockery, &c., and even the sheets off his bed. Many days he has not had more than a halfpenny per day to live upon, and has frequently been so reduced, that he could not see where his next food would come from.

At Lagos, the increase of the congregation at the Bread Fruit station has been so large multiplication of blazing lights, are all features eminently characteristic of what is peculiar in the worship of that Church [of Rome]; and they were all as necessary conditions of the awful calamity which ensued as the timber roofs, the inflammable oils, and the closed door-ways." But notwithstanding the rampant superstition of Santiago, and although a clause in the Constitution of Chili prohibits the exercise of any but the Romish religion there exists in that city a little flock of Protestants. An agent of the "American and Foreign Christian Union"—of which the late well-known Dr. Baird was one of the secretaries—has been labouring there between two and three years. His congregation numbers about forty persons, and these, at the date of the last accounts, had commenced contributing to the expenses connected with the services. A Sabbath-school is in active operation, and arrangements were about being made for the circulation of Bibles and other religious books in Santiago. The agents of the American and Foreign Christian Union in Chili are afraid of controversy with the priests, notwithstanding its personal risks; one of them, Valparaiso, had a pamphlet in the press, a few weeks before the catastrophe already referred to, against the worship of the saints, and his colleague at Santiago had undertaken to circulate one thousand copies in that city.

POLYNESIA.

The death of the King of the Sandwich Islands, Kamehameha IV., took place on the 30th of November. He is succeeded by his brother. What the effect of the change will be upon the moral and religious interests of the people is not yet known. Bishop Stead describes the new King as a man of education and capacity, and friendly to the Anglican mission. He has appointed the bishop to be his chaplain and a member of his Privy Council.

Letters from M. Arbousset, of the French Protestant Missionary Society, give some particulars of the commencement of his work at Tahiti. As we mentioned some months since Queen Pomaré was absent when he arrived. They afterwards met, when the Queen gave him a cordial welcome. "I began to think," said she to him, "that you would never come. Now I see you, I am happy and thankful. The Lord be with you!" Service is celebrated every Sunday, both in French and in the native language. The Queen attends without any display, taking notes, and placing herself on a level with the humblest Christian. "The congregation, on the 7th of August," writes M. Arbousset, "was numerous. According to the usual custom, we proceeded, before dispersing, to call over the names of those present. When I called 'Pomaré'—without adding any title, without pronouncing that name with more emphasis than any other—a gentle voice replied, 'Present.'" At a conference, held on the 18th of the same month, it was resolved to send a letter of thanks to the Christians who have facilitated the sending of the French pastors now at Tahiti. The letter was drawn up on the spot, and is signed by twenty-two Tahitian pastors.

Systematic beneficence, to which, of late, attention has been turned at home, is presented to the native mind, by the missionaries of the London Society in the South Seas, as among the primary duties of the Christian calling. We read in the journal of the John Williams, on her last visit to the Islands of Western Polynesia, that the Church at Fata after being only one year in existence, and just emerging from heathenism of the grossest type, commenced at once to send a contribution to the Missionary Society. The amount was, of course, small—5s. 6d. in cash, and 280 pounds of arrowroot—but its value lay in the early adoption of a sound principle. The contribution was handed over to the Presbyterian brethren of the New Hebrides, as they have undertaken the evangelization of Fata.

The missionaries give a lively and amusing picture of the scene presented at Ambrym upon the John Williams touching there, in order to land two youths—probably the first who had ever left the island, who were returning home after having received twelve months' instruction. There was reason to believe that the islanders were under the impression that the white man on the floating islands (ships) had cooked and eaten the boys! Now, dressed in complete suits of English clothing, accompanied by the missionaries, they neared their home in a boat. The journal thus describes what followed:—

We found the natives swimming off without arms, showing that they had confidence in the white man. However, they kept a short distance away, indicating a little mistrust. Mr. Jones now advised one of the youths to stand up in the boat, and speak to the men swimming about. He spoke in his native tongue, and the surprise indicated on their countenances, at being addressed in their own language by strangers, was very great; they all appeared paralysed with wonder. "Tell them who you are," we suggested; which being done, such a scene followed as our tongue would fail to tell, pen describe; it must be seen to be realised. The people appeared mad with joy; they shouted to those on shore, splashed and dashed about in the water in all sorts of ways; now a desperate rush was made wandering and unsettled life they lead. The men are coopers and the women basketmakers, and they find all the materials required for their craft in the woods, where, in view of some village, or beside some settlement, they rear for a short season their moveable habitations. A few poles, meeting crossways at the top, and covered with the tough limber bark of the birch-tree, constitute the wigwags. They are evidently a feeble race, and large numbers, I believe, die of consumption. It is contrary to the law of the province for any one to furnish these poor creatures with intoxicating drinks; but this does not prevent them all, men and women, from obtaining as much rum, or other adulterated toxicants, as they can pay for. The Mik-Maks are generally Roman Catholics, but, with habits of theirs, religion could only be a gross form of superstition. They are smooth and gentle in their manners, but with their hands and their tongues very deceitful. The Rev. Mr. Rand, a Baptist minister here, having acquired their language, offered his services as a missionary among these people. Several denominations contribute towards his support, and he has been labouring for years to impart to them a knowledge of the Gospel. He has translated the New Testament into the native tongue. A young man of the tribe, of good talents, appeared to be profoundly impressed with the truths of the Gospel. He soon manifested an ardent desire to become a vessel of light to his benighted brethren, was educated, supplied with money, and went on his mission. The prosperity of Christmas, as he was named, turned his head. He became a fine gentleman instead of a good Christian, ran into dissipation, incurred debt, and all his goods being sold under a legal warrant, Christmas disappeared from the stage.

LABRADOR AND GREENLAND.

The Moravian mission-ship Harmony has accomplished her ninety-third voyage. On her outward passage across the Atlantic she was retarded by foggy weather and almost continual contrary winds. It was amid fog that the first drift-ice was encountered, and the danger was thus materially increased. When the fog dispersed, and the land was first sighted, at about ten miles' distance, there appeared to be between it and the vessel an impassable barrier of ice. Still a passage was found to a narrow belt of open water between the ice and the land, and the ship neared the coast of Sandwich Bay. Happily the wind blew off the shore, and thus enabled the captain to keep a course very near the land, in this manner avoiding the ice, which in some places was not above five miles from the coast. Altogether, about ninety miles of drift-ice had been sailed through. The return voyage was a remarkably fine one. Her cargo was less than the average, as has been the case for several years, in consequence of a succession of unfavourable seasons. Detailed information from the mission-stations appear in our last and present numbers (pp. 84 and 136).

DEPOSITION OF THE BISHOP OF NATAL.

We briefly mentioned, in our last number, the issue of the proceedings at Capetown, in the case of Bishop Colenso. The judgment of the Bishop of Capetown, as Metropolitan of the Anglican Bishops of Africa, is now before us, and fills upwards of seventeen closely-printed columns, the entire proceedings occupying four hundred octavo pages. The following are the nine counts on which the presenting clergy (the Dean of Capetown and two archdeacons) charged Dr. Colenso with heresy:—

1. His disbelief in the Atonement. 2. His belief in Justification without any knowledge of Christ. 3. His belief in natal regeneration. 4. His disbelief in the endlessness of future punishments. 5. His denial that the Holy Scriptures are the Word of God. 6. His denial of the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. 7. His denial that the Bible is a true history of the facts which it professes to describe. 8. His denial of the divinity of our Blessed Lord. 9. His depraving, puffing, and bringing into disrepute the Book of Common Prayer.

Bishop Gray's assessors first delivered their opinions:—

The Bishop (Cotterill) of Grahamstown said he considered all those charges proved; and, as it was to him to arrive at such a conclusion, he considered that, by the false teaching against him, the Bishop of Natal had wholly disqualified himself for bearing rule in the Church of God, and for the cure of souls therein.

The Bishop (Twells) of the Free State announced that he had come to a similar conclusion.

The Bishop of Capetown, in pronouncing judgment, went elaborately into the charges against Dr. Colenso. We quote a few of his remarks on one only. The charge was, Bishop Gray remarked, if possible, graver than any of the preceding. It was the Bishop of Natal of imputing to our Lord ignorance and error, and thereby withstanding that He is God and Man in one Person. Having gone into details with regard to the Nestorian heresy, and the declarations of ancient councils, he quoted Beveridge and Hooker on the two natures:—

The bishop's language [he continued] implies of necessity the existence of two persons. He admits Him to be God; but he says: "At what period of His life upon earth is it to be that He had granted to Him, as the Son of Man, supernaturally, full and accurate information on these points, so that He should be expected to speak about the Pentateuch in other terms than a devout Jew of that day would have employed? Why should it be thought that exhibit himself in all the glory of His person, but at the same time His manner showed that there was room for the accomplishment of a more modest wish—the meeting the immediate need of their host. Thus, the very miracle that first showed forth the Lord's glory was, in His eyes, but the hiding of His essential royalty.

Lost, but not for Ever. My Personal Narrative of Starvation and Providence in the Australian Mountain Regions. By the Rev. R. W. VANDERKISTE. Nisbet and Co.

MR. VANDERKISTE laboured for some years in the metropolis as a City missionary, and the record of his experience in that capacity given in his "Dens of London," will not be easily forgotten by those who have perused it. The little work before us bears the impress of the same mind as his earlier production. In both, we recognise the earnestness of purpose and devotion to the spiritual welfare of others, the power of observation and the happy style of telling a story which are characteristic of the man. Mr. Vanderkiste informs us that from one Thursday night to the following Wednesday night, a space of six days and six nights, the only food of which he partook was one slight meal ere leaving home. During four days and four nights he was exposed to heavy rains; he was, moreover, unprovided with any proper shelter, or any fire. The narrative of his sufferings, under these privations, wandering alone amid the trackless mountains of New South Wales, derives its chief value from the evidence which it affords of the power of personal religion to sustain the mind, even when nature has been strained to its utmost capacity of endurance, and death is in immediate prospect in one of its most agonizing forms. Though it imparts to the narrative a somewhat discursive air, there is much general information on Australian subjects.

Scripture Facts, and Scientific Doubts. By GEORGE PALMER, Commander, Royal Navy. Edinburgh: J. MacLaren.

THE author of this small volume has brought together a considerable number of facts and opinions in defence of a few of the points now so much debated. He starts with a chapter on the fallibility of human reason, in which his intention appears to be to teach us humility as it regards our own judgment, and a certain measure of mistrust as it regards others:—the Bible only delivers utterances which are infallibly correct. The Divine Authority of the Pentateuch is the title of the second chapter; but the chapter itself seems chiefly to aim at establishing the genuineness and authenticity of the Pentateuch. Among some very appropriate illustrations introduced into this chapter, we are sorry to see some which will not bear criticism. Such are the supposed Hindoo legend of Adima and Iva (p. 27) and the account of the Egyptian Bacchus (p. 40). Again, the fact that an apocryphal book is not of Divine origin is not sufficient to prove its statements historically untrue (p. 31). The third chapter contains a number of interesting extracts from geological and other authors, and is designed to prove the truth of the Scripture account of creation. The fourth chapter, on the deluge, is meant to show that the Noachian flood could have been, and was really universal. Captain Palmer speaks of it as "the destruction of the entire habitable globe by water," but it is manifest that he does not mean that that what he means is, "that the whole world was submerged." Here again, we find him relying sometimes to unstable authority, as at p. 103, where he quotes, as a Hindoo legend, a fact perpetrated by a modern Hindoo, and afterwards confessed to be such. The unity of the human race is the subject of the fifth chapter. This is followed by some concluding observations. We admire the spirit and intention of this small work, and we heartily approve of some of its reasonings; but we are not sure that it meets the requirements of the day.

Christ our Life; or, Scenes in our Lord's Passion and Ministry. By the Rev. JOHN BAILLIE. John F. Shaw and Co.

THIS book deserves a much longer notice than we can give it. Its title reminds us of the delightful volume of Beaser on "Christ the Life of the World;" but it is more thoroughly English in its cast and character, and we may say more popular in its form. It abounds in illustrations from a multitude of sources, comprising remarkable facts and the sayings of many wise and good men. It is neither sermons nor essays, but rather a series of contemplations—to adopt the word which Mr. Baillie has prefixed to the first piece in the volume. The matter is distributed under five general heads, with sub-divisions: 1. Christ's Passion; 2. Christ Risen and Glorified; 3. Christ and Sinners; 4. Christ and His Saints; 5. Parting Glimpses. From first to last everything is serious and scriptural and practical; there is an utter absence of all that we may call critical, controversial, and learned. It is a plain and simple utterance; but the utterance of a true and devout mind, of one who has many appropriate and valuable thoughts, and of one who is singularly skilful in expressing them in a popular and attractive manner. The artless and untutored style of the volume reminds us of some of the more guileless and unsophisticated Christians of other days—such, for example, as Alexander Rutherford, and men of that stamp. Mr. Baillie has been very successful in some of his other works, and we look upon this as equally fitted to win for him a large circle of sympathising and we may say, of admiring readers.

the doctrines of the Reformation first gathered head in Europe, the Belgian provinces were among the foremost to give them a welcome reception, and Brussels promised to become another Geneva. But the bloody massacres of Alva and the Regent Archduchess did their work, and completely exterminated Protestantism in that unfortunate country—a fact that should never be forgotten when we are tempted to believe in the once fashionable doctrine that persecution never injured the cause of truth. Since that event, Belgium has been the most Catholic country in Europe, next to Ireland, and so it remains to this day. But again we observe the leaven is fermenting, and the old stock of the Reformation to put forth new buds and leaves. A report of the Belgian Evangelization Society, of which we give an abstract in our other columns, shows the progress that has been made in that country within the last quarter of a century, and proves that, however slowly, yet surely, Protestantism makes its way in that country. It is remarkable, too, that in Belgium Popery is divided against itself. There is no strong secular power to crush her development and no rival sect to interfere with her operations; and yet, having no external enemies, the state of the Romish Church in Belgium has for years been one of civil war. In general the Liberal Catholics, as they are called, have the advantage, and govern the State; but from time to time the priest-party make a fierce rally, and temporarily recover their lost ground. Some such exertion was made the other day at the elections for Bruges, when the success of the priests so disturbed the Liberals, that the Ministry thought it necessary to resign, but as the friends of the priests were not prepared to take their places, the old members of the Government were, after a short interregnum, called upon to resume their places.

We have already adverted to the ominously quiet attitude of France. That same remark cannot be made of her next neighbour, the kingdom of Italy. There all is life, animation, and stir, coupled with an impression, vague indeed, but nearly universal, that great events are in preparation, and that important changes will be made in the boundaries of nations before the end of the year. Cannon are cast, and sent to the arsenals; the army is organised, and put on a war footing. The partisans of Italy do not deny that all these preparations are made in the prospect of an early war, but they say that the menaces come from the side of Austria, impatient to recover her old footing in the Peninsula. More impartial observers believe that the menaces are all on the other side, and that it is much more likely Italy will take advantage of Austrian entanglements in Denmark to seize Venetia. But, from whatever side the first provocation may come, it is agreed that the present relations between the two countries cannot be much longer retained, both parties finding that the state of armed peace which subsists between them is scarcely less expensive, and much more irritating, than actual war. This state of things, we need not say is not favourable to the progress of the Gospel. If evidence were wanted of this fact, it would be found in the deeply-interesting letter of our Italian correspondent. It is true indeed, that in his letter there is much to cheer the friends of Evangelical truth. The sale of Bibles and religious books is considerably greater than last year, though it does not reach the amount of those sold in 1861, when the nation was in its first enthusiasm on account of its recovered liberty. It is impossible to calculate the amount of good accomplished through the diffusion of so large an amount of Evangelical truth throughout the country. But still the evil influences greatly predominate. The truth is, there are but two classes in Italy—the educated, who are liberals, the uneducated, who are devoted to the priests. Differing in almost everything else, they unhappily agree in this—the Popery and Christianity are identical. The result of these convictions are much the same for while the liberals refuse to listen to Evangelical agents, and reject Christianity altogether, the lower classes, who cling to their priests, not only reject, but, if they durst, would persecute the colporteurs and preachers. The scenes described by our correspondent as taking place at Palermo, in Sicily, differ little, if at all, in detail from the old heathen ceremonies used in classical times. Oh for another Paul to visit those beautiful but benighted regions!

The Roman Catholic party are extremely annoyed, as they may well be, at the awful calamity at Santiago. Father Oakeley writes to the London newspapers, and several priests have written to the provincial journals, denying, on the authority of letters received from the town, the heartless conduct at first ascribed to the priests when the church was burning and the hapless victims perishing by the thousand. These contradictions, we observe, appear only in England. The Continental journals which record the conflagration, so far as we can learn, publish the versions of the story as they were originally given in the country. We may, therefore, accept the nervous anxiety displayed in this country to vindicate cate the fair fame of the Chilian ecclesiastics as an unconscious tribute to the power of public opinion in England. But we cannot admit that these defences are worth much. They all, so far as we have seen them, profess to be based on letters received from persons on the spot; but these letters themselves, it is to be observed, are carefully suppressed. And on the other hand, the accounts which impugned the conduct of the priests were from no heretic sources; they were the narratives of the Roman Catholic newspapers published in that town. And, last of all, by accounts since come to hand, it appears the populace are so indignant with the priests whose mummeries led to the mischief, that the Legislature has been compelled to decree the utter razing of the church, and to prohibit its ever being built up again. Had the priests shown ordinary humanity, surely this severe condemnation could never have taken place.

The latest news from America brings only the clang of arms and preparations for a fiercer struggle than all that has gone before. The winter appears to have been as severe all over the American continent as in this country; but before the frosts had passed away, the armies on both sides were in motion. The advantages, such as they were, have hitherto rested with the Confederates, who appear resolved to recover some portions of the ground they lost last year. But as yet the season is too early, and their plans too undeveloped, to admit of a speculation being hazarded on that point. In the Federal States, the public attention has been comparatively called off from the progress of the war to watch the agitation set on foot for the election of the new President, which takes place next year. President Lincoln is the only Republican and Abolitionist candidate in the field; his opponents are numerous, but they appear to be undecided whether they shall start in opposition to him General McClellan, or General Grant, or some civilian member of the Senate. The President himself either entertains no doubt of his election, or at all events he is not afraid to hazard his popularity; for he has just issued a proclamation calling for a new draft throughout the Union of half a million men. In this number, however, he includes those that have enlisted under the call for 300,000 last October; but it is said these are comparatively few. The enforcement of this draft may produce important consequences, as it is well known that the original enthusiasm for the war died out some time since, as is evident by the high bounties that are now offered to induce men to enlist. Of the Southern preparations we hear less. As to the negroes, for whom the war is now avowedly fought, the most conflicting accounts are abroad. Some say they are penned up by the thousand in the Federal lines, unemployed, unfed, uncared for, and dying off by the score daily; in other quarters their intelligence, activity, and courage are highly extolled. They work hard, they rise to be overseers, they form steady and disciplined regiments. Probably both stories may be true, and the difference between them will be caused by the difference of their superintendence.

HOME.

The Parliament met on the 4th of last month. This was an event which had been looked forward to with much anxiety for some time previous, as affording an opportunity for terminating the suspense in which the nation was left respecting the nature of our engagements with Denmark, and the probability of our going to war on behalf of that country; for though there was much sympathy with the Danish cause, though there was hardly an Englishman to be found who maintained that the German invaders had right on their side, still there was no desire expressed in any quarter that we should go to war on the question. The great body of the people appeared to be in a state of indecision, and to be willing to leave the question of peace or war with the Ministers of the Crown. Never, probably, was there a body of men who had more momentous issues placed in their hands. When it was known that the Ministers had decided that, for the present at least, they would not interfere, there was, for the moment, a feeling of disappointment, which was, however, quickly dispelled when it was made clear that we had come under no engagement, direct or indirect, to guarantee the independence of the Danish territories; that our treaty obligations were precisely identical—whether more or less—with Russia and France, and even with Austria and Prussia themselves; and as the two latter Powers maintained that their position was not incompatible with their observance of the treaty, and the other Powers, but absolutely, declined to interfere in the matter, there was nothing for us to do but to cast ourselves in favour of peace, and to show our sense of its blessings by remaining at home ourselves. So manifest was it made that this was the only course compatible with the safety and the honour of England, that all parties have acquiesced in it, and the Opposition, though numerically so strong as to be able to overturn the present Government on question such as Denmark, where popularity would be on their side, patriotically forebear press their advantage. The present attitude of England is, therefore, one that may be to have received the consent of the whole nation; and our unanimity at home may console us for the taunts and jeers that are thrown out against us abroad by parties whose sarcasms are, there is too much reason to believe, only thin covers for the rage they feel that England did not, by involving herself single-handed in war, leave them free to pursue their own policy unchecked in Europe.

The non-established Churches in the country are at the present time in the enjoyment of rest. There is nothing occurring among them that either from without or within appears to trouble their repose, or to disturb them from those plans of Christian usefulness in which they are engaged. But that can hardly be said to be the case with the Established Church. The daring though shallow speculations of Colenso, for which no legal restraint appears to have been provided, are not more vexatious than the half-forgotten heresies of the "Essays and Reviews," for which it has just been discovered that the legal restraints which were provided have been found totally insufficient. We have given in another column the salient points of the Lord Chancellor's judgment. We need only here remark on the singular anomaly—unique, we believe, in ecclesiastical history—that opinions which have been solemnly condemned by the all but unanimous voice of the episcopal bench, and by the judgment of the Convocation, are yet declared by the legal courts of the Church to contain nothing that is contrary to her Articles. We cannot doubt, with all our respect for the eminent lay members of the Court who framed the judgment, that they strained a point too far in favour of the appellants, in their anxiety to render the boundaries of the Church as broad as possible. Indeed, that is apparent on the face of the judgment, for while at the beginning, and as long as the argument will tell in favour of the appellants, they insist on words being interpreted according to their ordinary and common sense meaning, towards the close they are found arguing, in favour of Mr. Wilson, that the word "everlasting" is to be taken in some sense which no plain man ever thought of attaching to it. Whether biassed or not, it is not the less certain that the judgment remains without further appeal. It is now settled law that the Church of England includes men who deny and contempt on her doctrines.

We are glad to observe that the subject of a union among the different classes of non-established Presbyterian bodies continues to make progress in Scotland. The committee which the Free Church and the United Presbyterian appointed at last meeting, for conference on the subject, are bearing fruit. Whether they have so far advanced in the task of smoothing difficulties as to be able to present a scheme of union at the next meeting of their respective constituents, we do not know. Probably not. In such cases over-haste is likely to defeat its own ends. The more deliberately the union is gone about, the more cautious it is examined on all sides, the more lasting is it likely to prove when it is at last effected.

The great problem, how to deal with our criminal classes, has engaged the attention of Christian philosophers for generations, yet we cannot say it is much nearer a solution now than it was when it first attracted notice. One gratifying fact is worth notice, that the increase of crime does not by any means keep pace with the increase of population; that in some parts of the country there is a positive decrease. But in spite of this, the criminal classes are far too numerous to allow us to give up further concern respecting them. We have undergone many changes of feeling towards these outcast members of society. The nation may now be described as in its cold fit. Because a considerable proportion of ticket-of-leave prisoners have lapsed into crime, the sweeping conclusion was adopted that reformation was altogether hopeless, and that nothing but severe punishment would do. There was reason to fear that these opinions would have their influence on the Government and Legislature. It is, therefore, all the more satisfactory to observe, by the new measures the Government have introduced on criminal punishments, that they have not abandoned all faith in reformation, nor shut out from the criminal all hope of earning his way back to the respect of society, if he chooses to win it by a long course of honest industry, and it is to be a severe and searching discipline. The licenses to shorten the duration of punishment are still to be continued; but they are to be made to work more systematically, and under more stringent regulations. The plan, as put forth by the Home Secretary, had the good fortune to satisfy the views of most of our criminal reformers; and there is reason to believe, therefore, that the new measure will have a fair trial.

Evangelical Christendom.

THE PRAYER OF CHRISTENDOM.

THE letters which pass through the post are sacred, and so are fireside communings. No one is entitled to stand behind the door and listen to the forthpourings of filial grief or affection: no one except the receiver is entitled to read the letter from the absent brother. And so a great deal of prayer is confidential. This morning the door of the quiet chamber has been closed, and into the ear of God have been confided sins and sorrows, fears, errors, weaknesses, aspirations which the suppliant hopes that the world shall never know. And they are safe. He who seeth in secret alone was present, and no one shares the confidence. No more than you can divine the messages which are passing along these electric wires—no more than the passenger adown the streets can overhear the converse in the upper chamber, can the stranger intermeddle with the worshipper in communion with his Saviour and his God.

But if every individual is thus privileged—if the heart of our hearts is a holy of holies into which no one is able to intrude—there are also surrounding courts more or less sacred into which our friends and neighbours are admitted; and, recognising the social element in our nature, the Most High has provided that a portion of our worship shall be public, or that if we cannot come all together in one place, that we shall possess some mutual knowledge of the topics on which we are agreed in our several intercessions and supplications.

There is one prayer, for instance, which is no secret, and in which millions have joined this Sabbath morning. It was the prayer of the Queen as well as of the soldier who stood sentinel at the palace gate. It was the prayer of the wan, thought-wasted scholar in academic robe as well as of the bluff, unlettered ploughboy. It ascended from the deck of the little ship far out in the lonely sea, and from the bowels of the earth—from subterraneous worshippers in the sparkling depths of the Silesian mine. From under the snowy dome of the Lapland hut God heard it, and He heard it from the spicy groves of Ceylon; and, as whispered by the invalid inside his curtains, and as re-echoed by a thousand voices along the aisles of the mighty minster—after this manner consenting Christendom commenced the week by praying, "Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be thy Name."

In various points of view this fact is interesting. It is delightful to know that the name of Jesus has so far prevailed, and that a prayer first taught by Him has been taken up and adopted by three hundred millions of the human family. And the value of the fact is increased when we advert to certain considerations.

For instance: Some would like to see adopted all throughout the world one creed or confession, and many who do not go so far as this, still long for more unity of faith and opinion. But is not a belief implied in every prayer? and in this prayer more particularly is there not a creed latent in every line? "He that cometh unto God must believe that he is," and whatsoever he addresses to the Most High he must surely believe no less than what he speaks to his fellow-men. And although it would be a dry process to precipitate and crystallise into theological propositions all the truths or doctrines which a devotional exercise carries in solution, it is nevertheless true that every prayer is pervaded by a certain belief; and not only do its several petitions indicate the worshipper's faith in God's perfections and promises, but its spirit and tone betoken his impressions as to the Divine dispositions.

Thus, every time that with realising intelligence the Lord's-prayer is uttered, a worshipper feels that with Christ's own sanction he says, "Our Father." God is neither remote nor reluctant; neither an impersonal Fate, such as awed the spirit and froze the lips of Grecian worshippers; nor a God far off and indifferent to mortal affairs, as philosophies old and new have surmised; nor a Foe, estranged and hard to appease, as the guilty conscience finds too much cause to fear; but a Father—the very God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in Him our Father all, with His throne high in the heavens, yet coming into this closet to hear and hear His feeblest child, and as a Father pitieth His children, pitying them that fear Him. And he who prays “after this manner” believes in the coming of God’s kingdom. He believes that there is to be a reign of God on earth, when man’s will shall be the will of his kind Creator—for earth and Heaven one way, even as for each there now exists one law. And in this devotional creed is recognised the doctrine of particular providence—“Give us this day our daily bread;” and man’s dependence for all good on an influence higher and Divine—“Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.” And in it is the Gospel; he who says it believes in the remission of sins, and has so far drunk the spirit of the Gospel as to be himself forgiving—“Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them who trespass against us.” And what is more, the suppliant believes the efficacy of prayer. Worship is not merely a tribute due by a subject to his sovereign—“For thine is the kingdom”—but it is the presentation of desires, with assurance of being heard by One who, in the answer, honours His own omnipotence and faithfulness—“For thine is the power and the glory.”

God’s omnipresence and omnipotence, His particular providence, His fatherliness, His readiness to pardon, His readiness to provide the daily bread, His readiness to answer prayer, His approaching universal reign, His holiness, are all assumed or expressed in this comprehensive prayer, and form the doctrinal channel which its devotional current flows along; as well as the correlate truths of man’s sinfulness, weakness, dependence.

Is it not pleasant to know so much consent? Amongst all the ignorance and superstition—all the controversy and contradiction—is it not pleasant to know that Christ’s authority has prevailed to obtain for these great truths a response in 200 languages—the amen of one-fourth of the human family? Within the pale of this little liturgy there is one faith, one hope, one God and Father. As long as we keep within its precincts, there is neither Greek nor Roman Catholic, neither Mary nor St. Michael—there is none but that same Lord who taught it to His disciples, and who has so connected it with Himself, as in using it to make impossible the thought of any other intercessor—“Christ all and in all.”

From its theology we may pass for an instant to its style or spirit. The Lord Jesus did not say, “Let the following be your formula—pray in such words and phrases;” but “after this manner;” without vain repetitions—without prolixity; in petitions precise and definite, and for such objects as are herein indicated. And precious as are its very words, it will do us more service if we can catch the “manner” or spirit of the prayer, than if we were merely repeating the prayer itself a million times over, and so converting into the vainest of all repetitions the unmeaning paternoster.

Some one has remarked that this form of petition breathes “A filial spirit ‘Father’—a catholic spirit, ‘Our Father’—a reverential spirit, ‘Hallowed be thy name’—a missionary spirit, ‘Thy kingdom come’—an obedient spirit, ‘Thy will be done’—a dependent spirit, ‘Give us this day our daily bread’—a forgiving spirit ‘and forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us’—a cautious spirit, ‘Lead us not into temptation’—a confident and adoring spirit, ‘For thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.’”

So filial is its spirit, that in order to say the first word heartily a man had need to be a Christian. In order to say "Abba, Father," it needs that God should send into our hearts the spirit of His Son. (Gal. iv. 6.) Or, putting it more graciously, if one is welcome to use this prayer; but in order to use it truly, he must use it Christ's Name: he must merge his own name in the Name of that interceding Elder brother who, to as many as receive Him, gives power to become sons of God. And though it seems a bold thing to do, it is just the thing which the Lord Jesus commands and desires us to do. Without any question as to our antecedent worthiness or present fitness, the kind Saviour bids us now begin. He puts His Name at our command; He introduces us to the Father; and with that Name of His as our introduction, and with a God of Grace to go to, he says, "Ask, and ye shall receive."

Then again, "our Father," which means, my own Father and the Father of us all also. So that our blessed Lord binds up benevolence with religion, a forthright feeling towards our fellowmen with each approach to our Father in Heaven. We are rich, but the poor Christian who sweeps the crossing is your brother, the old woman in yonder garret is your sister. Your complexion is fair, but your Father in Heaven has other children here on earth who, although black, are in His sight comely. You say in the old Anglo-Saxon of Wicliff and Latimer, "Our Father;" but the words are not more welcome in the ear of God than "Padre nostro" from Waldensian valleys—than "Vater unser" from fellow-worshippers in the land of Luther. And so, unconscious of any caste, comprehensive of every colour, Christianity itself, that plural makes no distinction in discipleship, but pledges worshipper to all of every class and kindred whom the Divine Father owns as children.

"Hallowed be thy name;" which, reduced to the soft, lowly accents of human supplication, is just the song of the seraphim, "Holy, holy, holy Lord of hosts; let the whole earth be filled with thy glory."

Or, as the second petition continues and expands it, "Thy kingdom come;" that the whole earth be filled with thy glory." God's kingdom replacing the empire of brute force and violence, of cunning and chicane; overturning the devil's empire of fraud, and deceit, and falsehood. God's own kingdom of righteousness, and peace, and joy; that empire where, through the help of God's own Spirit, each man shall be made master of himself, and through the might of love and goodness shall win the hearts around him—the empire of virtue, beneficence, and piety.

"Thy will be done in earth as it is in Heaven." Help me to do it. Let that be done in the little world of my own heart and conduct; and so let it be done in all hearts, all homes, by every race, in every region. Let it be done by men as it is done by angels. Let it be done by many as it is done by Him who showed to earth that it is done in Heaven.

"Give us this day our daily bread"—that food which may sustain our frame, strengthen for Thy service; the daily bread, and whatsoever that legitimately lies—for the discharge of daily duty, health, skill, energy; for the bearing of our trial, meekness, fortitude, patience in its perfect work.

"Forgive us as we forgive." Melted by God's mercies, make us forgiving, and let the love of God be shed abroad in our hearts so abundantly as to make us long-suffering, and so better able to understand how the God of all grace multiplies pardons.

"And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." Through the bad example all around conduct us, keeping us loyal to Thyself in the midst of a sinful world, pure amidst pollution, and so passing through the things seen as not to be the things eternal.

On the wonderful brevity of this prayer we have said nothing. In the prison at Ava, Dr. Judson rendered it into rhyme, and his version, like that of Francis Quarles, is as short as the original Greek :—

Our Father God, who art in heaven,
All hallowed be Thy name ;
Thy kingdom come ; Thy will be done
In earth and heaven the same.
Give us this day our daily bread ;
And, as we those forgive

Who sin against us, so may we Forgiving grace receive.
Into temptation lead us not ;
From evil set us free ;
The kingdom, power, and glory, Lord,
Ever belong to Thee.

But more wonderful than its brevity or compactness is its density—the force and fulness of its several petitions. Any one of them is inexhaustible. “Thy kingdom come” is the essence of every missionary prayer which has been offered since the day of Pentecost down to this morning. It is the lesson of a lifetime, and is seldom perfectly learned in this world, to say, “Thy will be done.” We had never more need than this morning to pray, “Forgive us our trespasses ;” but if we live till to-morrow, we shall to-morrow have as much need as to-day. And the last petition will only obtain a conclusive answer when we find ourselves “delivered from evil” by being absent from the body, and received into the safe protection of the Lord’s own presence.

CALVIN'S RUPTURE WITH ROME.

THE details of Calvin’s early history cannot be ascertained with unerring accuracy and precision. The main facts are known, but it is impossible to attain absolute confidence in fitting these with their accompanying circumstances of place and date. That there was a crisis in Calvin’s spiritual development as well as in Luther’s ; that the truth did not arise on his mind by the slow process, clear and cold, of a merely intellectual dawn ; that his soul was racked with agitation and distress ; and that he welcomed the change, when it came, not with the temperate satisfaction of one who reaches a new state of enlightenment, but with the enraptured joy of one who has passed from death to life, from perdition to salvation : all this we know from Calvin’s own lips. But we cannot fix the day, the month, or even the year, when these things took place, nor can we positively determine whether their scene was Paris, Orleans, Bourges, or whether they were spread over the periods spent by Calvin in all three. Principal Tulloch unquestionably errs in declaring that we can trace in the case of Calvin “no struggling steps of dogmatic conviction—no profound spiritual agitations—no crisis, as in the case of the German Reformer.” The words which we have quoted from Calvin, descriptive of the travail-throes by which his soul was rent in the agony of new birth, afford demonstrative truth that these statements are incorrect. Dr. Merle D’Aubigné speaks with decision in placing the conversion of Calvin so early as his nineteenth year. “It was in Paris,” says the historian of the Reformation, “as we have seen, that Calvin received a new birth ; it cannot be placed later, as some have wished to do, without contradicting the most positive testimony. Calvin, according to Theodore Beza, was instructed in the true religion by Olivetan, before he went to Orleans. We know, moreover, that Calvin either at Bourges or at Orleans, ‘wonderfully advanced the kingdom of God.’ How could he have done so if he had not known that kingdom ? Calvin at the age of nineteen, gifted with a deep and conscientious soul, surrounded by relations and friends zealous for the Gospel, living at Paris in the midst of a religious movement of great power, was himself touched by the Spirit of God. Most certainly everything was not done then ; some of the traits, which we have indicated after the Reformer himself, may belong to his residence at Orleans or at Bourges ; but the essential work was done in 1527. Such is the conclusion at which we have arrived after careful

An opinion respecting Calvin's spiritual history, thus deliberately stated by D'Aubigné, may justly be considered to possess authority, and we have no idea naturally opposing to it any conclusion of our own. There is, however, a reason why the meaning of the term "essentials," as applied by D'Aubigné to the conversion of Calvin, should be rigorously defined. We refer to the fact that, for some considerable time after his nineteenth year, he drew the first, of the livings of St. Martin de Motteville, and subsequently of Pontivy, in the Popish Church. We are not satisfied with Principal Tulloch's statement that Calvin's youth justified his conduct in this instance. There was no Calvin's youth at which, to the best of our knowledge, his moral perceptions were keen, and it is difficult to imagine him, either before or after his conversion, enjoying of pecuniary benefits derived from a Church which had entirely lost tenderness and affection. The truth seems to be that, if we confine the application of D'Aubigné's "essentials" to the strictly personal element in Calvin's conversion—the faithful appropriation by his own soul of the righteousness of Christ for salvation—we may with some confidence place the change as early as it is placed by D'Aubigné; but that, if we embrace within the essentials of that change a apprehension that the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ alone is reconcilable with Romanism—a clear consciousness that he could not be at the same time a dutiful subject of the Pope and a loyal servant of Christ—we need not hesitate to admit that several years elapsed before the change was complete. In thus stating the case, we do not contradict D'Aubigné; we only attempt merely to lend an additional precision to his conclusions. By making a plain line of demarcation between Calvin's personal and what we may call his official conversion, we obtain a full explanation of his continuing, after he became reconciled to God by Christ, in receipt of emoluments as a Popish priest. And how natural, how self-consistent, how satisfactory in every point of view, is the theory at which we thus arrive of Calvin's transition from a student to a Reformer! The question with him, first of all, was the salvation of his soul. No modest and healthful nature begins with the amendment of institutions—it looks first within, and considers the defects and the requirements discovered. How could John Calvin escape from the wrath to come? How could John Calvin enjoy fruition of the promises of the Gospel? How could John Calvin order the anarchy in his own soul, and wrap its moral chaos in a garment of light and composing light? These were the points on which, to begin with, he must be had. Not until they were settled could Calvin look abroad, and how his activity was to operate on the generation in which he lived, the generation into which he was born. Not until he had experience of Divine pardon in his soul could he proclaim a Redeemer to the world; still less could he appreciate the terrible duties which might be laid upon him, when he definitely ascertained that the Church of Rome obscured and perverted instead of teaching the pure Gospel of Christ. He hoped that, though peace had not reached his soul through the observance of Church ordinances, he might continue in the Church. It did not at first occur to him that the truth which had been to him inexpressibly precious would be snatched and cast out as an unclean and poisonous thing by that spiritual mother whose breasts he had clung since infancy. He loved repose. He was passionately fond of study. He trusted that, though his sympathy with the new doctrines rendered it advisable for him to abstain from taking holy orders—he was never a priest of Rome—he could lead a quiet life as a layman, pursue a civil career in the fields of knowledge, and look forward joyfully to that rest which is the inheritance for the saints of God. He abandoned, therefore, for the time, the formal study of theology, and, with the approbation of his father, proceeded to Orleans to study law under the eminent jurist, Pierre de l'Etoile.

Calvin enters, then, upon the second stage of preparation for the work appointed him. He has received an education in the Latin classics and in logic as good as the age can afford; he has personally become acquainted with the truth as it is in Jesus; he is now led—surely there is no presumption in saying that he is providentially led—to the study of law. This man is to require the capacities of the legislator and statesman as well as of the scholar and theologian; he will be the counsellor and guide of all the Reformed Churches in Christendom; it is necessary, therefore, that he should master the science of jurisprudence, “a science,” says one of the greatest practical thinkers of modern times, “which does more to quicken and invigorate the understanding than all the other kinds of learning put together.” Calvin excelled in every study on which he ever entered, but for jurisprudence he seems to have had a special aptitude. The relation of the science to man's universal interests and characteristics as a social being; the breadth and solidity of the principles on which it is based; the amplitude of its classifications and the delicacy of its distinctions; the demand it makes upon the higher qualities of the mind,—judgment, abstraction, strength of intellectual vision: all these would endear it to Calvin. We learn, accordingly, without surprise, that he made rapid strides in the new field, and that, within a year, his superiority was so conspicuous, that, in the absence of the professors, he was called upon to take their place.

From Orleans Calvin proceeded to Bourges, his object still being the study of law. He was already an accomplished Latinist, but not until now did he become acquainted with Greek. He studied the language under Melchior Wolmar, a German, who is described by Beza as a man of piety and talent. Calvin had hitherto read the New Testament in the Vulgate. Even through that troubled medium the truth had reached his soul, but it must have constituted an important epoch in his history when he found access to the Gospels and Epistles in the language in which they were written. And it is scarcely necessary to add that, without a knowledge of Greek, Calvin could never have been a theologian or a Biblical critic of the first order.

But it was not designed that Calvin should be a lawyer, nor was his fair vision of a life devoted to intellectual luxury and the cultivation of his own spiritual vineyard to be realised. His father was now dead, and the views of material advancement which influenced Gerald Calvin in directing the studies of his son into a channel which might conduct him to the highest offices of the State were of too worldly a character to have any hold on the mind of Calvin. Cast by nature in the finest mould in which she ever shapes the human being, he appears, even before the time of his conversion, to have loved knowledge for its own sake, and to have been incapable of vulgar ambition. Though he had turned aside, moreover, from the ecclesiastical profession, he had not cast aside the thoughts which had filled his mind in Paris, and his intercourse with Olivetan and other friends holding the new opinions had not been suspended. That essential change in his personal state and character, which had taken place in Paris, began to reveal its inevitable tendency to draw on other changes. The ruling passion of his heart, the sacred passion for God's truth, could no longer be restrained from asserting its sway over the operations of his intellect. Calvin returned with new ardour to theology, the whole force of his mature and cultured intellect being devoted to the study of Scripture. Again his progress was wonderful, and as the pupil in law had soon risen into a master, so the student in theology became speedily a revered instructor. “I was naturally bashful,” he said afterwards, referring to the period, “and loved leisure

now the dread question must be faced—Shall I remain in communion with Rome, or shall I shake the dust from my feet, and arise and witness for Christ? Let us not wonder that months, or even years, elapsed before fully answered. Let us not judge him harshly because he found it hard to rend from his heart those tender and hallowed associations which had closely round it, that they seemed to have become part of his very being. Calvin would fain have remained within the Church and assisted in purifying her. These men were no hot revolutionists, animated with a fierce desire; they were temperate, thoughtful, sober-minded; lovers of order; anxious to tread the old paths. "One thing chiefly," said Calvin, "turned my mind away from the new doctrines, reverence for the Church." He would not sacrifice the majesty of the Church. He could not, he declared, separate from the Church. "I desire concord and unity, O Lord!" he exclaimed, "but the unity of the Church for is that which has its beginning and its ending in Thee." How striking is the contrast which this affectionate reluctance on the part of the men of 1520 to break with Rome presents to the heartless levity with which the men of the revolutionary period, the men of 1792, threw off all pretence of devotion to the altar! Sincere religious belief, even though unenlightened, has an ennobling effect on the mind, but infidelity and atheism destroy the very roots of moral and make their votaries utterly incapable of true, genial, home-bred affection. As well for us, apt as we are, in the blaze of our Protestant enlightenment, to look on with contempt, if not with anger and detestation, the love of Romanists for the Church, to recollect that all honest faith is not only respectable in itself, but the likeliest state of mind on which to admit further knowledge. It is a high which has presented insuperable difficulty even to such a mind as Lord Brougham, why Protestantism has almost ceased, since the close of the sixteenth century, make advances upon Romanism; but the chief cause assuredly is that, since the close of the sixteenth century, Protestants and Roman Catholics have occupied the same ground; that they have met, not for the comparison of ideas, but in the strife of party; that they have ceased to have a sympathetic apprehension of the motives by which they are respectively governed; and that thus the gates of understanding on either side have been closed. Are we not almost universally in the habit of regarding the refusal of so many Romanists to accept the teaching of Luther as an astounding, an all but inexplicable, instance of perversity and obstinacy? Yet, if we only consider it, do we not perceive that the doctrine of the Papacy, that the Papacy was not the Church of God, but Antichrist, must have been to the Romanists of that generation presented an inexpressibly melancholy, nay, a gloomy and appalling idea? "We had prayed with tears; we had loved with our hearts; here was no choice of way open to us. No guidance, from God or man, was given us, this, and behold it was a lie." Such are the words in which Mr. Ruskin endeavored to express the feelings of pious Romanists in those days, and they should be carefully pondered by all who would master the secret of the sixteenth century. His Papacy was no Jonah's gourd, that had come up in a night and seemed to wither in an hour; it was what forty generations had believed to be the vine planted on earth by the hand of Christ, and watered by the Spirit of God. If the Church had been false to her Lord, if the Christian vine had been changed into a Upas tree, if the temple of God had become the temple of Baal, could the human soul dare to accept so terrible a revelation? It is to be regretted that Luther and Calvin should have abandoned the Church of Rome in a moment of passion and feelings of sorrow and amazement.

Calvin, however, is unable to stop. From point to point he has been on until the grasp of his colossal intellect has been fairly laid upon this truth, that the Church, having apostatised from the faith, must be re-constituted on the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone. Once he has made this truth his own, his heart becomes calm and resolute, his life work opens before him. From that time it may be said of him, more deliberately and emphatically than of any man since Paul and John, that he offered up himself living sacrifice unto God. As we follow him from those youthful days, we see him literally burning himself away in labours of devotion to God and good to man. Such a life was sublime. Faithless and frivolous, we blame him for lack of the more winning and attractive graces; we turn from him with antipathy because he did not loiter by the flowery paths of life, and smile, as we sing, and gambol like the rest of us; but might we not pardon one man in the last ages for towering above the throng in prophet-like devotion to his God, asking no recognition from his fellows, seeking no reward in time, content if only the light of eternity, the light of God's approving countenance, fell upon his brow? I had his faults? Yes. If men like him had not their faults, we should worship them; and it is a merciful dispensation of Providence that the faults and defects of men so great as Calvin and Luther are so conspicuous, that we never can have a difficulty in distinguishing the image of perfect humanity, the Man Christ Jesus standing aloft and alone, transfigured in the ineffable light of Godhead.

The reputation of Calvin was meanwhile extending. We doubt whether there is on record an instance of such a reputation being attained by so young a man without some brilliant achievement of a literary character. Calvin had published a treatise of importance; but so high a conception of his parts and attainments had already been formed throughout the intellectual class in Europe, that, before entering on his twenty-fourth year, he was included in the number of eminent divines consulted by Henry VIII. on the subject of his divorce. It was becoming evident, all that this was one of those transcendent men who appear only at intervals in many centuries.

It was in 1533 that Calvin's final breach with Rome occurred. He was in Paris. His friend, Nicolas Cop, a physician of the town, and at the same time rector of the Sorbonne, had to deliver an address on the festival of All Saints. He consulted with Calvin on the subject, and it is believed that Calvin furnished him with the discourse which he delivered. Instead of being a panegyric on all the saints, it was an exaltation of the one Saviour. The Popish authorities of the University took offence. Cop was charged with heresy, and summoned to answer; an attempt was made to arrest Calvin; but both escaped.

Calvin now wandered from place to place in France; but the keenness of persecution increased, and he felt his life to be in danger. He employed himself during these years in preparing the first edition of his "Institutes of the Christian Religion." In 1536 he had become an exile from France, and in August of that year (according to Tholuck) he wrote the far-famed preface to that work, addressed to the King of France.

It is a magnificent spectacle, as the mind's eye can realise it, this of Calvin, yet twenty-eight years of age, standing up and proclaiming to Francis the message of the Lord; telling him what he ought to do, and calling upon him, in God's name, to do it. Calvin addresses his prince with reverential courtesy, but without a trace of adulation, and there is a tone of authority in his statement of the truth of God which irresistibly conveys the impression that the speaker and the monarch face each other on equal terms. We now learn on what grounds Calvin has dared to separate from the Church of Rome, and to pronounce her no true Church of Christ.]

Jews "have no dealings with the Samaritans." The Greek despises the barbarian. Peter will not "eat with the Gentiles." The freeman despises the conquered slave. The slave in turn abhors his conqueror. Norman and Saxon fight out long years of feudal hostility. The name of the stranger is the symbol of national degradation. The very mention of the foreigner stirs the blood of France to the present day. The Welsh peasant will in the nineteenth century sometimes give the "Saxon" traveller a wrong direction in his journey. In the far East the passion burns with barbarous fierceness. The Chinese rabble pursues the English party through the streets of their city with the cry of "Foreign devils!" believing really that the souls of the strangers are incarnate fiends. The policy of Japan excludes the whole of Europe from its ports and harbours. Something of the same animosity still exists even in European nations where foreigners are rarely seen. Thus the more childish is any nation, the more it resembles the baby, in hiding its eyes from the stranger, or screaming at his approach.

This strong dislike for aliens in blood, in language, in ideas, in outward appearance, lies at the basis of the history of war more than real injuries inflicted or endured; and even when there have been real injuries to avenge, these causes have added double force to the hostility. Of the conflicts at present raging on the earth the majority spring from mere detestation of foreigners, quite as much as from tangible causes of quarrel. The antipathies that are summed up in the one word RACE constitute the chief part of the history of mankind. Venice, Poland, Hungary, Denmark, can each furnish a commentary on the natural unwillingness of men to "entertain strangers." The more barbarous the nation, the more powerful is its dread and hatred of foreigners. It is the long and difficult work of civilization to break down the barriers, political, commercial, and social, which, like a Chinese wall, each tribe erects around its own borders, and to bring the various peoples of the globe into a comity of tolerant and benignant intercourse.

The secret dislike of strangers, however, clings to humanity even after civilization has conquered its grosser antipathies. It appears even under its religious transformations. Positively none but those who have received a certain discipline are tolerant of men who belong to other parties or other tribes. A disposition heartily to "entertain strangers" is one of the rarest qualities in society. In England there are, indeed, causes in operation which would, one might think, put an end for ever to the old barbarous clannishness, and open men's hearts to the free interchange of reciprocal sympathies on all sides. There are associative forces at work which might, one would imagine, be potent enough to bring men of all types into close contact, and put an end to the proverb, that "one half of the world does not know how the other half lives." All the grand inventions of physical science are leagued on the side of unity, and tend to bring mankind into alliance with each other, through a common interest in the unity of nature. All the chief social improvements, all the principal literary inventions, are of the party not only of order, but of catholic communion. Railways, telegraphs, post-offices, newspapers, books, commercial enterprises, are distinctly favourable to the object of bringing immense numbers of mankind into close and friendly intercourse. The common persuasion on some of the chief doctrines of Protestant Christianity, and the common pursuit of benevolent undertakings, are far more powerful causes of unification. And, thank God, all these influences operating together have brought into social good-fellowship, and even into "tender love," a larger number of Englishmen than in any previous century of our history have stood in genial relations towards each other. The great cities furnish the amplest opportunities for such associations of men of different views and connexions; and it is pleasant to think of the large measure of mutual acquaintance and of brotherly regard that has grown out of the facilities thus afforded.

But none who have closely observed English society will deny that there is still much room for improvement in the virtue of entertaining strangers. The national characteristic reserve and insularity, formed on the geographical model of Great Britain itself, the slightly saturnine disposition of our race, strengthened, perhaps, by the excess of gloom in the atmosphere during a large portion of the year; the pride of race which is said to distinguish a nation so devoted to aristocratic institutions; the differences of rank and status springing out of the most complex civilization that the world has ever seen—all these causes operate in antagonism to the external and physical forces tending to assimilate and unite us. And when you add to these considerations the fact that our ecclesiastical history has handed down to the present generation a thousand traditions of rivalry and reciprocal animosity, through the bad management or the misfortune of our predecessors, you cease to wonder that Englishmen are still not always disposed to split up their solitary coteries and to make acquaintance with strangers. Spleen and contempt are, as has been well said, the evil genius of these solitudes and coteries: and it requires no inconsiderable determination in any man to break loose from the influence of contracted societies which exhibit but a moderate opinion of each other's excellencies, and a very feeble desire for closer association.

Thus it has come to pass that even in England the habitual society of the generality of religious persons is limited by their own spiritual connexion, and that those who have intimate acquaintances with persons of many different parties form an inconsiderable minority. The private characteristics of Englishmen, no less than their public controversies and their social customs and prejudices, strongly tend to build up the old Chinese walls again as soon as they are thrown down. There is something, no doubt, to be said in excuse for this state of things, and even perhaps something to be said in its defence. The extraordinary force of the national character seems to depend in some measure upon its reticence and close family attachments. A nation which would talk and open its heart more freely, and profess more garrulously an attachment and sympathy for every living thing, would not, in all probability, contain more individuals capable of solid friendship, and more truly disposed to "do a good turn" to a neighbour when trouble arrives. Under all this solemn isolation prevails, we well know, a heart that only requires kindling to "burn within" like the best coal in the creation, and to give out a flame of genuine compassion and sincere fraternity. These isolated "Churches," whose members do not seem to wish to know one another, are all doing nearly the same sort of works in the shades of their own privacy. They are seeking to know God's will, they are worshipping Him "in spirit and in truth," they are visiting the fatherless and widow in their affliction, and they are trying to keep themselves unspotted from the world. This archipelago of spiritual islands, between which there is so little intercourse, is inhabited by people who are much alike within, if they did but know it; and their differences are in reality far stronger reasons for mutual acquaintance than for isolation, if they would but believe it.

Let us set down a few of the arguments which might impel Christians of differing name to cultivate and earnestly seek for the company of "strangers." Communion with devout minds of ideas and habits foreign to our own is favourable to the vigorous development of all alike. The human race thrives on intermixture and intermarriage. When nations, or even provinces, avoid contact with other tribes, or shut themselves up in seclusion, or are destitute of the roads which would bring them into relation with the world, it is ever found that the type deteriorates, that the energy of the race decays, that the native stimulus is insufficient to prevent the stereotyping of thought, and the congelation of feeling. Something of the same sort happens to Churches and Church-parties. Isolation, a want of intercourse with other men, stiffens and narrows the intellect, and paralyses the will. "We are members one of another." It is not given to one part of Christ's body to be sufficient to itself either for wisdom or for power. Thought requires contradiction, question, opposition, in order to its advancement. Religious bodies which act steadily on the non-intercourse principle soon lose their vigour, and sink from arrogant dogmatism into indifference. Persons who make a conscience of their thoughts, and who pray to be directed aright in their beliefs, are sometimes apt to set the stamp of Divine authority too soon upon all their opinions, and to treat those who differ from them as rebels against the dictates of the Supreme Understanding. They ought, before they do this, to make sure that their prayers have been answered. And one method in which God answers a good man's prayer for wisdom is by disposing him to listen to the contradiction of his notions in a free discussion, since no man's opinions are worth much until they have stood the test of a sustained and vigorous questioning by his spiritual superiors or coequals. Now, in order to the enjoyment of this well-grounded belief in the truth, it is usually necessary to associate a little with general society, and to look beyond the threshold of our own community. Even if we fail to learn in so doing, we shall at least teach; and if we, being fortunately wise, gain little by the process, there are misbelievers (formerly called miscreants!) who may learn from us. And no man should wish to bury his talent in a napkin, or burn his lamp in a sepulchre, like the old Rosicrucians. Publicity is the very genius of true Christianity. The original "thing" was "not done in a corner;" nor can the wisdom that proceeds from it be developed in one.

Again, every Christian is a member of Christ, to whom all good men are equally dear; and we should strive to bring our sympathies into accord with those which burn in the bosom of the Good Shepherd. To Him unity—a real social unity of heart and life—is the grand object of aspiration and prayer. He desires that all good men may be "one," as the Persons of the Godhead are "one." "As thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us, and may be made perfect in one." How can we conform to this desire of Christ, how can we realise this idea of eternal love, except by "entertaining strangers," by sitting at our tent-door in the heat of the day, and welcoming those who approach us in the garb of pilgrims to a better land? All who have taken the true pilgrim's staff are united by the mysterious bond of a common destination in that region of which we know only that "the Lord is there." Every Christian has the prospect of being introduced sooner or later to every other Christian in existence, on the ground of the most intimate and eternal friendship—a friendship based on a common relation to Redeeming Love. How vain, then, the shyness which shrinks in this world from intercourse with those who must be our companions for ever. Half-an-hour after death not only will the external occupations of mankind be of no account to any of those who are so much absorbed by them here, but all the differences of opinion and Church constitution which here divide real Christians will be forgotten in the blaze of the heavenly glory. Let us then, not lay up shame for ourselves hereafter, by refusing to associate on earth with those who will gaze along with us upon the Uncreated Light. Truth and wisdom have been divided among many parties, partly by the powers of darkness, but partly also by the good providence of God, distributing to one man a dream, to another an interpretation. Nearly all have something to teach as well as to learn. The humble Christian is intrusted with his modicum of the heavenly treasure. The eloquent Apollos may learn the way of God more perfectly from the artizan Aquila; Paul, who had been "caught up into Paradise," expected nevertheless to be greeted by the faith of the newly-converted Romans.

Let us end by a practical annotation. It is the work of the Holy Spirit not only to reveal Christ to each of His members, but all the members of His body to each other. The Holy Ghost is given to overcome the natural antipathies of the flesh, and to bring the chosen congregation into the peace of God. A Christian who "separates himself" shows thereby a disposition to a wisdom which is "sensual." The end of new-born life is union with God and all His saints in eternity, and therefore it must exhibit its flesh-conquering power in the earliest stages of its existence in time. But the power which triumphs over human sectarianism and the dislike of strangers must be Divine. It is only as the Spirit rests upon us that we shall desire the "communion of saints," mourn over the divisions of Christendom, or attempt to remedy them in our own life by cultivating the friendship of the just. We must pray for a Divine Providence to superintend our acquaintanceships, and to favour us with the growing knowledge of those excellent persons who are dwelling around us like "angels unawares." The society which a believer keeps is not an accident. It is determined by spiritual laws and holy providences. He only who "asks" for the company of the wise, and of men who can reveal to him the "visions of God," will obtain it. The best society is not thrown away upon those who are unable to appreciate it. He who controls the sparrow's flight and fall controls the spiritual relations of His people; and to those alone who are "given to hospitality" does He appear with His angels on the threshold of their homes. The growth of our wisdom and piety is usually measured by the growth of our sacred relations with the wise and good; and they are determined by the pleasure of the Holy Spirit of power and grace. The best work usually brings us into the society of the best workmen.

DECREASE IN THE NUMBER OF FRENCH PRIESTS.

Some time since the Bishop of London expressed his keen regret, if I recollect aright, that the number of those who presented themselves for ordination in the Anglican Church was so small. The same state of things exists in the Romish communion in France, and it has assumed still larger proportions. I have before me an extract from an article in which Bishop de Ségur, founder of the Society of St. Francis de Sales, indicates, in a mournful tone, this dearth of young priests. M. de Ségur is a very ardent Ultramontane, and the most determined opponent of Protestantism: certainly he has not exaggerated the evil which he indicates as affecting Romanism. Here are some statistical details, borrowed from his article.

Before the Revolution of 1789, Paris reckoned 10,000 priests and monks for 500,000 inhabitants. Now, the capital has a population of 1,900,000, and does not possess 900 priests. Some parishes, with from 30,000 to 40,000 inhabitants, have but a single church, with four or five priests to minister in connexion with it.

In the provinces, the same alarming symptoms (these are the prelate's words) are noticeable. Last year, in one diocese, twenty-five priests died, and only five young men received ordination: here, then, was a decrease of four-fifths. In another diocese, instead of 150 students being admitted, as was constantly the case, there are now but thirty-five. In a third diocese, holy orders have been conferred on one solitary student, and the Bishop admits, with grief, before the assembled clergy, that he knows not what to do, and that he can no longer provide for the most necessary wants of the parishes, &c.

It would be an interesting study to examine why the number of candidates for the holy ministry is decreasing in the various Christian communions. The principal causes of this fact would be found in the tendencies of the age. Industry, commerce, banking, scientific pursuits, the civil and other services, are more sought after by young men and their friends than the clerical vocation, because they are more lucrative. But this is not the moment to fathom such a subject.

We may just add, that, as far as the Romish clergy in France are concerned, the numerical decline in ordinations has another very simple and justifiable cause. The inferior clergy, as they are called, are in some sort slaves, entirely at the mercy of their arbitrary spiritual superiors. A poor country priest, unless supported by the majority of his colleagues, has no legal guarantee, no canonical means of resistance to the tyranny of the bishop. He may be displaced, suspended, interdicted, ejected, without even being able to exercise the right of defending himself. And, on the other hand, if he voluntarily renounce his ministry, he becomes branded, as it were, in the eye of public opinion. Moreover, he is still regarded as a priest by the law, though he may not exercise any clerical function; and if, for example, he should wish to marry, he would be prevented by the courts, upon the pretext that the sacerdotal character is indelible! All this is not very encouraging; and one of two things must happen: either Rome must give to the priests a better position, or they will cease to be priests. This alternative is disagreeable, but it is inevitable.

For the rest, the Romish See has cares and troubles of more than one kind. The occupation of the French army produces all sorts of conflicts, and places the Papacy in a state of subordination which must be felt to be very oppressive to it.

INCREASING DIFFICULTIES OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

I spoke in my last letter (p. 121) of the sanguinary struggle which had taken place between our soldiers and the Pontifical dragoons. This affair has been the signal for incessant quarrels, so that Count de Montebello, Commander-in-Chief, and M. de Mérode, the War Minister of Pius IX., have been obliged to resort to harsh measures in order to prevent any encounter, even in the public streets, between the two bodies of troops. There are places, officially determined, where the French soldiers have no longer permission to walk, and the Papal dragoons are subjected to a regulation of the same kind. The question has even arisen as to whether they should not be entirely removed from Rome.

These acts of mutual hostility are not to be wondered at. The French think, nor can it be denied, that it is their presence alone that enables the Pope to retain the crown upon his head, and they consequently claim an authority corresponding to their responsibility and their good offices. But the Papal dragoons, being chosen and paid by the Court of Rome, persuade themselves that they ought to be the masters, and that they may treat the French as simple auxiliaries. They affect, therefore, an irritating air of superiority, which is the more insufferable as they are very bad soldiers, without morality, bravery, or discipline. How are these opposing pretensions to be reconciled? Diplomacy laboriously seeks to discover some middle path; but every one feels that this state of things cannot last; and that if Pius IX., whose health is failing, were removed from this world, Napoleon III. would perhaps seize the opportunity to free himself from a state of things which is the source of constant embarrassment.

Difficulties of a different kind have also produced much agitation at Rome. I have given an account (page 122-3) of the allocution addressed by Pius IX. to the clergy of Lyons on the affair of the liturgy. Your readers will doubtless recollect that the Pope bitterly reproached these priests with having had recourse to the civil authority, and said that that authority had nothing to do with such questions. This is all very well. But Napoleon III. and his Ministers do not admit to any extent, the incompetency of the civil power, even in liturgical affairs. They think that the old liberties of the Gallican Church give them the right, or rather impose upon them the duty, of protecting the French clergy against the encroachments of the Roman See. So the Moniteur Officiel published a note, in which, among other things, it said: "The language attributed to the Sovereign Pontiff, and the terms in which his Holiness is alleged to have complained of the intervention of the Government of the Emperor, appear very extraordinary." These were hard words for Pius IX.

But this is not all. M. de Sartiges, Ambassador of France, was charged to transmit to Cardinal Antonelli a note, in which the French Government expressed its painful astonishment at the Pope's speech. Poor Pius IX. was placed in a most painful position. On the one hand, he dared not express his disapproval of the remonstrances of the Emperor, who protects him with his sword; and on the other, he could not, without disgrace, disavow his own words. He therefore made his censure fall upon Cardinal de Bonald, by whom his speech had been published. Observe, that he accuses him not of falsifying what he said, but of indiscretion. The unfortunate cardinal, who is seventy-eight years of age, and who erred from excess of zeal, has been so moved by the reproaches of Pius IX., that he has fallen sick, and has even offered to give in his resignation.

This is a severe lesson for the high dignitaries of the Romish Church and for the Pope himself. They will learn that the Gallican liberties have firm supporters in the civil power, and that the episcopal body, which has such need of the protection of our soldiers at Rome, must not indulge in so haughty a tone.

THE PEOPLE'S EDITION OF M. RENAN'S "LIFE OF JESUS."

It would be superfluous and wearisome to return to the book of M. Renan, about which much more noise has been made than it deserves, if the author, in concert with his bookseller, had not thought of a new means of causing scandal. The "Life of Jesus," printed in a large octavo volume, upon fine paper, cost 71 50c. It was intended for the opulent classes. Besides, M. Renan is essentially elegant and aristocratic in the language he uses; he is, as he has been called by a witty fellow, a Voltaire in white gloves. He is made up with artistic skill, and well perfumed; his deportment is unquestionably fashionable.

But after having exhausted the curiosity of the elevated and polite world, M. Renan has thought that he could obtain a fresh success by addressing himself to the working class and the poor. He has therefore issued a people's edition of the "Life of Jesus," which costs only one franc—less than an English shilling. You see the volume has become accessible to persons of the most slender resources.

Two very curious things characterise this edition. First, the flattery which M. Renan showers upon the humbler classes. "The people are religious in their way," he says in the new preface. And what is this way of being religious? "The people," says M. Renan, "have respect for death. Their courage, their serenity, their desire for instruction, their indifference to ridicule, their great instincts of heroism, their taste for works of art and poetry, that perpetual youth which glows in them, when glory or their native land is at stake, all this is religion, and better still . . . it is idealism." In short, the religion of the author is a vague ideal, without any positive doctrine or any defined duties. M. Renan may thus pompously give to the most decided infidels the name of the humble servants of God. Never was contempt for common sense carried further.

The second point to be noticed in this people's edition relates to the numerous places in which the work has been abridged. M. Renan has not only omitted the introduction, and the scientific and critical notes; he has also sacrificed his singular explanation of the resurrection of Lazarus, thinking very justly that the people themselves would laugh at so ridiculous a hypothesis; he has eliminated his apology for Oriental falsehood, his theory upon the charlatanism of an impostor, combined with the most profound admiration for the model of humanity; and so forth. "It is a Christ in white marble that I present to the public," he says—"a Christ sculptured in spotless stone, a Christ simple and pure," &c. It appears that M. Renan has several Christs at his disposal, and that he can furnish them to suit every taste, like a dealer in images! This piece of absurdity is not merely laughable: it is odious. The author ends to his own discredit.

But let us put aside these matters, at once shocking and ludicrous. I must now bring under the notice of your readers, with more detail than usual, the serious events which have lately occurred within the pale of French Protestantism, and in doing so I shall have occasion to point out the internal state of our Churches.

M. COQUEREL, JUN., AND THE REFORMED CHURCH OF PARIS.

The political journals of France and England will have already informed your readers that a minister of the Gospel, M. Athanasie Coquerel, jun., who occupied the post of assistant (suffragant) to an aged pastor in the Reformed Church of Paris, has not been retained in his ministerial functions by the Presbyterian Council. This fact, in itself considered, was not very important. The Protestant assistant-pastors in Paris, save in such special cases as result from sentiments being entertained of thorough personal confidence, only obtain a provisional title to their office: they are accepted for a period of two or three years, and their nomination is periodically renewed, if they continue to merit the approval of the ecclesiastical body.

M. Coquerel, jun., was in this position, and as his doctrines, his writings, his proceedings in the control of religious matters, were regarded as dangerous to the welfare of the faithful, and contrary to good order in the flock, the majority, or to speak more exactly, the almost entire body of the Presbyterian Council, decided that this pastor should not be retained in his office. That is the whole matter. This legal resolution, adopted after long delays, and with the most polite forms, has furnished a theme for violent declamation. It has been represented as an ejection (destitution), a persecution, and some not very clear-headed people have reminded us, in speaking of this subject, of the Spanish Inquisition, and the martyr-fires lighted by Torquemada! I respect the good sense of your readers too much to refute such utter nonsense. The question is a serious one, and deserves to be treated seriously.

M. Coquerel, jun., is the principal editor of a weekly journal, Le Lien, in which the historical faith of the French Reformed Church is continually attacked, while the adversaries, more or less declared, of the Christian revelation—MM. Renan, Schérer, Réville, Pecaut, and others—are encouraged, approved, and thanked for their works, some very vague reservations only being made, which seem to be dictated by a sense of propriety and of what is due to a certain position, rather than by a principle of personal conviction. What is to be inferred thence? Evidently that the writer agrees upon every essential point with men who deny the exercise of all supernatural power upon the part of God in the establishment of Christianity.

The same writer, having been interrogated on the fact of the supernatural birth of Christ, replied in his journal that it was with him an unsettled question, and that he probably should not decide it in a very orthodox sense. He also said, "It is not a little otherwise, but quite otherwise, than the orthodox, that we understand the questions of the Trinity, original sin, the atonement, inspiration, and other doctrines which are called fundamental." That is to say, M. Coquerel, jun., proclaims a religion quite other than that which has constituted the Reformed Churches of France! And then, being requested to express frankly his own belief, he refused to answer, alleging that he had nothing to retract or to explain! It is, therefore, impossible to say under what banner he should be placed. Is he a Socinian? Is he a Unitarian? Nobody knows. We can tell what he denies, but not what he affirms.

This is precisely the true state of the case. Now, I ask any intelligent man, even an honest infidel, if it was possible to maintain M. Coquerel, jun., in a pulpit in which the Apostles' Creed and liturgical prayers are repeated as the expression of the common belief of the Church? That is the entire question.

The Presbyterian Council have exercised considerable patience, hoping, apparently, that M. Coquerel, jun., would at length embrace more positive convictions. But, their expectations having been deceived, would they not have been accomplices in this sort of religious fiction (I refrain from using stronger words, if they had re-elected M. Coquerel, jun., as an assistant-pastor? M. Coquerel, sen., (the father of the minister in question,) appears from his writings, to admit the authority of Scripture; and he boldly demanded, some years since, that a pastor who had denied from the pulpit the resurrection of Jesus Christ, should be ejected. As to M. Coquerel, jun., he belongs to the new liberal school, or the negative party, which accepts no other authority than the sovereignty of the individual intellect.

But how comes it that so simple and legitimate a proceeding as the refusal to continue this young minister in office has raised such a storm, even in several of the political journals of Paris? A complete reply would require me to enter considerably into detail: I shall briefly advert to what is most important.

1. The conduct of the Presbyterian Council is regarded by the Freethinkers and men of radical opinions as an attack upon freedom of conscience and religious liberty. These gentlemen have not reflected upon the conditions of existence necessary to a Church and to a religious society. They confound a Church with a school of philosophy, in which everybody is allowed to teach whatever he may think reasonable. Moreover, they forget that the assistant-pastor, whom the Presbyterian Council refuses to re-appoint, may gather an independent congregation, as has been done by many friends of the Gospel who did not agree with the consistories of the National Establishment. Religious liberty in general, therefore, is not at all involved in this affair.

2. Another cause of the agitation which have mentioned must be sought in the personal qualities of M. Coquerel, jun. Without being a thinker, a writer, or a preacher of the highest order, he is remarkably talented and active. As a preacher, he attracts large audiences, whose sensibilities are touched by his tone of serious reflection, and whose hearts are gratified by his easy and elegant style. He has therefore gained many friends during fifteen years of his assistant-pastorate.

3. The Coquerel family are connected with many political and literary men, who have embraced the opportunity of giving him a proof of their friendship by the clamour they have raised against the orthodox party. Moreover, the members of the Liberal Protestant Union, several of whom are in high positions, and have large fortunes, have spared no pains to swell this small matter into an affair of considerable magnitude. This was the easier as, at the present moment, the Legislative Chamber is not in session, and foreign politics furnish but little news of interest to the daily press. But it is the mere blaze of a straw fire, as we proverbially say.

I shall not attempt to combat the assertions of the political journals. It is impossible to show greater levity and ignorance than they have done. Thus, to quote one specimen, the editor of the Temps says, in so many words: "Within the pale of Christianity there is not more than one living doctrinal authority; that authority is the Pope. . . . The reason for the existence of Protestantism is, that it makes the supreme and decisive authority reside in the conscience of the individual. . . . How could the idea of fixing upon any limit of orthodoxy whatsoever—that is to say, of becoming, in some sort, identified with Pius IX.—ever suggest itself to the Presbyterian Council?" Such is the blind and humiliating condition to which certain political writers in France have sunk. They know nothing of the most rudimentary facts in the history of the Reformation, of the principle of the supreme authority of the Scriptures, of confessions of faith, nor of the traditions or rules of discipline among the Protestants. In their eyes, Protestantism is a universal protest against all settled belief; our churches ought to be houses without doors, roofs, or windows, and open to all the winds of heaven; the conscience of every individual who wears the pastor's gown or the layman's coat should enjoy the most absolute independence, and be free to teach Panteism, as well as the precepts of Jesus Christ. But I am ashamed to detain your attention by these comments upon opinions which will not bear the least examination; and assuredly the editor of the Temps would refuse to apply to his own journal the unrestricted liberty for the advocacy of doctrines and principles which he seeks to introduce into the Church!

THE PRESENT MOST EMBARRASSING STATE OF THE NATIONAL PROTESTANT CHURCH.

In conclusion, I would say a few words on the difficulties of our position at the present moment. We cannot shut our eyes to this deplorable fact—that a somewhat numerous party among our pastors have yielded themselves to the blighting influence of the negative school. After they have been appointed by a consistory, and the appointment has been confirmed by Government, they claim absolute independence, and imagine that no one has a right to call them to account for their teaching, so that the congregations are the slaves or the victims of their varying moods of belief and sentiment. The State, which pays the pastor from the national exchequer, is well aware of its inability to decide in doctrinal matters, and does not interfere, except in the last extremity, and in case of a public scandal.

If we had our ancient synodal organization, such great irregularities would not be possible. There would be at least some regulations with reference to teaching and discipline. But the Liberal pastors, as they are called, oppose the re-establishment of General Synods, alleging as a reason the rights of the consistories; then, if the consistories perform any authoritative act, they accuse them of usurpation! This is intolerable, and must come to an end in some way or other. I shall have to return to this painful subject.

EVANGELICAL EFFORT IN THE FRENCH ARMY.

Paris, February, 1864.

The French army represents the nation. The soldier is the child of the soil, the child of France; he serves his seven years, and then falls back into his native place, and finds his rank in the general population. He loses his bright, impulsive nature; drill and discipline only turn it to account—it is never deaden it. On an emergency, every soldier might be an officer, as indeed we hope to be. Full of physical courage, bold and daring to a degree, quick, intelligent, sharp in wit, sceptical of defeat, dreaming only of victory; but weak in moral strength, led captive by spiritual foes, pride, vain-glory, passion, sensuality, godlessness, and often reckless depravity, dispute possession of the man. Indifferentism and scepticism run through the army as through the general population. The rarely persisting form of any kind of devotion is rapidly effaced by the sneer of a comrade; so much so, that, despairing of anything better, the priests of Rome, in word and print, advise "prayer under the coverlet," to avoid raillery and to prevent blasphemy. Yet when a soldier sees moral courage, none can appreciate it better; and if approached with frank bearing, open heart, depth of sympathy, and bright love—without which a man is no true missionary—he gives himself up with characteristic impulse.

The army is a noble mission field, both to the men themselves, and through them to their homes: for each year the thousands discharged carry far and wide the impress of their service. Thus it has always been a point with our leading societies to employ their most approved agents in going in and out among the military, and circulating tracts and Testaments in camps and barracks. The largest issues and grants of the Paris Tract Society, of late years, have been to soldiers, and a few of its best tracts are the simple statements of conversions which the Lord has effected through these agencies.

All your readers are acquainted with the touching narrative translated from one of these, called "Dying in Jesus before Sebastopol," by Adolphe Monod, in which a few words and the gift of some tracts to two soldiers by a pious woman, who was gathering mulberry leaves, as they passed through her village, were the means of several conversions. The influence of virtuous and pious women has been immense over these men. We know of an army laundress in a garrison town, herself converted from Catholicism, who for years has been bringing men and officers, not to Protestantism merely, but to Jesus. She is an eccentric character, in her peculiar costume, and half military, half civilian dialect, and free-and-easy, motherly carriage. She would never dream of going to a religious meeting without taking with her as many soldiers as her persuasive and original eloquence can induce to accompany her. She has circulated innumerable tracts and Testaments. It would be difficult to say which of the two characters, this humble Christian, or a general's wife, animated with a kindred spirit, has effected the most good. Some time ago, the latter had distributed above 70,000 tracts, and the feelings of a Romish chaplain may be better understood than expressed, who, when complaining to the general of the unheard-of distribution of "heretical" books, was referred to "my wife!"

testant church of a provincial town, and a kneeling and saying his Catholic prayer, vacantly gazing around, when a lady invited him to join a small circle of Christians who were engaging in reading the Bible, conversation and prayer, between the public vices. From that day forward he regularly attended the Protestant worship, searched Scriptures, induced three comrades to accompany him, and showed signs of conversion. On leaving the place, he took with him a quantity of tracts to distribute among fellow-soldiers in the camp at Chalons. He would be going over old ground to speak of the appointment of Protestant chaplains for troops in active service, the erection and constant use of the Protestant church at Chalons camp, or to allude to the successful efforts made by Christian men during Crimean and Italian campaigns. One of our voluntary missionaries to the wounded, dying soldiers in Italy produced a small volume,* which has gone the round of Europe and America, and has been the occasion of forming philanthropic bands of men, who during the peace, have been preparing to tend on the victims of war. Their devotion appears likely soon to be put to the test in Europe, as it has already been in America. This, again, has brought forth an appeal in one of our Protestant periodicals for Christian men to be ready for the work, says the writer (an evangelist), "how often Italy did I see the sick men's beds loaded with oranges, cigars, and other refreshments, placed there by the most amiable of women, while many of the patients looked on with indifference, or turned away with the inability of men whose deep need had not been reached or guessed at. Whereas when words of Christian truth were whispered their blessing was felt, and even restored life to men apparently dying."

In France, as elsewhere, it is no easy thing to be a Christian in the army; but when a man has been converted, the very opposites of derision, and persecution he has to face out-face, give him amazing strength and perception of his Master's presence. The Lord gives the faculty of rejoicing in the midst of persecution, at once as the reward of obedience, and the incentive to future obedience. And though there may be ridicule, there must be respect. I know a young man who, day after day, in Paris, goes through the ordeal of a close musketry of taunts and laughter as he attends his beloved church who, when he returns to the barracks, finds not only his mess saved, but warmed up for him by his comrades. A soldier cannot be a consistent Christian without being a missionary. There was one brought to Christ a few years ago by the words of a pious civilian; he confessed his Lord by kneeling down in that prayer day after day; insults wereaped upon him, but, after a while, a comrade joined him and found Christ. They two had courage to speak, and in time five more were saved, and formed a praying band of seven Christians in that regiment. At present we know a trumpeter in another regiment, who, though always a Protestant, only came to the knowledge of salvation about two years ago. Stirred up by sisters in Christ, he became an indefatigable missionary among officers, who at first nicknamed him the missionary, and now call him so with respect. Last year he commenced a prayer-meeting in a village where all was dead; curiosity brought many to listen to the soldier's words about his Heavenly Captain; the authorities had a room, people from two neighbouring villages came, and now there is a settled work of grace going on there under the fostering care of a congenial pastor, a late army chaplain; and money is being collected to build a place of worship. In another spot, a late soldier died lately in peace, or, to use the words of the Catholic attendant, "like an angel." At his Protestant funeral, the ministers of the town seized the opportunity to preach the Gospel fully, both in the hospital courtyard and on the grave, while tracts were freely given. Two lancers were touched at that occasion, and now glorify Christ before their comrades; one has been for a time laid up by an accident, and his couch is daily frequented by officers and men, to whom he tenderly speaks of Jesus.

There are prayer-meetings in the capital and elsewhere, in which soldiers delight to pray; and open conversation-meetings, where they speak; and Sunday-schools, where they teach. I believe that Christ has disciples in all our regiments, from the Zouave, who, though visiting the sick, lending books, and seeking for Jesus, has not yet summoned up courage enough in the barracks to pray otherwise than when bending low to unfasten the row of buttons on his gaiters—to the drummer, who knelt upon his bed with the old words, "Comrades, I am going to pray!" and who had the room full of sighs and sobs before he had done, and by that act commenced a daily prayer and reading-meeting with twenty men.

What I want is by these lines to stir up Christians, in England and elsewhere, by a knowledge of facts, to praise God for His goodness to our soldiers, and to pray for an increasing blessing on the French army. Let me conclude by allowing the soldiers themselves to speak to you. We have all seen, in "Grasping the Promises" and other English books, the way in which the Lord honours simple faith and weak instruments. Here, too, Christian sisters "out of weakness have been made strong," in the blessed influence they are exercising over our soldiers. I have now before me a pile of soldiers' letters addressed to one of these. All would be worth quoting, but I restrict myself to the following extracts. The first is the grateful outpouring of the heart of a corporal, converted about four years ago, and who has lately renewed a seven years' service in order to be a missionary among his comrades. It was written when on guard on the last night of 1863:—

... Blessed be our Saviour-King, who does all for the best! Let us serve Him more than ever, with much faithfulness, love, zeal, and faith, that nothing can stop, no, not even prison bolts! Beloved sister, does not the last night of the year lead the Christian heart to reflect? Just as soldiers pass an annual review called the general inspection, even so I think we, children of God, redeemed by the alone merits of Jesus, should review the year just passed, by enumerating all the benefits of the Lord. All His benefits, did I say? But that would be impossible; there are thousands upon thousands, and we have not deserved one of them; God has given, even when we would not receive. Oh! the depth of the love of God! ... And now, before the mystery of the coming year, who knows whether your soul may not go to join the redeemed. You knock at the gate of the heavenly Jerusalem, your name is found on the roll, converted to Jesus, the Saviour of sinners, with the addition, "She has had trials in weeping over rebellious ones, especially the soldiers whom she tried to lead to Him; she was in continual prayer for them, and encouraged them by the words of God; she had faith, and was nothing daunted, but believed in the power of God for the salvation of souls. She comforted many Christian soldiers by helping them to bear their burdens, and facilitating their work of evangelization. Her sins are forgotten, for they are washed in the blood of the Saviour, and she has on the freely-given wedding garment." I fancy I see you looking around, as it were, doubtfully, and then saying: "Oh, yonder is a soul which I have known, and which cost me many cares; it is saved! And there is another and another! Oh, what joy! what joy!" But every moment your surprise increases; you are recognised on all sides by souls lost sight of, and which a tract, a Gospel, a word had saved; and memory will be there reminding you of one to whom you spoke under the Triumphant Arch in Paris, and of another whom you stopped elsewhere, and others again whom God has saved! ... God alone knows the results of the actions of those who walk now by faith ; their work shall be great and prosperous.

Here is an extract from a letter addressed to a meeting :—

Let us be wise at the commencement of this year, not forming plans beyond our strength, for such are often vain. We are like beings suspended in the air by a thread, which a very child may snap at any moment, and then we fall into oblivion as to this world. Happy, then, is he who in his fall is caught by the arms of Jesus ! Christians, brethren and sisters, let us watch, expecting daily to be called home to Heaven, prepared by Jesus, lighted by the glory of God. You think I often speak to you of Heaven, but how can I help it ? I am like a soldier whom I was leading to guard the other day. I asked him on the way what he was thinking of ? "Of home," said he. "Is that all ?" "Yes, there is nothing like home !" Let us, then, accustom ourselves to speak often of Heaven ; we shall be happier and less earthly. We have a fortune, a palace, a crown, and we take possession only when the thread of our earthly existence snaps. Surely with such a hope we may bear great disappointments and trials, being strangers ! But let us draw near to each other to travel safer, loving one another with sincerity, and praying with increased might to be armed and equipped for the fresh fight that is opening upon us. Let us take all the armour of God, &c. (Eph. vi.) . . .

The following is from one who for a time had lost his vivid perception of peace and joy :—

At last I am again happy ! Yes, your prayers, and those of other brethren and sisters, have done me good ; and now I can again say, Praise, praise Jesus with me ; glory be to His holy name for His faithful love ! Not only has He done me good, but He has refreshed me with news from a sergeant at —, once a Romanist, but now converted to the Saviour. He tells me of the conversion of a corporal, and that of a soldier who had studied for the priest's office. I have had a lightful letter from a corporal of the 54th, who tells me that seven New Testaments have been distributed and received with great pleasure ; and from the dear — [a soldier], who writes to encourage me, although he is himself in affliction for they have torn out forty pages from his beloved Bible. God has enabled me to find an open empty room in the barracks, where I can, during the daytime, be alone with Jesus. As I am going to accustom myself to rise at 3 A.M., for the tailor of the battalion will let me his work-room, where I can go, and if too cold I may even light the stove. See what blessing . . . You know how I love children ; I have been acquainted with the Protestant schoolmaster at this place, who with Christian love asked me to see his little school, and I spoke to the children and examined their writing and promised them the little tracts if they were good.

These tracts were given, and subsequently a parcel was sent to him from Paris. He says in another letter :—

The soldiers received the Gospels with pleasure. I even gave to those who had forbidden me to do so. My sergeant-major, when I gave him one, said, "What if I were to send you to prison ?" But instead of punishing me, he invited me to take coffee with him and other subalterns. Oh ! may God bless the dear English for having sent me beautiful little volumes ; for what an amount of good is done in our beloved France by these means !

Again :—

There is a man who is always getting interested, but he seems anxious, and he said a word that struck me—it was, "If you prayed for me you might change me !"

This man was prayed for, and when next tempted, he took up the attractive cup, dashed it down to the ground, and rushed from the place, to the utter amazement of his comrades.

SWITZERLAND.

RELIGION IN THE CANTON OF ZURICH.

The report of the last session of the Synod of the canton of Zurich testifies to the spirit of Christian toleration which animates the National Church of Zurich in its relations to the Dissenting bodies. In his opening address, the President, M. Brunner, after mentioning the numerous places of worship belonging to different denominations, asked what would be the result if those who differed on some points treated each other with coldness. He observed that we should not judge those who we think do not possess the whole truth ; that we should bear with them, and endeavour to draw them to ourselves by love ; that those who demand liberty for themselves must accord it to others, if they would be consistent. "Let us not forget," said he, "that where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. The abuse of this great saying is, after all, less fatal than deadness of spirit and slavery of thought." From the same report we gather that, during last year, the Ecclesiastical Council of Zurich has asked the directors of the Postal Department, of railways and of steamboats, to consider the religious requirements of their servants, and to allow them, in the course of the year, at least a few Sundays to attend upon public worship. The request has been favourably received by the Postal Department and the North-East Railway. Only the Steamboat Company has refused to assent to it.

The Semaine Religieuse, from which we borrow the preceding details, observes that the Protestant Church of the canton of Zurich supplies other and different matter for reflection :—

cast the name which it gives itself, for a name which it has set up in the chair can lay claim to very old names, alive or less forgotten. The Theological no longer reckons among its ordinary single decided representative of Evangelism. To teach these to the students by one private tutor (privat-docent) is this post by a certain society. They refer to appoint pastors whom they are liberal, and whose liberality consists about Christianity.

of this, the following circumstance is two or three months ago the small town had to choose a pastor. The candidate professed himself to be the friend of light. Some heads of families to show their fellow-citizens in what consisted. They circulated a notice of avowed opinions of the candidate as the Bible is from beginning to end full of fables; Jesus is a man and a sinner; He is not risen, and does not live of the Father; nor, indeed, can any there is an existence after death; our aim, in reconciliation with God, is only in, a reverie," &c. The courageous circular besought the Ecclesiastical power and their children the teaching doctrines, and called attention to at every incoming pastor must swear faithfully the Word of God, the law of God, according to the fundamental of the Evangelical Reformed Church. The candidate either could not or did not know how to make this request. The candidate did not know the errors ascribed to him. He was elected by 865 votes against 145, and the very result of the voting was proclaimed with loud hurrahs, "which made the like," as witnesses of the scene affirm. There was serenade, with firework, to compliment the newly-elected pastor.

and for some time before presenting to this mournful story. We have now heard of confirmation; details abound. It is seen that times have greatly altered since when the people of Zurich demanded, and the expulsion of Strauss. Let the Zurich take care; it prepares its ruin in its hands. Those Dissenting communities M. Brunner spoke in his report have never their reasons for existing. There are souls which hunger and thirst, and a frigid Rationalism which is preached to the sickly mixture of pantheistic and humanitarian doctrines, which are their aspirations. If the Church closes the way to the true Christ, who saves us, let us go to seek Him in the upper room.

THE COMMEMORATION AT GENEVA.

celebrations for the tercentenary of the birth of Calvin are becoming more active as the year approaches. On the 29th of May there will be special sermons by MM. Coulin, Munier, Oltramare, and Tournier. Five manuscripts have been sent in for the prize offered by the Evangelical Alliance for a life of Calvin fitted for the young. The adjudicators are to be MM. Ch. Le Fort, Merle d'Aubigné, Rilliet, W. Turretini, and C. Viguet. Besides this, MM. Viguet and Tissot have undertaken to publish a volume of extracts from Calvin's works, under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance. This is to appear early in May, and is intended to give a complete idea of Calvin. Some of the pieces have never been published. On Friday, May 27, there will be a conference or public meeting, also promoted by the Evangelical Alliance. During the same week several societies will hold their annual meetings.

PUBLIC LECTURES AT GENEVA.

The Pastors Bouvier and A. Bost have been lecturing at Geneva upon Renan's "Life of Jesus," which there, as elsewhere, has attracted much attention.

M. Ferrier has presided at a meeting held at Eaux Vives, near Geneva, on the subject of the proper observance of the Lord's-day. The speakers were M. Ferrier, Dr. Lombard, M. Barde, M. Röhrich, and M. Duby.

CANTON DE VAUD: SCRIPTURES FOR THE BLIND.

A society has been formed at Lausanne for enabling the blind to supply themselves with copies of the Scriptures, by subscribing one sou per week. From month to month the money collected is expended upon such portions of the Bible as have been printed for the blind. The system adopted is that of Braille.

FELIX NEFF'S SCHOOLS.

We have received from Geneva an appeal on behalf of the schools founded by Felix Neff among the poor Protestants scattered over the high valleys and the barren mountains of the French Alps. The other claims upon our space will not admit of its insertion, but this is the less necessary as the character of the schools must be familiar to our readers from previous statements. It may here, therefore, suffice to say that they urgently require assistance, and that should any sums reach us on their behalf, we shall gladly forward them to the proper parties.

ITALY.

Florence, March 16, 1864.

EXCITING CONTROVERSY AMONG THE PROTESTANTS—THE PLYMOUTH BRETHREN SOWING DISCORD—NOBLE STAND OF DR. DE SANCTIS.

The Churches of Christ in Italy are now being shaken to their very foundations on the subject of Plymouthism. We are now in the very thick of a great controversy which I hope will terminate in the complete isolation of a small and intolerant knot of persons, whose influence has hitherto been most hurtful in the field of Italian evangelization. It is a great scandal, and I have avoided all reference to the growing evil until it has reached such a height that longer silence would be pusillanimous. The present crisis has been foreseen by many, and oftentimes have I been urged as a matter of duty to lay details before your readers, but the personal and local nature of many of the circumstances caused me to shrink from the very appearance of partizanship. The question is now beyond the limits of individual or provincial jealousy, being wide as Italy itself. The Plymouthism imported into Italy from England some years ago, and which has found only too ready an adherence in the infant state of the Church in Italy, among men rushing from the Church of Rome with an exceeding hate of priesthood and churchism, was unfortunately that of the strictest sect of the Plymouthists. It found great strength in the names of De Sanctis and Mazzarella, who, leaving the Waldensian Church to found a Free Italian Church, became unconsciously more or less united for a time with the enemies of every form and order as well as of sound doctrine. It has also obtained no small share of sympathy and support from committees and private Christians, who, though in no wise desiring the spread of Plymouthist tenets, have differed with the Waldensian Church, and in so doing have aided exclusively the agents who did not belong to that ancient Evangelical Church. This state of matters is in a fair way of being set right, so that before 1864 is run we may hope to see native and foreign Christians sympathising with and supporting the Waldensian and Free Italian Churches, leaving the Plymouthist sectarians to be aided alone by their co-religionists in England.

That healthier opinions have been steadily gaining ground of late, was evidenced by the retirement of Count Guicciardini last year as a collector in England of funds—which each annual report showed to be rapidly decreasing—for evangelization in Italy. The formal cause of the present conflict was the printing of a bitter attack last autumn by Mr. Bossetti, the evangelist of Count Guicciardini in Turin, against all the Churches of Christ, and the Waldensian Church in particular, in reply to which Dr. De Sanctis wrote such a manly and spirited protest.

Reference to these documents was made in your December and February numbers. The real reason of this systematic and virulent attack, which has been but the mot d'ordre of an engagement along the whole line, has not yet appeared. My own conviction is that God's work was progressing so fast all over the country, by the preaching and circulation of the Scriptures, through godly evangelists and colporteurs belonging to all the Churches, and that happily such an amount of fraternal affection and co-operation was developing itself among the many true labourers in the one great work of saving souls in this land, that chagrin was felt at the waning influence of Plymouthism, and an effort premeditated to rouse the prejudices of nationality and ignorance, in order to regain the former sway of lordly anathema on the part of a system which professes so loudly to care for the liberties of every believer in Christ. I earnestly trust I may be found mistaken as to the motive, though there is no doubt of the cheering fact that the evangelization of Italy has burst the bands of all narrow sectarianism, and that the Spirit of the Lord has been and is still working mightily through the Gospel in a hundred parts of the country, and under every possible form and circumstance of prayerful Christian effort.

No better proof in confirmation of the statement could be afforded than that the united prayer-meetings during the first week of January—and for the suggestion of which we are indebted to the Evangelical Alliance—were seasons of precious blessing in all the large towns of Italy. The reports that have reached us on this head are so unlike the past, that we had almost thought the news too good to be true. All classes of Christian men joined in the exercises, the Plymouthists alone excepted. These réunions were so highly relished, that in Naples, Florence, Genoa, and other towns it was unanimously agreed to have a similar monthly meeting, and to join in the celebration together of the Lord's Supper. For three months this most brotherly harmony has been kept up, and latest accounts assure us of the probability of their continuance.

unless Plymouthism should again gain the upper hand, and blight the whole work with its own sectarian and divisive spirit. The only exception is in the case of Genoa, where presently the battle rages most hotly, and where the united monthly meetings will remain more a name than a reality until the controversy closes. There has even been a feeling growing in the minds of men in favour of a further step in advance—namely, on the one hand, the formation of an Evangelical Alliance; and, on the other, the assembling periodically of the brethren engaged in all the departments of the work to consult as to the best plans to pursue, and for mutual counsel and encouragement. On the former topic Professor Geymonat has already printed a pamphlet, full of Christian affection, and Dr. De Sanctis, who enters cordially into the project, is shortly to publish his thoughts on the same subject, and thus bring it fully before Italian Christians. To all this, unfortunately, Plymouthism is most averse, at least as represented by its Italian exponents. Not content with differing in opinion, and standing apart from such laudable enterprises, it enters the field as a vituperating antagonist. The Evangelical Alliance pamphlet of Geymonat has been, night after night, subjected to a public criticism of a most defamatory character by Mr. Magrini, who, as the evangelist of Count Guicciardini, presides over one of the congregations in Florence. Mr. Geymonat's candid reply to Rossetti's calumnious attack has been replied to in an ignorant but malicious way by Mr. De Michelis, evangelist at Pisa, at the charges of Count Guicciardini, since the Nice committee withdrew from him their support. It scarcely needed the vigorous pen of Mr. Ribet, of Leghorn, to repel the assertions of Mr. De Michelis, that the Waldenses are and have been such a race of persecutors. The noble protest of Dr. De Sanctis, however, to the assertions of Rossetti, that the Waldenses buy their converts with gold; that they had a monkish origin, and are no better than Papists; that all Churches have erred fundamentally; and that the true Church is alone to be found in his own little sect—has turned the Plymouthist world upside down, as they expected to carry him along with them. Already has Mr. Magrini and his Florence Church condemned the protest of Dr. De Sanctis, and approved of Rossetti's book—a book which, by the way, presumptuously spoke for all the so-Waldensian Churches. So great a stir, too, has been created in the Genoa congregation, that Dr. De Sanctis has this week printed a very clear and convincing declaration in favour of the truth and condemnation of Plymouthism, and demanded from the various Churches immediate replies either for or against him, in uniting in prayer with the Waldenses and other Christians, and in protesting against the unchristian tone and notable falsehoods of Mr. Rossetti's book. Dr. De Sanctis even goes out of his way to defend the Waldenses, in the name of all that is honest and honourable, from the defamations of Mr. Rossetti. What the issue may be, we cannot tell; but, meanwhile, the prayers of all God's people should be offered on behalf of Dr. De Sanctis, who is meeting with a treatment I dare not characterize, because he has dared to stand up for truth and righteousness. His hands are greatly strengthened by a most valuable circular, issued last week, by the Nice committee, which hitherto has confined itself to aiding evangelists, without interfering with their private views, but now finds itself constrained to urge upon all its employés, and all who are within the reach of its influence, an open and faithful condemnation of the doctrinal errors, reckless assertions, and unchristian spirit of Mr. Rossetti's book. Meanwhile the "Declaration" of Dr. De Sanctis is circulating over the country. It is written in a bold, uncompromising style, and will, we trust, with God's blessing, overthrow the plots of Plymouthism and greatly promote the good work of God in Italy.

NEW WORKS ON THE ROMISH CONTROVERSY—SIGNOR MORETTI ON THE "MODERN PHARISEES."

The free press of Italy is supplying the reading public with many volumes exposing the falsehood and wickedness of the Church of Rome. It would be tedious to notice in detail the various examinations from different points of view—all adverse to the Papacy—of a wide range of authorship on the temporal and spiritual power, the lives of the popes, the doings of the priests, &c. Suffice it to say, that the appearance of such a literature, and in such quantity, is a sign of the times, and betokens the great falling away from bigoted Catholicism which is taking place before our eyes among intelligent men of liberal sentiments. The sole fear is that infidelity, or, at least, practical ungodliness, may take the place of the former show of respect for religion, so badly represented by the Papal Church. Our only hope is in the counteracting and restoring influences of the Word of God, which never was circulated in the history of any country at a more critical and favourable moment. We have been surprised and delighted to find so many localities possessing a weekly "Family Reading" magazine, with a more or less moral tone, whose readers seem largely on the increase, owing to the establishment everywhere of so many day and night schools, and the spread of a good education. Among the many books lately issued, there are two which deserve more than a passing notice, owing to authorship, style, and the wide-spread influence they are exerting. The first is written by a native of Bergamo and a deputy of the Italian Parliament, Signor Andrea Moretti. In a truly Christian spirit, he deplores the false and crooked policy which the ministers of the Catholic religion are following, and with the Bible in his hand, quotes one after another, through 130 pages, a host of passages of God's Word, which condemn the present action of the priests, and prove them to be Pharisees. The title of the book, "The Word of God and the Modern Pharisees," gives a fair notion of its contents. After having exposed their ungodly ways in the light of Scripture truth, the author, with tears in his eyes, begs these priests to repent of their sins, and return with contrite and earnest hearts to the simplicity of the Gospel. Should they prove deaf to his appeal, he declares, for himself and others who think with him, his trust in Christ alone as his Saviour, and that he will obey God rather than man. Amid his earnest pleading, there breathes out the lurking fear that the priests will not abandon their past opposition to the Gospel, in which case he remarks, that the Bible is sufficient for Italy, and that, with God's Word in their possession, the people will grow in enlightenment and Christian feeling, and neither need nor fear the priest, the confessional, or the Church. I translate his opening words, as a good specimen of the tone of the whole work: "A Christian Catholic by birth, and from deep conviction, I am unable any longer to refuse to listen to the voice of my conscience, which calls me to employ the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, against that modern Phariseism which lords it over the Church of Christ, and which is so much worse than the ancient Phariseism, according as the Christian religion, which for worldly ends is being so awfully abused, is more noble, more holy, and more perfect than the Mosaic law. . . . Nothing, by God's grace, can separate me from Jesus Christ or from His mystical body, which is the Church of God, the society of Christian brethren, having the same faith, the same love, the same hope, and I am ready to give my life rather than in any way undervalue this faith, this love, this one and only hope. But I dare not, on the other hand, make myself a party to acts and misdeeds of blind pastors, either deceived or deceivers, which contradict the first elements of that Christian doctrine which they themselves teach, and practising which, I should be in their sense a Catholic, but should thereby cease to be a Christian. . . . I know that it ill becomes me, a sinner, and the least of the faithful, to admonish those who have been constituted masters in Israel. But is not I, a poor weak man, who shall be their judge, but the revealed Word of God which I shall quote from the inspired Scriptures. Neither I nor any one ought to condemn others, but those truths which God's ministers are habitually preaching will bring home the charge and sin and condemnation." Then follows the Scripture texts under various headings, and so part of the system of Rome escapes withering exposure. It looks more like one of our home manuals of Romish controversy than anything else; but the knowledge of the Scriptures possessed by its author, the unfeigned Christian love which has inspired the volume, and the fact that he has nothing to do with any Protestant propaganda or Evangelical Church, have given it a circulation and significance in Italy which few other works possess.

DE BONI'S DENUNCIATIONS OF THE ROMISH CHURCH.

The other notable production is entitled, "The Romish Church and Italy," from the pen of De Boni, at one time an Ultramontane Catholic, but latterly an unbeliever, and well known as an able writer and the translator of Renan's "Life of Jesus" into Italian. The high standing and literary power of the author have ensured for it a reading among all the educated men of Italy. While we regret the absence of positive religious faith, which is the attraction of Moretti's exposé of Romanism, there is no doubt that De Boni has seen clearly what far too many of the statesmen and noblemen of Italy are decrying but dimly, owing to the erroneous prepossessions of their youth and the prejudices of their riper years—namely, that Papal Rome is Italy's implacable foe, and that a protest against her temporal power is worse than vain, as long as her spiritual claims are recognised. With great eloquence, erudition, and popular illustration, he forces the conviction of this thought on the reader's mind. Here are two which will show the nature of his with those inconsistent patriots who, fiercest zeal for freedom, deal with a tenderness towards the spiritual of the Papacy :—

It is a wise thing thus to limit your to the temporal power of the Church, mere accessory, a consequence of a con-sustained by at least historical reasons as valid, like all other sovereignties, the same time, you do not open your protest without bowing reverently and heartily that you are good Catholics—that you belong to that herd of human profess not to think, not to wish aught which the Church thinks and wishes—singing reverently, I say, to that spiritual which is the root of the evil, which is or nothing, which is an armed resistant the unanswerable arguments of story, of nature herself ! This hostile not alone in Rome, it is everywhere ;
an accident of our times ; it declares al, beyond the reach of change. . . .
hands himself over to his enemy is it, and the mind of Italy is still the of the Vatican. . . . We must destroy of Rome, or she will destroy us. . . .
ain :—

able line of conduct is embraced in a apt, " Abandon at once and for ever the our enemy." If, in order to abandon ait for a miracle of ancient revelation, na to descend from the skies, if you do how to draw conclusions from your own and the teachings of history, you : abandon her. Not a day dawns in h adds not a ray to her crown, and yet discover the absolute Light, the tormentof centuries. But from this you surely sh to infer your duty to abide for ever
k. If the way is long, set your feet you will be already a shorter distance alf-way standpoint. You can worship your personal mission among men, in-store of blessing, and diminish the ls in the world. If God is a Being all as in His nature, your greatest offence as must be the living contradiction in st. Cease, then, your inconsistency ;
he old Church ; leave behind you the the dead. If you do not in your con-fessive in praying by your good works, if liberty and of justice do not suffice you, with the Waldenses, worship with the als, pray with the Unitarians, whose was founded by Italians, but at least he sepulchre, step forth into the light.
singly never met with anything more a touching than the passage in which

De Boni admits the infidelity of Italy, and lays the whole blame of this sad state of things at the door of the Church.

A NEW JOURNAL—GAVAZZI'S LAST WORK.

In striking contrast to the decisive action recommended so earnestly by De Boni is the writing of a new monthly journal, the Examiner, " established to promote concord between religion and the State," which I notice simply because it is, I believe, the organ of the efforts of the High Church party in England, although entirely managed by Italian writers.
It is very like the Mediators of Passaglia, except that while Passaglia will allow no word of protest or fault-finding to pass beyond the limits of the temporal power, the Examiner is set upon a reform of abuses, and a return to the primitive state of the Church.
While we have little faith in the purification of the Church of Rome, we hail this journal as a means of diffusing information on many points which would not otherwise be discussed.
Both in England and Italy there is in certain quarters a thorough belief in this purging out the leaven of Romanism as the only means of benefiting Italy, and it is well that that party should have made its experiences, and that Italy should know how far England may be her guide. The journal is well-conducted, and contains articles from able writers, such as Perfetti, Count Tasca, and Bianciardi.
As the preaching of the Gospel, and not the modeling of the Church, is our theme, I need not trouble your readers with a further reference to this line of argument.

Signor Gavazzi has lately published an excellent treatise here on the subject of the seizure and sale, by the Government, of ecclesiastical property, which is being vigorously proceeded with, to the great advantage of the country, and the detriment of the Church of Rome. The whole question, together with a description of the different kinds of priestly and monkish possessions, and the manner in which they should be disposed of, and how the money resulting should be laid out, is explained very popularly and interestingly to the Italian public by Signor Gavazzi.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, March 15, 1864.

THE WAR.

As in my last letter, what could be motives of Prussia and Austria for aidable expedition against Denmark ?

I left that question without a reply, although the opinion of far-seeing men was already formed in regard to it. But since then the march of events has no longer left any doubt. The campaign undertaken by Herr von Bismark has not for its principal object to set free the Duchy of Schleswig-Holstein from Danish oppression, for which the presence of the Federal troops in Holstein would have been sufficient. What Herr von Bismark is going to fight against, even into Jutland, and perhaps as far as the very heart of the Danish monarchy, is liberty, the constitutional liberty of Prussia, and of all Germany, and, if possible, of Europe itself. In his blind arrogance, that man has fancied he has thereby found the true means of getting out of the perplexed position into which he had brought the Government of his country, and of breaking that power of liberty which he calls revolution. He has said to himself, "We are going, at one blow, to make an end of that vexatious Prussian Constitution." And in order to succeed in tearing it to pieces, he makes war with moneys which have not been voted, and which have even been positively refused by a Chamber which alone had the right to grant them. At the same stroke he breaks up the only legitimate authority which would still oppose his despotic views—I mean the Federal Diet—to which he now proposes that it should abdicate into his hands the power which it yet exercises over Holstein and over the rest of Germany. To be more certain of attaining this, he recalls the Prussian ambassador to this Diet—a man with a heart, honour, and piety, whom the fiery minister has found not sufficiently ardent to make his views triumphant; and who is, above all, indisposed to follow the diplomatic meanderings of his policy; and he substitutes for him a young diplomatist known for his zeal for the feudal party which is dominant at Berlin. This party alone can have sympathy for such enterprises, which wound at once all the feelings of liberal Germany and of the Duchies themselves, and doubtless will, ere long, wound those of all Europe.

DEATH OF THE KING OF BAVARIA—THE GERMANIC DIET—POLITICAL AND RELIGIOUS RANCOUR.

A grave and mournful event has come all at once to favour the audacious projects of Herr von Bismark, and to deprive the Germanic Diet of its true head. I allude to the unlooked-for death of the King of Bavaria. This sovereign of the largest of the states of the second order, who was very decided not to allow the rest of Germany to be nullified by the autocracy of Berlin and of Vienna, leaves upon his throne, by his death, a young man of eighteen years of age, from whom we cannot expect any energetic direction in the difficulties of the moment. His excellent and pious mother has doubtless brought him up in the principles of Christian wisdom but as a Protestant in a Catholic court, and as a Prussian princess, it is not probable that she can exercise great influence in relation to the independence of Germany.

As the climax of misfortune in present circumstances, we expect from day to day the news of the death of the King of Wurtemberg, which will equally deprive the Diet of Germany of one of its strongest supports. Everything seems, then, to favour the immense reactionary undertaking attempted by the Prussian Cabinet, with which the Austrian Government is also unhappily associated. Any one who did not know the patience and endurance of the German people might fear that such a suppression of all its sentiments must end by the explosion of revolution. With such a character we may hope that this will not happen; but who can say what complications and what miseries this blind policy is preparing for the future of Germany and of Europe? One of the results already is the irritation and reciprocal violence of parties. And as the Prussian feudal party, which supports Herr von Bismark, has the presumption to invoke Christianity in favour of its policy, the irritation and the violence enter even into religious controversy. One of our most distinguished theologians, Dr. Ebrard, of Erlangen, has recently published a pamphlet full of talent and energy, against the Kreuzzeitung, the organ of the politico-religious despotism of Prussia, and, above all, against its dangerous pretensions to make religion the partizan of its deplorable policy. This writing, which has been warmly approved by enlightened public opinion, has not been long before it has been assailed by answers, the violence of which becomes positive frenzy. In the front rank of this phalanx of fanatics a theologian of Marburg is distinguished, Dr. Vilmar, who occupied an influential position in the Government of Electoral Hesse under a minister of melancholy reputation, von Hassenpflug. Literal quotations would be necessary in order to give your readers any idea of the hatred which can envenom a so-called controversy carried on upon the most rigorous principles of ecclesiastical orthodoxy. What a triumph for unbelief, and what an affliction for true Christian men!

HOSTILE PUBLICATIONS CONCERNING THE LIFE OF JESUS, AND DEFENDERS OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

Conflict is no less prevalent in the the logical world. Tendencies the most negative, negative even unto Pantheism, come out more and more into broad daylight. The famous Dr. Strauss has just re-appeared upon the scene with a new "Life of Jesus," disengaged from the scientific encumbrances which made his first book accessible to the learned alone, and intended this time for all the cultivated classes of the people. It is remarkable that this book should appear at the same time as the second "Life of Jesus" by Renan, equally intended for the people, and which is sold for one shilling. The book of Strauss is dangerous in a very different way from the frivolous romance of the French writer, because to its unbelief and its yet more decided enmity to Christianity it joins great and profound erudition. But that wherein these two writers are in accord is very certainly the desire to root out of the human conscience faith in the Crucified One of Calvary. Only this intention appeared plainly enough in the case of the German Pantheist, while it is hidden under a vain religious sentimentalism in the case of the French Pantheist. Each of them is, then, assuredly one of the signs of the times in which we live.

Another publication has lately come to afflict the friends of Christian truth. This is a book likewise upon the person of the Saviour, by a man whose previous works allowed us to expect better things—Dr. Schenkel, professor at the University of Heidelberg. As for him, it is not hatred, it is much rather a kind of adoration and love which he says he entertains for the Lord Jesus; he professes to remain attached to Him, and to preserve all the essence of His Gospel, while he calls in question the reality of the facts of His history, that he may retain the idea of it only. Vain attempt of an idealism which, while it sacrifices the fulness of Divine revelation to the exigencies of reason, imagines it can still cherish the religious sentiment, and save from the wreck that which is eternal in Christianity! Happily, the profound necessities of the human soul, suffering through its sin, and not finding peace and life save at the foot of that Jesus whom unbelief attacks—these necessities will ever be the most powerful plea for the Gospel. And for the rest, in a country like Germany, learned defenders never fail to reply to the suggestions of false systems. Strauss must have learned this after the appearance of his first book; and his second will not remain without solid refutations, so that whoever seeks the truth will have all the means of finding it. Our theologians also give serious attention to publications of this nature coming from foreign countries. Nowhere has Renan been more roughly handled than in Germany, where the learned of all schools hardly speak save with contempt for his French frivolity. Your Colenso himself is beginning to find in Germany opponents whose science will reduce to their proper value all his arithmetical calculations. Dr. Hengstenberg, of Berlin, who already, at the beginning of this year, attacked him in terms of which I sometimes regret the rudeness and the irony, is now devoting to his work again a series of articles in the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, which he publishes. Although the Berlin theologian is often deficient in Christian charity, and even in scientific impartiality towards his adversaries, I indicate with pleasure his work to those of your readers who would like to see how the Bishop of Natal is estimated by a German theologian.

The living Word is a means yet more powerful, although less universal than the press, for combating error and for propagating the truth. Of this we have been able to convince ourselves in the course of the winter at Frankfort. Our central committee for the operations of the Inner Mission had invited Dr. von Zetzschwitz, professor at the University of Leipsic, to come and deliver in our city a course of lectures on the evidences of religion. The eminent talent of this servant of God, his eloquence, his learning, and the penetrative warmth of his address, have certainly drawn and kept about him a numerous and attentive audience, who filled a spacious hall. Besides, the largest church in the city was opened for him on the Thursday evening for a consecutive exposition of a book of the New Testament. A constantly-increasing assembly, and one which eventually filled the four or five thousand sittings of that large church, has come every week to hear with attention this popular and spirited exposition. This success, which would not be very remarkable in an English city, is very much so in a city of Germany, and there is abundant room for the hope that, by the grace of God, deep and enduring impressions will abide in many souls.

THE POPE ON THE STUDY OF SCIENCE.

Since the receipt of our correspondent's letter, we observe that the daily journals publish the translation of a brief addressed by the Pope to the Archbishop of Munich on the subject of the congress of the Roman Catholic savans of Germany, held towards the close of last year, in that city. In this document the Pontiff expresses his surprise at the meeting of this body, and also a variety of apprehensions which it has caused in his mind. On the Continent this is construed as a general censure of the opinions and proceedings of what are called Liberal Catholics; and many of the expressions are thought to refer as much to M. Montalembert and the Congress of Mechlin as to the scientific gentlemen who assembled at Munich. In the course of the letter the Pope says:—

We cannot conceal that we have suffered considerable uneasiness; for we fear lest the example of this congress, assembled without ecclesiastical authority, may serve by degrees to bring about an attack on the right of spiritual government and of legitimate teaching, which, in virtue of the divine institution, belongs of right to the Roman Pontiff and to the bishops who are in union and in accord with the successor of St. Peter; and that by reason of this trouble thus introduced into the government of the Church, the principle of unity and of obedience in matters of faith may one day be weakened among many. We feared also that in the same congress there might come to be uttered an sustained opinions and systems which, especially by the publicity which would be given to them might place in peril the purity of Catholic doctrine and the duty of submission.

The "duty of submission" is evidently the great concern of Pius IX. Moreover, according to this latest Papal deliverance it is not sufficient to shun positive heresy. There are errors less grave than this of which he bids his followers beware:—

As the question is of the submission which is due in conscience from all those Catholics who give themselves to the study of the speculative sciences in order to procure to the Church new advantages by their writings, the members of the congress ought to recognise that it is not sufficient for Catholic savans to accept and respect the dogmas of the Church of which we speak, and that they ought also to submit themselves both to the doctrinal decisions which emanate from Pontifical congregations, and to the points of doctrine which by common and constant consent are held in the Church as truths, and as certain theological conclusions, and that the opposite opinions, although they cannot be qualified heretical, merit, nevertheless, some other than logical censure.

PALESTINE.

MISSIONARY VISIT TO WANDERING ARABS.

The Rev. John Zeller, son-in-law of Bishop Gobat, and agent of the Church Missionary Society at Nazareth, has succeeded in opening friendly communications with a tribe of Bedouin Arabs. A little north-west of Mount Tabor is Jebel el Sich, a hill with the finest air, the finest scenery, and the finest view in Galilee. It is a still greater attraction, however, to the Bedouin chief, Agyle Agah, that it produces, at a certain season, the most luxuriant pasturage, and for this reason he had there pitched his camp when he was visited by Mr. Zeller. We quote from that gentleman's narrative in the Church Missionary Intelligencer:—

We had scarcely seated ourselves and drank a cup of coffee, when suddenly an immensely tall negro appeared with the Agah's smallest son in his arms, endeavouring to grasp the feet of the chief, whilst Agyle struggled to push him away with kicks and blows, till the negro at last equally suddenly made his escape. All were surprised at this singular duel, and I soon learned that the negro, who had committed a crime, appeared as "dacheel" before Agyle, intreating his mercy and protection, which, according to Arabic custom, cannot be refused if the suppliant has succeeded to enter the room of the women of the man whose mercy he solicits. In this case, however, Agyle was inexorable, for he had sworn to inflict capital punishment on him, and therefore bade him to flee for his life. Not long afterwards Agyle disappeared, and as the Bedouins showed signs of great uneasiness, I went outside to see what he was going to do. There I saw him already on fleetest mare, receiving a spear from the hands of his son. Evidently there was no joking: moments of the negro's life were counted. I therefore hastened to Agyle, and begged him to spare the negro; but he said, with the greatest composure and politeness, I should not discomfit myself, as he would be back in an instant. But now I took hold of the spear and said, "For my sake, alight and let him escape: you know you cannot refuse my request, as I am to-day your guest." This had the desired effect; and I am sure we both enjoyed our meal afterwards uncommonly well.

The hostilities between the Turkish Government and the Bedouins were just then beginning; and when I asked Agyle's opinion about these affairs, he answered laconically, "El Bedawi Iblis: ma tahoto fi Ris" (The Bedouin is a devil; you cannot put him into a sack); which shows that the Bedouins are fully conscious of their own no very gracious qualities.

Some short time after this visit, Mr. Zeller heard that Abdallah Ahmedy, the Sheikh of the Beni Sacher, had come with his tribe into the valley of the Jordan. He therefore proceeded to Beisan (Scythiopolis) to see him and was received by the Sheikh and his son Sultan, with their accustomed hospitality:—

After supper the Arabs gathered before the tent and we began to speak of Bedouin life and politics. The Sheikh had much to complain about the chicanery of the Turkish Government. They thought they had a right to claim a kind of feudal authority over the country east of the Jordan, and its villages round Irbid, from which place they were accustomed to provide themselves with their stock of grain and oil for their winter quarters in the desert. Now they had been driven away from there by the Turkish soldiers; and lately, after they had crossed the Jordan, the Pasha of Acca had taken from them their flocks of sheep and goats. They professed to submit to any conditions the Government would impose upon them, and to guarantee perfect safety to the property of the peasants, if they would be allowed to feed their flocks during the summer on the uncultivated plains of Syria, and buy their provisions; for during the summer months it is impossible for them to remain in the Arabian desert, where there is neither a blade of grass nor a drop of water. They laughed at the idea of leading a peaceable life together with other Arab tribes. "How shall a Bedouin get his livelihood," they said, "without his spear and sword? We have old enemies among the other tribes: if they have taken away our camels, we must, somehow or other, regain them, or die from hunger." Their relation towards agriculturists and the word of Scripture, "His hand shall be against every one," they strikingly illustrated by the following story: "Our father, Adam," they said, "had three sons. One was a hunter, the other a farmer, and the third a Bedouin, who had received from Adam the camel, to live by it. However, the camel died, and the Bedouin came to father Adam, and said, 'My camel died; what shall I do now? on what shall I live?' 'Go,' answered father Adam, 'and live by what you can get from your brethren.'" Another characteristic story is affirmed to have lately really happened. A Christian farmer, in the plain of Jezreel, had engaged a Bedouin to guard his field of durra (Indian corn), and exhorted him to take care of the same, as he had sown it in the sweat of his brow. But when the corn was ripe, the Bedouin carried it all off, leaving nothing to the peasant. The latter remonstrated, but the Bedouin answered, "Is it not written in the book, 'In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat thy bread?' See the perspiration upon me and my horse from endeavouring to gain a bit of bread." And when the peasant answered that God wants that we should eat our own bread in a rightful way, the other said, "This is an addition of your own, which is not contained in that passage of Scripture."

In October the Beni Sacher enter the desert south of the Belka, and travel southwards towards the Ghof and Hejat, where they provide themselves with dates, coffee, and butter from the flocks of goats which they possess there. The winter rains collected among the rocks, and in the cisterns of the desert, supply them during that time with water, and the shrubs of the desert are the food of their camels: the berries of these shrubs are cooked and eaten, and are, together with camels' milk, nearly their only food. A particular tribe of Bedouins, called Ferrad, eat locusts. Richer Bedouins carry a quantity of flour with them, as well as barley for their horses. The privations they have to undergo during their war expeditions in the desert are incredible; last year the son of the Sheikh had been on such an excursion, from which, after having spent their provisions, they had to make back their way for three days without any other food than the flesh of the dromedaries which they were obliged to kill.

Justice is administered among the Bedouins in a very simple way. Every larger tribe possesses a family, celebrated from ancient times for its wisdom and equity, who decides disputes. The oath is kept sacred, and settles many doubtful questions. Once I witnessed such a case. A Bedouin was brought before Agyle Agah, being accused of having stolen an ox, but he flatly denied the theft, and there were no witnesses. Yet when Agyle said, "Swear by my life" (the life of Abn Moosa), the man said, "I have the ox," and restored it immediately.

About religious things they do not trouble themselves, and none of them is able to read, or possess a book. The Sheikh says his prayers for the whole of his tribe, and for the prescribed adulations they use the desert sand instead of water. I spoke to them of the Ten Commandments, and the wrath of God against those who sinned against Him, which would follow them even to another world, if they would not be reconciled to God.

Mr. Zeller, after his return home, received a visit from the sons of Abdallah Ahmedy. He goes on to say that the Turks have acted with treachery towards the Bedouins—falling upon them at night, firing into their tents, and taking away their flocks, while their chiefs were negotiating with them about the terms of peace. The Bedouins protested against this injustice, but did not retaliate, whereupon the Turks thought they might, in this way, be easily subjected:—

At the same time the Turks hoped to be able to seize the person of Agyle Agah, the above-mentioned Bedouin chief, who is, however, in the pay of the Government, and who, by his influence with the Bedouins, had hitherto faithfully done his duty in protecting the country. Agyle tendered his resignation as chief of the Pasha Bozuka, which was accepted, and then he quietly retired to the south of Palestine, near Gaza.

A few days before Agyle's departure, I visited him in his camp, where he was surrounded by deputies from all the Bedouins of the country. He reminded me, that in the year 1860 he had protected Galilee from the plundering hordes of Metawalis and Druses, and the ill-will of Mohammedans, so that no harm befell any of the Christians. Tears stood in his eyes when he spoke of the kindness shown to him last year by the Prince of Wales. He said he had tried, by his conduct, to gain the esteem of the Europeans, especially the English, but the consequence was that he had become an object of suspicion to the Turks, and these now kicked him out of the land like a dog. Nobody with a conscience and fear of God could serve this false and treacherous Government, and he preferred to retire into the desert, rather than to receive all possible honours in the service of the Turks.

Formerly it had been the policy of the Turks to weaken the Bedouins, by fostering their wars among themselves; for instance, between Sheikh Mohammed el Duchy Eben Smer and Sheikh Feisal, of the Ruwalla. Now the indiscriminate attacks of the Turks upon them had the effect, that they suspended their hostilities among themselves, and these large tribes of the Walad Ali and the Ruwalla entered into a league with one another and the Beni Sacher to defend themselves against the Turks. And the small Bedouin tribes on the west of the Jordan, harassed by the Turkish soldiers, by nightly attacks and plunders, are fast following their example.

In the first week of August Agyle left the country : all the Arabs were roused :—

The safety of Galilee, and the responsibility for the same, rested with the Pasha ; for a successor to Agyle, as everybody knew, could not be found. Thus it came, that since then robberies and murders were of daily occurrence. One of the first of these crimes much concerned myself.

On Saturday, the 8th of August, I accompanied my brother-in-law, the Rev. S. B. Gobat, and Mrs. Gobat on their way from Khaiffa to Nazareth. The muleteer with our luggage, accompanied by a Franciscan monk, preceded us by about half an hour. It was already after sunset, and fast getting dark, when we passed up a deep valley enclosed by steep hills covered with brushwood, which leads from the western branch of the plain of Jezreel up to the hills of Nazareth. At the top of the valley, only a mile's distance from the town, is a fountain surrounded by fig-trees. To my astonishment, I recognised here the empty horses of the monk and the muleteer. Nobody answered to my calls, and, when I approached, I found the muleteer apparently dead in a pool of blood, and not far from him the monk, nearly without clothes, covered with blood, and with his hands tied together with a rope, who, with faint voice, called for help. The boxes, broken open and empty, lay on the ground, as well as some of the articles they contained. The robbers had evidently just finished their deed, and fled or hidden themselves at our approach. From the neighbouring vineyards I got immediate help for the wounded men, who, I am thankful to say, are now, by the mercy of God, recovering from the dangerous injuries they received, and thus narrowly escaped an untimely and cruel death. None of the robbers who committed the deed have been caught. The Pasha of Acca, the same who had made the false accusations against me, told, a few days afterwards, to Her Majesty's Vice-Consul in Khaiffa, that the representative of the Protestant congregation at Nazareth was implicated in this robbery, though this man had been with us on the road.

Many similar stories might I relate which occurred in our neighbourhood. Soon afterwards, the cattle belonging to the Latin convent were driven away close to Nazareth. When the Pasha was informed of it, he summoned the elders of the town, and threatened to punish them if they allowed (to spread) such false reports ; and in like manner he threatened others who complained to him about the loss of their property. He tried for some time to conciliate some of the nearest Bedouin tribes, and gave their Sheikhs presents of mantles and swords ; but when his forces had been strengthened by another regiment of Turkish infantry sent from Beyrout, he changed his tactics, and marched against the Bedouins of the Sakker, near Ain Jelud. These, having but a few days previously received the presents of the Pasha, and his assurance of friendship, thought the Pasha was coming to pay them a friendly visit, and went to meet him in order to invite him to their tents, when the soldiers fired into the midst of them, and and took away 2,000 to 3,000 sheep and goats, and plundered their tents. This was certainly enough to rouse the most peaceful Bedouin. The Sakker despatched now three men on the fleetest dromedaries to Gaza, to Agyle Agah, who appeared before him with the rags from their torn tents round their necks, and summoned him to war ; and similar messengers hastened silently in all directions to the black tents.

On Tuesday, the 22nd of September, 600 Bedouins, gathered from different tribes, with Saleh Agah, the brother of Agyle Agah, at their head, appeared suddenly on the plateau north-east of Mount Tabor, and, after having put to flight and slain seventy horsemen of the Pasha's, mostly Algerians, they drove away the cattle of all the surrounding villages, Saroone, Haditi, Kefr Sabt, &c. The people of Olam defended themselves, but having only a few rifles and very little ammunition, their village was soon stormed. Four of the inhabitants were killed, many were wounded, and every article of moveable property was taken. The evening of the same day the Bedouins appeared before Daboorieh and Eksal, whose inhabitants defended themselves, and sent to Nazareth for succour. In the middle of the night the war-cry was consequently raised here, and a number of men, including several of the Protestant community, were despatched to assist these villages, but found that the Bedouins had disappeared. The day afterwards the villages Jebata and Zebdi, to the west of Nazareth, in the plain of Megiddo, were pillaged ; also several villages in the valley of the Jordan. The Fellahin brought their cattle and moveables to Nazareth : all roads were stopped, even the way to Khaiffa and Acca, and all traffic was suspended. In two days, more has been lost than years of prosperity can restore. . . .

Thus the efforts made by the Turks to strengthen or regain their authority in Syria have produced very disastrous results, and served only to show more clearly the great inherent weakness of their Government. All the refractory districts of Syria, as the Ledja, Jebel-el-Druzes, Hauran, Jebel Ajlun, and even some parts south of Jerusalem, are, at present, more than ever in a state of fermentation.

AMERICA.

New York, March 11, 1864.

INFLUENCE, PAST AND PRESENT, OF THE WAR. THE NEGRO AND SLAVERY.

Our great war is making great changes in our national character and forms of thought ; but it is wonderful that there is so little consciousness attending the transformation. In social and mercantile life, if we except the gold and stock markets, affairs move on almost as quietly as in a time of profound peace. Religious feeling, also, seems to have returned to its ordinary channels. A stranger might attend church or prayer-meeting in New York, and never discover that there was civil war in the land, except by the occasional intro-on the battle-field should regard the commission with favour.

The chamber of the House of Representatives was never put to a better use than it was on the occasion of the second anniversary of this society, February 2nd. The Vice-President of the United States was in the chair, the President sitting with the audience, which filled the large hall. The Speaker of the House, Hon. Schuyler Colfax, who is known as an exemplary Christian, followed the very touching statements made by delegates of the commission with a most hearty and eloquent endorsement of its work, and officers of the army bore impressive testimony to its practical success. The enthusiasm reached the highest pitch, the audience by turns weeping, and cheering, and solemnly responding. All this, of course, is valuable chiefly as the index and pledge of the interest of the Government and the nation in a great religious work. No good man can think of the tender sympathies, the Christian zeal and faith, the lofty and far-reaching patriotism which the commission develops and organises, without recognising in our present fearful history an element of religious training that is full of promise. That is not a spectacle of unmixed evil when a nation that is fighting at once for the supremacy of law and the diffusion of liberty estimates the multitude of its defenders, not by the mere show of numbers on the rolls or in the ranks, but by the Gospel estimate of their immortality, and meets their pressing needs with faith and prayer, and earnest Christian help. There are thousands of men in America whose views of Christian responsibility are tenfold larger and more vital to-day than they were before this war began.

The Christian Commission has employed in all a little more than twelve hundred delegates; and it estimates the last year's receipts in "money, stores, and facilities," at a little less than a million of dollars.

THE SANITARY COMMISSION—THE RAFFLE QUESTION RIGHTLY DECIDED.

But I must say a word about another commission which just now almost eclipses its more modest sister. This cares for those physical wants of sick and wounded soldiers which the Government cannot supply, and is called, accordingly, the Sanitary Commission.

Its receipts have always been very large, and it has done a great work. But of late its income has been vastly increased by a system of fairs which have been held all over the country. The proceeds of these in the large cities have, in several instances, amounted to three or four hundred thousand dollars. One closed in Brooklyn, last week, which will probably pay over to the commission half a million of dollars; and one is to open in New York within a fortnight, the proceeds of which are confidently expected to reach a million and a-half. Every merchant contributes something; every family makes something. Neighbouring villages and cities, and even States, will have their "departments." Individual subscriptions of five thousand dollars are not rare. One merchant headed the list with a subscription of ten thousand. The whole community is in a frenzy of patriotism, and philanthropy, and emulation. Where there is so much excitement, there will surely be some excesses, and many who love the end, dread the means. It will be well if our "Metropolitan Fund," with its host of questionable accessories, shall leave the reviving religious feeling of our churches as healthy as it finds it.

The cause of morals and religion, however, has already derived one incidental advantage from the proposed fair. In other instances it has been common to dispose of the more costly works of art, and of such other goods as were not readily saleable, by setting them up to be raffled for. This practice is forbidden by stringent laws. But charitable causes have tacitly claimed and secured a kind of exemption from the statute. The managers of the approaching gigantic fair proposed to claim the same toleration for themselves. But the moral and Christian feeling of the community, which had grown very restive under recent excesses in other cities, rallied in different forms to oppose the evil. It was met, especially by a part of the press, with misrepresentation, and ridicule, and bravado. But after full discussion, the triumph has been complete; and it is probably final. In that case a great moral nuisance and mischief will be abated all through the land. In this result none will rejoice more than the gentlemen of the commission, whose known wishes the advocates of the raffle were proposing to resist.

THE NEW OXFORD DECLARATION.

The late decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council continues to be the subject of much agitation among the members of the Church of England. The clergy of the diocese of Salisbury have addressed their bishop, who, it will be remembered, was the prosecutor in the case of the Rev. Dr. Williams, sympathising with him in the expense, trouble, and annoyance to which he has been put in the trial, and expressing their opinion that the decision in the case will exercise an evil influence on the best interests of the Church. But the most important document which the decision has called forth was drawn up at a meeting held at Oxford, on the 25th of February, and which has since been put into circulation, and has been extensively signed. The "Declaration" is to the following effect :—

We, the undersigned presbyters and deacons, in Holy Orders of the Church of England and Ireland, hold it to be our bounden duty to the Church of England and Ireland, and to the souls of men, to declare our firm belief that the Church of England and Ireland, in common with the whole Catholic Church, maintains without reserve or qualification the inspiration and Divine authority of the whole canonical Scriptures, as not only containing, but being the Word of God, and further teaches, in the words of our blessed Lord, that the "punishment" of the "cursed," equally with the "life" of the "righteous," is "everlasting."

The committee by whom this "Declaration" was framed consists of Dr. Clerke, Archdeacon of Oxford; Dr. Cotton, Provost of Worcester College; Archdeacon Denison; the Rev. W. R. Fremantle; Dr. Leighton, Warden of All Souls; Dr. Miller, of Birmingham; and Dr. Pusey. It will be seen that High Churchmen and Evangelicals have united together in this matter, as if to ward off the attacks of a common enemy. The "Declaration" itself has since been made the subject of no small amount of criticism and comment. First of all, a question has been raised respecting the lawfulness of signing it. Certain clergymen—foremost among whom stands Dr. Goode, Dean of Ripon, who agreed in principle with this "Declaration"—were doubtful as to the legality of signing it; and a case was therefore prepared on the subject for the consideration and opinion of counsel. A joint opinion, thus obtained, was pronounced by Mr. A. J. Stephens, Q.C., LL.D., and Mr. J. C. Thell. The opinion sets forth :—

peach a judgment given by the Queen in an ecclesiastical cause, and publish a declaration, substantially stating that they do not submit to such judgment, they are, constructively, seeking to release themselves from submission to the Royal supremacy, quoad that judgment. The question is, whether the presbyters and deacons who signed the "Declaration" under consideration have, in such document, thus impeached the supremacy of the Queen, quoad the judgment in Wilson v. Fendall.

Extracts are then given in parallel columns from the judgment of the Judicial Committee and from the "Declaration."

From the view of the case thus presented [say the counsel] it is evident that the declarants impeach the judgment of the Judicial Committee by affirming the converse of the propositions established by the judgment; and that fact, taken in connexion with the language and tenor of the "Declaration" and its title, is open to no other reasonable construction than that of an intention on the part of the declarants not to submit to the judgment pronounced by the Queen.

The opinion concludes in the following terms :—

Under the foregoing facts and circumstances, we are of opinion that it is not consistent with the obligations under which the clergy have placed themselves by their subscription to the three Articles contained in the 36th Canon, to sign the "Declaration" drawn up at the meeting held at Oxford on the 25th February, 1864.

But a higher legal authority than that of these gentlemen, respectable as they are, has since been obtained, which we think conclusively settles the question. A case was laid before the Attorney-General and Sir Hugh Cairns—without exception, we believe, the ablest lawyers now at the bar, and no less distinguished for their high Christian character than for their legal attainments. From their joint opinion we give the following extracts :—

The observance of these Articles [the 1st and 37th] will, of course, involve, among other things, obedience and respect to any judgment—that is, to any sentence which the Sovereign may pronounce in an ecclesiastical cause, on the recommendation of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; but this is wholly distinct from an assent to or acquiescence in the reasoning or statements pursued or advanced by members of the Judicial Committee as the grounds of their recommendation to Her Majesty. The reasons may be inadequate to justify the recommendation; different members of the Committee may express or act upon different reasons. The Sovereign may proceed upon the recommendation given without concurring in the reasons assigned, if, indeed, reasons are assigned in the report or recommendation to the Sovereign. It is to the sentence of the Sovereign, and to that alone, that the subjects of the Sovereign, both lay and clerical, have to look; and it is the sentence which those who are affected by it have to obey.

We are clearly of opinion that it is not in any way unlawful for clergymen, either singly or together, in their preaching or otherwise, to affirm that the Church of England and Ireland maintains, without reserve or qualification, the inspiration and Divine authority of the whole canonical Scriptures, as not only containing, but being the Word of God; and, further, in the words of our blessed Lord, that the punishment of the cursed, equally with the life of the righteous, is everlasting.

The moral phase of the controversy is, however, more interesting than the legal. Among the first to condemn the "Declaration," and to brand it with the designation of a new test, was the Rev. F. D. Maurice, who, adverting to the fact of its being adopted by the two great parties in the Church, complains that this is a case in which a sham agreement is produced by one set of words being adopted by the High Churchmen and the Evangelicals in two different meanings. He went on to say, that a sense might be suggested in which even Dr. Williams or Mr. Wilson might sign it. This, however, was answered by Mr. Wilson himself, who, in a published letter, declared that he would not sign it if he could, and could not if he would. It is, of course, easy to understand the rev. gentleman's reluctance to sign, though why he declares that he "could not" sign this "Declaration," while he both can and does continue his signatures to the no less emphatic formularies of the Church, is a matter which he does not explain. Mr. Maurice was answered by Dr. Pusey, who defended the simplicity and straightforwardness of the "Declaration," and closed his letter with the startling assertion that it was plain Mr. Maurice and he did not believe in the same God. Mr. Maurice rejoined, and accepted this definition of the difference between them to the fullest extent. He, for one, did not believe in a God that "condemned men to everlasting sin." This sharp and most unfair definition of his adversary's views was not, however, allowed to go unanswered. Dr. Pusey explained that it would be more true to say that eternal sin was the cause of eternal punishment, than that eternal punishment was the cause of eternal sin; and he argued that the belief in the orthodox doctrine no more implied that the Almighty condemns men to eternal sin, than the existence of men who go on sinning till death implies that the Almighty wished men to continue in such during this life. There for the present the controversy rests.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY ON THE LATE JUDGMENT.

The Primate has addressed a pastoral letter to the clergy and laity of the province of Canterbury, setting forth in clear, terse, and nervous language his views respecting the late decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It will be remembered that he dissented from the judgment of his colleagues in the Council on the views of the Essayists with reference to the doctrine of inspiration, and he now states that while he would not undertake to define inspiration he accepted the testimony of the Church that the "Bible was God's Word written," and therefore, Dr. Williams must be wrong in saying that it is only the voice of devout reason in the congregation. As to his acquiescence in the judgment on the point bearing upon eternal punishment, he says arose from no doubt in his own mind that the Church teaches the eternity both of reward and punishments, but that from the manner in which Mr. Wilson had put his view he doubted whether they have the meaning which the prosecutors attached to them. The Archbishop, in conclusion, after expressing his conviction that the clergy will themselves reverence and will teach their flocks to reverence the Canonical Scriptures as the Word of God, goes on to say:—

May God, of His infinite mercy, forbid that people should ever be robbed of the Divine revelations thence derived! May that blessed continue to be regarded by us all as our infallible authority concerning matters of doctrine and practice; as the volume which proclaims the Saviour of the world from Genesis to Revelation and bears within it the Gospel message of salvation through Christ from its beginning to its end. May we find and feel it to be our solace in sickness and our strength in the season of temptation; our guide and comfort in life, our stay and support in the hour of death! May it be our privilege to preserve it, in all its integrity and purity, to generation, and hand it down as the Word of God to all them that are yet for to come."

PROFESSOR JOWETT'S SALARY.

The Privy Council's decision, and the agitation to which it has given rise, have exercised an adverse influence on the pecuniary interests of Professor Jowett at Oxford. The Great Professorship, to which Dr. Jowett was appointed by the Crown, possesses an endowment of only 40% a-year, which is the sum also allotted to the other Regius professorships. The latter, however, have all been more liberally endowed out of the University funds; and soon after Dr. Jowett accepted the appointment, a motion was made to give him the same endowment. This was refused, year after year, for several years together, avowedly on the ground of the heterodox opinions ascribed to the professor agreed, and on what they disagreed. They are agreed in holding that civil government is an ordinance of God; that the civil magistrate ought to further the interests of Christianity among his subjects in every way consistent with its spirit and precepts; that it is not his province to impose a creed on his subjects, or to interfere with the government of the Church; but that such questions as the ceremonies that are to constitute marriage, the observance of the Sabbath, and the appointment of days of national humiliation and thanksgiving, may properly fall under his regulation; always taking care, however, that neither Church nor State intrude into the proper province of each other.

Such being the points of agreement between the two bodies, it might be supposed there is nothing left on which to differ. But that would be doing injustice to the acuteness and subtlety of the champions on each side. There is a matter of principle on which they do not as yet see eye to eye. On this point of divergence our readers will probably like to see the statement of principle as drawn up on each side; and we therefore give the views of each entire. And we believe that after perusing them they will agree with us, that never before was there set forth a thinner and slighter obstacle to hinder the complete and cordial union of two bodies of Christian men:—

Statements of Free Church Committee.

1. That while the civil magistrate must not so sustain himself a public judge of true or false religion as to dictate to his subjects in matters of faith, and has no authority in spiritual things, yet, owing obligation to Christ, he may lawfully acknowledge, as being in accordance with the Word of God, the creed and jurisdiction of the Church. As a further act of homage to Christ, it is his duty, when necessary or expedient, to employ the national resources in aid of the Church, provided always that in doing so, while reserving to himself full control over the temporalities, which are his own gift, he abstain from all authoritative interference in the internal government of the Church. And while the Church must ever maintain the essential and perpetual obligation which Christ has laid on all His people to support and extend His Church by freewill offerings, yet, in entire consistency with said obligation, the Church may lawfully accept aid from the civil magistrate when her spiritual independence is preserved entire. But it must always be a question to be judged of according to times and circumstances, whether or not such aid ought to be given by the civil magistrate, as well as whether or not it ought to be accepted by the Church. And the question must, in every instance, be decided by each of the two parties judging for itself, on its own responsibility.—

2. It follows from the preceding article, that a branch of the Christian Church consenting to be in alliance with the State, and to accept its aid upon the condition of being subject to the authoritative control of the State or its Courts in spiritual matters—or continuing in such connexion with the State as involves such subjection—must be held to be so far unfaithful to the Lord Jesus Christ as King and Head of His Church. And upon this ground, in accordance with the history and the constitutional principles of the Church of Scotland, a protest is to be maintained against the present Establishment in Scotland.

Statements of United Presbyterian Committee.

1. That, inasmuch as the civil magistrate has no authority in spiritual things, and as the employment of force in such matters is opposed to the spirit and precepts of Christianity, it is not within his province to legislate as to what is true religion; to prescribe a creed or form of worship to his subjects, or to endow the Church from national resources; that Jesus Christ, as sole King and Head of His Church, has enjoined upon His people to provide for maintaining and extending it by freewill offerings; that thus, being Christ's ordinance, it excludes State aid for these purposes; and that adherence to it is the true guard of the Church's independence. 2. That the United Presbyterian Church, without requiring from her members any approval of the steps taken by their fathers, or interfering with their rights of private judgment in reference to theories which are united in regarding as still valid the reasons on which they have hitherto maintained their state of secession and separation from the judgements of the Established Church, as expressed in the authorised documents of the respective bodies of which the United Presbyterian Church is formed—and in maintaining the lawfulness of the obligation of separation from ecclesiastical bodies in which dangerous error is tolerated, or the discipline of the Church, or the rights of her ministers or members are disregarded. Moreover, though uniformity of opinion with respect to civil establishments of religion is not a term of communion in the United Presbyterian Church, yet the views on this subject held, and universally acted on, are opposed to these institutions; and the statements set forth in these distinctive articles are regarded by that Church as a protest against the Church Establishment in Scotland.

THE LATE REV. G. R. BIRCH.

We regret to record the death of the Rev. G. R. Birch, the valued Secretary to the Turkish Missions Aid Society. Mr. Birch was not more than 56 years of age, and his removal was sudden and unexpected. We hope in a future number to speak more fully of the loss thus sustained by an important institution and the wide circle of Christian friends by whom his worth was appreciated.

Miscellaneous.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

SYRIA.

About sixty persons, two of whom are Greek priests, in the town of Marmareeta, a day and a-half north-east from Tripoli, in the mountains, have turned Protestants, and ask for a church and a school. "All the country between here and Huma," writes the Rev. S. Jessup, in Tripoli, "is asking for the Gospel, faster than we can answer calls." Mr. Jessup mentions that Sulayman, a converted Nusaireh Sheik, has just printed, at the mission press, a book disclosing the secrets of the Nusaireh religion, which for so long a time has been a profound mystery:—

The book is creating quite a sensation through all the country. One curious incident is mentioned in it. When any one of the initiated leaves that religion, others buy of him all his prayers and privileges. One applied to Sulayman, desiring to buy his prayers and all the profit of them. Having been a Sheik, had learned a great many, and offered them as a gift. This was refused, since it might not be binding—the prayers might not be efficacious. So Sulayman consented to all his prayers, and all the benefit resulting from them, for 7½ piastres—30 cents.

The Rev. H. H. Jessup, while on a visit to Huma, with his brother, had solemnized first Protestant marriages (two couples) in that place. The converts at Huma having their native teacher, their grief was almost irrepressible at the short stay of the missionaries; and "they said," one of the brethren tells us, "they were almost induced to lock me up, and keep me as their own missionary."

PERSIA.

Our readers will not have forgotten the case narrated by Dr. Perkins (Evangelical Christian, 1863, p. 596) of the abduction of the poor Nestorian girl, Nargis. Another missionary of the American Board, the Rev. Mr. Labaree, remarks that this flagrant case of injustice and violence wrought up the Nestorians to the last point of endurance. He adds, however, that now a ray of light begins to break in upon them:—

Their petition to the Queen of England for aid, sent by Dr. Young, we have just learned, reached her hand. She took a deep interest in it, and definite and positive orders have been sent to the British Embassy in Persia, which we hope will result in a decided amelioration of the condition of the people. . . . Since writing the above, an officer has arrived here, sent by the Governor of the province in Tabreez, with the strongest orders for the immediate restoration of Nargis to her parents; and directing that the artilleryman be severely bastinadoed and sent to Tabreez, where he will be dismissed from the service. The Prince-Governor of Oroomiah, and the colonel of the artillery, are severely reprimanded and threatened for such a gross violation of justice.

It appears from a letter of Dr. Perkins, dated at the beginning of November, that these orders, as far as relates to the punishment of the culprit, were disregarded, the Oroomiah officials being heavily bribed for that purpose. The British Consul was on the alert for some such Persian manoeuvre, and a fresh demand from him brought out a new and still stronger order for the punishment of the kidnapper. This also was disregarded, and, "to pacify the Consul," just before Dr. Perkins wrote, a third order was issued, "probably more stringent than the others, but which will be just as easily set aside."

On the recent return of the Rev. Mr. Shedd and his family, with Miss Crawford, from the mountain district of Gawar, while they were encamped at night on the plain of Baradost, the tent occupied by Miss Crawford and two Nestorian young women was attacked by a party of Koords:—

Miss Crawford was aroused from her sleep by her bed being pulled from under her, and bedding and travelling-bag were carried off, all so suddenly, that the robbers escaped before Mr. Shedd and some of the attendants awoke. The property was subsequently demanded of the Koordish chief of the district, who made vigorous efforts to recover it, and it was at length mostly restored, but in a mutilated and ruined condition.

INDIA.

Dr. Duff embarked, on his return home, on the 19th December. By medical advice, he takes the long sea voyage, and will therefore make a brief stay at the Cape of Good Hope, where, on his first voyage to India, he suffered shipwreck. Just before going on board the vessel, he wrote:—

No words of mine can well express the general change which has taken place in the people at large towards missionaries and their peculiar vocations. It really looks, in the districts where our labours have been long carried on, as if the fields were whitening for the harvest. . . . Though mine, from the very necessities of my position, has been throughout rather a stormy career, people of all classes began at last to understand me. I am not aware that I leave any enmities behind me.

Subsequently, when on board, Dr. Duff communicated to his Free Church friends his "last piece of intelligence from India." It was, that six central localities had been fixed on for as many superior Christian schools, the buildings to be used also as churches, and that, in response to an appeal made by him a day or two before his departure, the requisite funds for erecting them were at once secured. The Government had agreed to pay one-half of the cost; and six members of the Free Church congregation at Calcutta forthwith volunteered to defray the other half. "Truly," adds Dr. Duff, "in leaving India, amid many regrets and sorrows, my heart has been made glad by this most signal smile of Jehovah's gracious countenance on our mission."

A missionary tour of more than seven hundred miles has been made through Hyderabad by the Rev. Edward Porter, of the London Society. Mr. Porter found the people debased and grievously oppressed, but free from prejudice, less wedded to caste, and more willing to listen to the Gospel message than those of other districts he had visited. "In some places," he writes, "they came out of their villages in groups of thirty, sixty, and ninety, and followed us to the bungalow, beseeching us to tell them more of the good way. In this way we were engaged from day to day, instructing the people as long as we had physical strength to continue our labours among them." After hearing him preach, some would ask, "Sir, how long have your people known of this good way?" When answered, "Hundreds of years," the reply was ready, "Why did you not send us instruction before, to tell us of the good way?"

At Delhi, the Baptist mission is reviving. A very substantial and beautiful chapel—intended as a memorial of the martyred brethren, Messrs. M'Kay and Walayat Ali—is in course of erection in the city. The attendance at all the chapels has increased; at some it has doubled. Twenty native agents are at work. The assiduous missionary, the Rev. James Smith, seems resolved that in respect of both their temporal and ecclesiastical affairs the converts shall be taught, without delay, lessons of self-reliance. Thus, in one of the surrounding villages (Pahar Gunge), he speaks of "a sad error" as having been committed "in building a Christian village, and thus not only separating the Christians from their neighbours, but reducing them to a state of dependence and helplessness." He goes on to say:—

The men told me they had been anxiously looking for my arrival: that having been removed from their usual residences and cut off from their trade connexions, they could get no employment, and the Mahajuns would lend them no money, and hence they must look to the mission for help. I thought it better to be plain and straightforward, hiding nothing, and hence I said, "I have made sacrifices to come to you in order to do you good, but I have neither money to lend nor employment to give, nor do I feel that these matters are at all in my province." I told them that all that Christian love and sympathy could do they would have from me; but they must rely upon their own exertions for a livelihood, and not on the mission. They replied (or at least one of them), "Then we must go where we can get employment." I said, "By all means; your Christianity is not at all dependent upon your living here; go wherever you think you can provide for your families." Ecclesiastically, also, Mr. Smith seems determined that the converts shall, as far as possible, stand alone:—

We shall [he says] hold church meetings before the close of the month, both at Delhi and the three out-stations, where churches have been formed—viz., Shahdra, Purana Killa, and Pahar Gunge, and we are determined the churches shall manage their own affairs, only advising the pastors in cases of difficulty. I would rather the churches fell into error than keep them under the missionary's thumb. Independence must be secured at almost any cost.

The Rev. Mr. Shoolbred, in journeying through the Mugra (Rajpootana), has explored the temple of Devi, or Peeplaj, a goddess who, in times of Brahmin sway, was to be propitiated only by human victims. He describes it as secluded in the very heart of the wildest part of that country, surrounded by strange and awe-inspiring scenery. Amid an amphitheatre of lofty hills rises that on which Peeplaj rears her blood-stained head.

Round that temple [writes Mr. Shoolbred], on a day late in August last year, twelve thousand Mairs from all parts of the Mugra were assembled. The males remained down in the plain; while the women and small children were sent out of harm's way to the natural galleries on the surrounding heights, where the whole spectacle can be advantageously viewed. Eighty young bull-buffaloes are lowing half in terror at the excited crowd, tied up and guarded till their turn has come. And now the lucky hour forecast by the pujera has arrived. A dozen brawny farmers strip themselves to the "buff," and a buffalo is let loose in the temple court. Arming themselves with axes, swords, long knives, half a dozen naked Mairs rush in to the attack. The poor bullock, excited by fear, or maddened by having country wine and bang forced down its throat, tries to escape by leaping the wall, or blindly rushes on its persecutors. It is the first of eighty, and there is no time to dally for mere sport. Like a pack of hungry wolves, shouting the name of their infernal goddess, the Mairs rush upon the goaded brute; "cut and come again" is their motto, and the object of each to secure for himself the largest possible portion of buffalo steak. Now one chops a slice from the loin, and another a steak from the haunch, while the poor tortured bullock, dissected alive, rushes madly about, its blood spurting in streams upon its savage tormentors. At last the coup de grace is given by an axe-stroke on the head, and, like wolves upon a throttled deer, rush in the hungry Mairs. What remains of it is speedily quartered; and laying for a moment the bleeding carrion on the ghastly altar, they carry it off in triumph to feast with their families on the consecrated flesh. I was assured that often, in their blind rage and thirst for blood, the slaughterers badly wound each other; and that, oftener than once, bullock and assailant have rolled over the wall and down the precipice together.

Mr. Shoolbred gives the following description of the Kali Devi, or goddess, and of his behaviour in her presence. She is—

A most hideous and portentous female head, evidently formed of baked clay, with two staring silver noses set on each side of a huge nose like the beak of an eagle. . . . Much to the amazement and terror of our Mair guide, and one or two others who accompanied us, I took the liberty of pulling the goddess' eagle-like beak, saying, "Now, if she is a deity, why does she not strike me dead in revenge for such an indignity?" We left Todgurb that evening for Kachubli. The tent sent forward was delayed, and we had to sit in the raw night air in a narrow valley soaked with the former rains. The result was, that next morning I woke with a slight attack of bilious fever, which prostrated me for a day. My amusement was great when I heard afterwards that the Mair men universally attributed this to the indignity I had offered to Peeplaj.

All the other ancient deities, we are told, are visibly on the wane in the Mugra; but the old superstition has only given way to one more secret and refined:—

The old defences, easily assailable, are left standing; but behind them rise new and more formidable buttresses, covered ways and masked batteries, before which all mere human skill and force must stand beaten and baffled. We might well despair of ever mining these Mugra strongholds, did we not rest on the assuring fact, that "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but spiritual; mighty through God."

One of the former worshippers of the Devi, originally a Brahmin, has been baptized by a native missionary of the Free Church at Indapore.

CEYLON.

The missionaries of the American Board remark upon the rebuilding and adorning of temples which they observe to be taking place throughout the island. They think that this may indicate not so much an increase of heathenism, as of wealth. "Still," as one of them says, "it is a progress in the wrong direction."

CHINA.

The Chinese capital appears, at length, to be fully open to the operations of Protestant missions. The Church Missionary and the Propagation Societies, the London Missionary Society, the English Presbyterian Mission, and the American Presbyterian Board, are all represented at Pekin. Three of the missionaries are accompanied by their wives. "The largest personal liberty," writes one of the brethren, "is enjoyed by residents here, and the presence of foreign women does not appear in the least to have disturbed the peace of the capital." The Rev. Joseph Edkins, of the London Society, has established a small preaching-station in a populous part of the city, and a day-school in another.

Mr. Edkins has held frequent communication with the Mongols, both in Pekin (where some of them are settled in monasteries into which the Scriptures have been introduced) and beyond the Great Wall. He has repeatedly found traces among this people of the labours of Messrs. Swan and Stallybrass, who, when stationed in Eastern Siberia, some sixty miles from the frontiers of Chinese Tartary, as missionaries of the London Society, translated the Scriptures into Mongolian, and circulated portions of them in considerable quantities among the Mongol-Buriats. This mission lasted about twenty-five years, and came to a close in 1840, in consequence of the hostile influence which it encountered from Greek ecclesiastics at the Court of St. Petersburg. During his last journey northward, he and his fellow-traveller, the Rev. J. Lees, came in contact with two Russian merchants. Referring to one of these, he says:—

He gave me some interesting particulars respecting our early mission at Selenginak, of which town he is a native. When he was a boy, he knew the families of the English missionaries, and has often seen Shagdur, of whom notices appear in our old magazines. This aged Buriat convert, who on one occasion travelled nearly as far as to Chang-kia-kow as a preacher and distributor of books, was still living, three years ago, when young M. Starstoff was in Selenginak. The missionaries of the Greek Church, who have been labouring for many years among the Buriats, have been joined by some of the converts who were the fruit of the labours of our missionaries, but others have not joined them, preferring to continue as they were. The Greek missionaries have printed books in Mongolian making use of the treatises already prepared by Messrs. Stallybrass and Swan.

On this journey, Messrs. Edkins and Lees proceeded beyond Chang-kia-kow, on the frontier of Tartary and the high road to Russia. They incurred no obstruction, and enjoyed many opportunities of circulating the truths of the Gospel. The country through which they passed presented many objects of deep and varied interest. It is now considered probable that Christian teachers in the north of China will find fewer obstructions to their labours than they have long been accustomed to encounter in the south.

By the death of the Rev. George Smith, of Fuh-chau, the Church Missionary Society has lost a valuable and devoted labourer. His course was a short, but a bright one. He was the first who was ever permitted to obtain a building within the city walls of Fuh-chau for the preaching of the Gospel.

At Canton, the Rev. Mr. Bonney, of the American Board, while distributing tracts, met two persons, who, he found, were themselves tract-distributors. They were Chinese Christians from Poklau, where a Christian was beheaded a year or two since, because he would not bow down to an idol. Having been to Hong-kong, they had brought a box of books with them, thence to distribute in their native districts. Thus the Word of God is spreading into new places. Three American and two English missions at Canton have united in purchasing a plot of ground, east of the city, for a cemetery, upon the stone boundaries of which they have inscribed, "Burial-ground for Christians." "One by one," our brother remarks, "the obstacles in the way of Christian faith and practice are disappearing."

ABYSSINIA.

Intelligence of a most painful kind has been received by the London Society for the Promotion of Christianity among the Jews, as to the cruel treatment of their missionaries Messrs. Stern and Rosenthal. A letter from Mr. Haussman states that as he and those two gentlemen were returning from their mission to the Jewish Falashas—

They called to take leave of the King in the evening just after his supper, a time of the day which, being a breach of the customs of the court, gave great offence. Mr. Stern's address to the King was badly interpreted by his two native followers, and the King became so angry, that he ordered the interpreters to be so severely flogged, that they died in the night. Mr. Stern, under alarm and excitement, happened to bite his fingers. This unhappily is considered in the country as an offensive threat of revenge; and the officers attending on the King having called his attention to it, he ordered poor Mr. Stern also to be cruelly flogged, and then sent him to a tent in chains. Mr. Rosenthal is also in confinement. The British Consul, Captain Cameron, hearing of this, sent for the Rev. Mr. Flad, a German missionary, well acquainted with the vernacular Amharic, and with whom the King was on friendly terms, and they called together on his Majesty; but he refused to see the Consul, and placed him under surveillance. He sent Mr. Flad to request Mr. Stern to apologise for having insulted him in the presence of his subjects. Not being satisfied with the answer, he kept him still in confinement, though without chains, and intended bringing him to trial.

The King allowed Mr. Haussman to leave the country, and it is from this gentleman after his arrival at Khartoum, the above melancholy intelligence has been received. It also appears that the King's anger was increased by finding in Mr. Stern's papers, which were seized and translated, offensive remarks upon him for tyranny and cruelty. The Foreign office have telegraphed to our Consul-General in Egypt to remonstrate with King Theodore. It is doubted, however, whether he will not demand a direct communication from our Foreign Minister. It is also believed that the French Jesuits residing in Abyssinia have encouraged the King in his cruel treatment of the Protestant missionaries.

NORTHERN AFRICA.

Mr. Ben Oliei, of Oran, reports to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews, that in less than four years he has put into circulation in North Africa 4,844 volumes, rather more than half the number being copies of the Scriptures. A difficulty experienced in obtaining suitable colporteurs. He says:—

Three blind Spaniards are occasionally employed. With guitar in hand, they merrily go about the market-places and squares, and from house to house, crying out vociferously the titles of the books confided to them, and they generally return with their full value. But my most trustworthy agents are Jewish hawkers, who are satisfied with a small commission.

WESTERN AFRICA.

From the Gaboon, one of the American missionaries writes that the influence of the Gospel is deepening and spreading around them. An extension of the mission is contemplated. M. Du Chaillu, the well-known traveller, is located at Fernando Vaz, near where is proposed to establish an out-station. "He is friendly," we are told, "and would be glad to do anything in his power to facilitate missionary operations."

Two women were brought into Creek Town, Old Calabar, in chains, in order, according to the cruel native custom, to be killed and buried in the grave of a deceased chief. The custom has been abolished by law, but it was sought on this, as on some other occasions, to revive it. One of the women had an infant at her breast, which she anticipated would perish with her. The missionaries, however, interfered, and succeeded in obtaining the release of the poor creatures, after a ceremony of "chopping blood." The custom of destroying twin children, it appears, still prevails; and a case has occurred in which a mother refused to give her babes nourishment, and insisted that they should be thrown out to perish. They were saved by a humane couple, with whom the people, on that account, became quite angry. It appears that the small-pox is spreading in Old Calabar, and causing great alarm, and that the terrified people are neglecting the sick, and are afraid even to bury the dead.

The Governor of Lagos having, in compliance with the request of the people of Okeodan, raised the British flag there, and taken the place under British protection, urged on the missionaries the desirableness of their occupying it as a station. This they have now done. On the visit of inquiry by the Rev. Mr. Nicholson and another missionary, that gentleman says:—

All expressed their willingness that we should come among them. The King said we were his friends, and, in token of friendship, gave us a fowl and some cowries. We then proceeded outside, where the people were assembled. The Balogun told them we were men of the book, who wished to teach them; they were not to be afraid of us, as we came to hurt none. He said we were not merchants; we had not come to buy and sell; but messengers from God; and though we cared nothing about their gods, yet we should not force them to give up their customs, but would show them a better way, which they could choose if they liked. The people assented to all that was said, and were dismissed. The following day, the 17th, the King sent two chiefs to go with us to select a piece of ground, as much as we thought proper, in any part of the town. We chose a large portion in the highest and most healthy part of the town, which has also the advantage of being near the market.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The organ of the French Protestant Missionary Society believes itself authorised to contradict the report of the death of Dr. Livingstone, in consequence of having received from M. Frédox, a letter, written from Kuruman, and dated November 21, in which no allusion is made to any such mournful event. "It is impossible," says the journal in question, "that our missionary could have been silent on the decease of the illustrious traveller, of whom he is the brother-in-law. He speaks, moreover, of all the family, and we learn that Mr. Moffat was far from being well, and that for several Sundays he has been quite unable to officiate."

MADAGASCAR.

"The Christians continue to increase, in a manner truly gratifying—almost astonishing," writes the Rev. W. Ellis:—

Fresh adhesions to the Gospel, from the ranks of those who have followed the idols, take place every month. I am connected with two of the churches, and last Sunday forty were added to those two by baptism—eighteen at one place, and twenty-two at the other; and last night, at our church meeting at Ambotonakanga, I admitted to our fellowship sixteen or eighteen, including four couples, man and wife, some of them from villages devoted to the idols, and hitherto occupied by none but idol worshippers. During the meeting I learned that, at the village of Amparafaravato, the depository or place of one of the idols, the inhabitants of which were its keepers, a number of them became Christians, set apart a house for worship, and met to worship the true God; that when the Queen heard of it, she said, "If any of the people are Christians, and wish to leave the village, they may do so. It is nothing (meaning there is no blame), let them go. Let those who wish to stay, stay; for there is no impediment to the following the idols, or to uniting with the Christians." And some of those admitted to our church had acted on this word of the Queen, and had joined with us.

It has been determined to proceed with the memorial churches; but building operations are for the present limited to one of the number—both as a matter of precaution and from the want of a sufficiency of skilled workmen. Mr. Sibree, the architect, having arrived from this country, and surveyed the sites, sends his first report, in which he speaks of their picturesque and commanding positions; finer situations, he says, could not have been obtained. He thinks that the original estimate will be exceeded, and that each church will cost from 2,000*l.* to 2,500*l.*

A hospital is to be erected in connexion with the medical mission, conducted by Dr.

Davidson, the Government having already granted a piece of ground for the purpose. The gentleman, during last year, prescribed for three thousand patients; and tens of thousands have sought relief, to whom it was impossible that he could attend.

AUSTRALIA.

The condition of the Chinese resident in the province of Australia has been brought under the notice of the Church Missionary Society by the Bishop of Melbourne. From the bishop's statement it appears that—

They amount to about 25,000, almost entirely men, living in separate villages, or separate street of towns, in different parts of the colony. The greater part are gold-diggers, though a large number of them are engaged in trade; the majority of them are poor, but several persons of wealth and intelligence are to be found amongst them. While at a distance from their own country, they abandon their Chinese prejudices, and are inclined to adopt English customs, and look up to the English as a superior race. They are very willing to receive Christian teaching, and in some places have subscribed to build Christian chapels for themselves; they are, moreover, in the habit (in accordance with a law of the colony) of resting from their work on the Lord's-day. Missionary efforts have been carried on among them since 1855. The mission was at first a combined one, but is now broken up into three; one connected with the Church of England, the others Presbyterian and Wesleyan. The bishop's mission has been carried on hitherto entirely by native agency. A catechist was supplied to him by the Bishop of Victoria, who after several years' labour has now returned to Hong-kong, and has since been admitted into holy orders. Since the departure of Lo-sam-yuen, the evangelistic work has been carried on by his converts, of whom ten have been baptized since the commencement of the mission.

NEW ZEALAND.

Archdeacon Maunsell has remained on the forefront of the late unhappy conflict, at no slight amount of personal hazard, embracing every opportunity of mitigating the horrors of war and seeking the salvation of souls, as well of the British as of the Maori. For some time he remained in a native village, where the enemy, who had possession of the surrounding country, warned him that if he should be found beyond a prescribed boundary, he would be shot. Being thus a kind of prisoner, unable to communicate with the congregations needing his services, he resolved to go where his services were more needed. He therefore proceeded to the camp at Meremere, marched from Meremere to Rangiriri with the troops, and was present during the engagement there.

It lasted [writes the Archdeacon] until four in the morning, when 175 Maories surrendered, their retreat being cut off, and their earth-wall, nine feet thick, having been sapped. Shortly after their surrender, I went over the field of battle, to look after the wounded. I was surprised to find so few dead and so few wounded. Though the English have, up to this time, lost forty-four, they have lost, as far as we can ascertain, only forty-one, of whom four were women, and one a boy. I was gratified to observe the gentleness with which our soldiers carried the wounded. They seemed highly to admire the manliness of the Maories, and the very instant the white flag was hoisted, rushed into the pah and seized them by the hand, exclaiming, "How do you do, Jack?" Their wounded are not more than eight; our wounded came near 100.

The Rev. J. Wallis, a Wesleyan missionary in the Manukau circuit, near Auckland, states that the war has led to the removal of all the native congregations within reach, adding, "I very much fear if we shall ever again be in a position to report either Church members or hearers."

POLYNESIA.

The liberality shown by the native converts in Fiji on occasion of their last annual missionary meetings has delighted, and in some instances astonished, the Wesleyan missionaries. We hear of one place (Lakemba) where 1,810 gallons of oil were contributed, being nearly 1,000 gallons in excess of last year; of a second (Muala), where the contributions would amount to 2,000 gallons, just double the quantity given the previous year; and of a third (Vanua Balavu), which has increased its contributions for the current year by four tons and a-half. "And still we are hearing of increase," writes a missionary. "Our great difficulty has been the few tanks and drums we have had." The missionaries, not having expected such a remarkable display of liberality, were, in fact, unprepared to avail themselves of it; consequently, it was not possible to receive all that the people wished to give.

Several encouraging cases of conversion, and others of tranquil assurance or triumph in the hour of death, are narrated in the journals from Fiji. In one instance, a man who had murdered his wife, and had been a terror on account of his extreme cruelty even among his fellow-heathen, was so changed by the power of the Gospel, that he became an object of love to all who knew him. When dying, some dissolute young men entered his hut, and he

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

THE unhappy war which has broken out between Germany and Denmark still continues. Up to this moment it has been confined to the two races and the limited area of the last kingdom; nor does there appear any symptom of any other country taking part in it. If this state of things should continue, the great calamity of a general European war will be avoided; but we fear it must be at the expense of the ruin of Denmark. Her troops are now driven to bay in the two fortresses of Düppel, in Schleswig, and Fredericia, in Jutland; but the siege of the former is the most closely pressed. Steadily the Germans gain the upper hand, securing one outwork and one vantage ground after another, so that the fall of the place cannot be far distant. The Conference, which the English Government has long laboured to bring about, seems as far distant as ever. Austria and Prussia now openly repudiate the Treaty of 1852, which they signed at the time, and by which, up till now, they professed to be bound; but they say they are still willing to maintain the independence of Denmark and the Duchies under the present King, though forming two separate kingdoms, much as England and Hanover were united during the reigns of the earlier members of the House of Brunswick. But Denmark can only be brought to accede to that measure by force; and so there appears to be no prospect of the termination of hostilities till the weaker nation be wholly subdued. This will not be a satisfactory termination to the Powers of Europe; nor will it be satisfactory to the smaller States of Germany. In the very classes who began the war are mortified beyond expression at the course which has been taken. The Germanic Confederation, in which the minor German States have a powerful voice, is rudely thrust aside as of no account in the struggle; and the Prussian King and Government are now denounced by those classes as intending to use the war in Denmark to crush the liberties of Germany. And just at this critical period, the King of Bavaria, head of the Powers of the second order, is dead, leaving a boy of eighteen to succeed him, while the King of Wurtemberg, a great upholder of the rights of the Confederation, is believed to be at the point of death. Everything makes against the friends of German freedom; events conspire to promote the ends of the German reactionists. So writes our German correspondent, whose letter, we doubt not, expresses truly the views and feelings of German Evangelical Christians; and though we in England reserve our sympathies for the gallant nation whom both parties have attacked, yet we can heartily join with him in the regret that the cause—as we believe, of injustice, as he asserts of despotism—should not be so prosperous.

Turning from the North of Europe to America, we have the same appalling spectacle on a much larger scale. The word "peace" is now more, we think, than at any former time blotted out of the American vocabulary. All parties in the North, agreeing on nothing else, insist upon a vigorous prosecution of the war; the South is as stubbornly bent on resistance as ever. And just now events have fallen out in favour of the Confederates. One good result, however, that may be discerned as arising out of this unhappy state of things is the steady rise of the negro in the scale of social importance. The scarcity of men to fill the Northern army has beaten down the prejudice which was at first as strong in the North as in the South against admitting the negro to the privilege of bearing arms; and we now read of negro regiments being filled by the ladies of New York. Now, though the army may not be a school of piety, there is no doubt at all that it is an excellent school of manhood; and men who have once borne arms in the service of the State can never again be degraded and insulted with impunity. For other facts of importance we must refer to the letter of our New York correspondent.

The state of France, both political and religious, continues to be full of interest. Notwithstanding the mad plot of a few Italians—in which the name of a subordinate member of our own Government has been so awkwardly mixed up—the dynasty of the Empire seems now to be securely established; but no efforts can induce the inhabitants of the capital to support his Government. Two new elections took place within the last ten days, and, though there was at first a division among the Liberal Opposition themselves, this division disappeared before the day of election, and two Liberals, or rather Red fellow-creatures are only to be allowed to think with his permission. Truly this is "exalting himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped."

HOME.

The late decision of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council on the "Essays and Reviews" has stirred the Church of England to its depths. There are clergymen within her pale who openly rejoice in the judgment pronounced, on the ground that it leaves them free to push their speculations and scepticism further than they at first believed to be safe. But in justice to the clergymen of the English Church, it ought to be stated that these are comparatively few. By far the larger portion are struck with dismay at the effects of a judgment which tends to unsettle the things hitherto most surely believed among us. One unexpected effect it has produced—it has effected a reconciliation and a united course of practical action between the High Churchmen and the Evangelicals; such a union as the Church has not before witnessed since that memorable time when the arrest of the seven bishops startled all good men out of their brooding over those matters in which they differed from their neighbours into a contemplation of those higher truths in which they agreed, and on the common basis of which it was needful to repel the common enemy. And it is felt that the crisis is not less dangerous now than it was then, though it now assails us from another quarter. The declaration which has been put forth from Oxford, with the sanction of the leaders of both the great parties in the Church, has been extensively signed, and, to some extent, it will remain a bond of mutual agreement between them, even after, as we may hope, the present peril has passed away. Like the altar-pile erected by the Israelites, divided from their brethren by the Jordan stream, it may serve to remind both parties, in the heats of future controversies, that there was a time when the pressure of a great peril was fronted by them with a declaration of faith in which both could find a common basis of action. Such a memory will not, indeed, obliterate important theological distinctions, nor will it render future contests impossible; but we may surely hope that it will serve to soften animosities and to assuage the bitter heats and feuds which it is of the unhappy nature of theological controversy to engender. For ourselves, indeed, we cannot say that we have any desire to see more than a temporary truce between the Tractarians and the Evangelicals, the views of each continuing as they are; but when we find that even a High Churchman like Archdeacon Denison, as in a recent letter, puts forth the Bible as the great prize for which Churchmen are to contend, as the most precious inheritance of themselves and their children, we gladly hail this approach towards the views and sentiments of the Evangelical body, and recognise in this supreme honour given to God's Word over the compilations of men, however holy, one of those issues of good which even the greatest calamities are sometimes employed to bring about.

The opponents of the endowment of Professor Jowett, to which we have adverted in another column, opposed it mainly on the ground that it tended to separate the Universities from the Church of England. A more decided step towards that end was taken in the House of Commons in the course of the last month. Mr. Dodson, one of the members for Sussex, introduced a bill to allow graduates of the University of Oxford to take fellowships and degrees, without subscribing the formularies of the Church; and this bill came on for a second reading on the 16th of last month. The measure was strenuously opposed by Sir William Heathcote, one of the members for the University, and by nearly the whole Conservative party. On the other hand, it was supported by Mr. Gladstone, the other member for Oxford, and by the Government. There was, however, a difference of opinion between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the promoters of the bill. Mr. Gladstone—and in this he is supported by the other members of the Government—would allow fellowships to be held and degrees to be taken by members of all or of no creed; but in order to have a voice in the government of the University, he stipulates for some declaration that the person seeking it is a bona fide member of the Church of England. This would make Oxford on a par with Cambridge, where some course equivalent to that has been voluntarily adopted by the members of the University themselves. Mr. Dodson and his friends did not show much anxiety to adopt that suggestion; and their reluctance somewhat injured their cause; nevertheless on a division, the second reading of this bill was carried by a large majority. But the opposition is not yet at an end.

This is the only discussion at all partaking of a theological nature which has yet occurred this session. The swarms of questions affecting the Church and Dissenters the

DAY OF SPECIAL PRAYER.

Invitation to Christian Parents in all Countries, to set apart Tuesday, the 12th of April next, for Special United Prayer for their Children.

The Committee of the Evangelical Alliance are induced to issue this Invitation, after much consideration and prayer on the subject, in consequence of a suggestion made by the chairman (Captain Trotter) of one of the meetings held in Freemasons' Hall during the Week of Prayer in January last, on account of the numerous requests continually sent in for the conversion of children of believing parents. These requests made it evident that such an Invitation would be very warmly and extensively welcomed, and that a large number of deeply-trying Christian parents would, under God's gracious blessing, derive incalculable comfort and strength from the united special prayer which it proposes. Nor could it be doubted that a measure of this kind, which enlisted the sympathies, and obtained the approbation, of Christian parents in London, would be equally prized by Christian parents throughout Great Britain and other countries.

Special meetings are therefore by this Invitation convened for the morning and evening of TUESDAY, THE 12TH OF APRIL NEXT, AT FREEMASONS' HALL, for the purpose of offering up solemn intercession on behalf of the children of pious parents. Parents especially are invited to attend, in the persuasion that, as they only can know the anxieties of a parent's heart, they will the more tenderly, and with the greater readiness, "bear one another's burdens" in this respect, "and so fulfil the law of Christ." The morning meeting will commence at eleven, and the evening meeting at seven.

It is suggested, that on the same day similar meetings should be held, wherever practicable, in towns and villages, and in private circles; and that at domestic worship in all Christian families more than ordinary attention should be drawn to the subject. If, in any case, the day mentioned should be unsuitable, another day can be substituted.

The suggestion is also offered, that clergymen and ministers of the Gospel might, in some instances—where, for example, there is a service on that evening—make special reference to it in their addresses and prayers; and that in other cases they might previous Lord's-day bring it before the congregations.

It is unnecessary to advert to the in which the proposed meetings may be conducted; still less would it be desirable to lay down a model to which all should be formed. Christian prudence will in the conduct be sufficient for the occasion, under the guidance of the Word of God, and the promised help of the Holy Spirit. It is suggested that, while prayer is the object of the meetings, in the intervals of prayer and praise suitable portions of the Sacred Scriptures should be read, and brief practical remarks on the responsibilities and encouragements of parents should be offered by ministers or experienced Christians. To afford some assistance to those who may undertake these parts of the service, a few Scripture texts, with their subjects, are arranged, and may be had on application to the official Secretaries.

It only remains for the Committee to commend the subject to the previous prayerful and thoughtful consideration of the members, and to express their own devout desire that the Invitation may be generally accepted and acted upon. May the presence and blessing of "the Comforter, which is the Holy Spirit," be graciously vouchsafed to all the members.

WEEK OF PRAYER.

Gratifying communications have been received of the extensive observance of the Week of Prayer at the commencement of this year, and the blessed results which appear already to have followed. On no previous occasion was there so general a circulation of the annual Invitation, both in near and distant lands, and it was warmly responded to. It is hoped that, in due time, yet more abundant blessings will appear, encouraging believers to have more perseverance, assured that such special, united prayer, simultaneous pleading before God can apparent that July will be a preferable month to October. In the beginning, therefore, of that month our friends in the northern capital will be prepared to receive us; and they hold out to us a cordial Christian welcome. It would be too premature to indicate in detail the transactions and various subjects with which the Conference, when it assembles, will be occupied; but almost the slightest reflection on the actual condition of Christianity and of Christian Churches throughout the world, on the antagonistic forces arrayed against some of the most precious doctrines of revealed religion, and on the ever-enlarging sphere of missionary operations, and the ever-augmenting force of the motives to undertake and carry them forward, will be sufficient to shadow forth the line of things along which it will have to take its course.

This early notice will, we trust, be serviceable, by enabling our friends, in looking forward to the summer, to make such arrangements as may consist with their attending the Conference.

MEETING OF THE ALLIANCE AT BERLIN.

This meeting took place on the 10th March, in the Hall of the Evangelical Verein, and was numerously attended. Amongst those present were his Royal Highness Prince Alexander of Prussia, his Highness Prince Henry XIII. of Reuss, Count von Sedlnitzky, formerly Roman Catholic Prince Bishop of Breslau, and now one of the most zealous promoters of all Evangelical operations in Berlin; General von Wildenbruch, formerly Prussian Ambassador in Constantinople; General von Stern, Rev. Dr. Nitzsch, Provost of Berlin; Rev. Dr. Krummacher, besides a large number of the clergy both of the city and its vicinity. Above all, the meeting was signally honoured by the presence of HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN, who, on her reception by the Committee, assured them of the lively interest and sympathy which she had always felt in the Evangelical Alliance. The meeting was opened by prayer offered up by the Rev. Dr. Arndt, the senior pastor of Berlin, and was addressed by the Rev. Professor Messner, the Secretary, on the past history, the principles, and prospects of the Alliance. He also took occasion to pronounce a warm eulogy on the character of our own late President, Sir Culling Eardley, and commended his successor in this office, the Right Hon. Lord Calthorpe, to the prayers and confidence of the German members of the Alliance. He was followed by Count von Kanitz, who, as a member of the recent Spanish Deputation, gave an account of its proceedings. The meeting was then addressed by the Rev. General Superintendent Dr. Hoffmann, on the state of the Protestant Armenian Churches in Turkey, and concluded in the usual manner. We cannot but express our earnest belief that this gratifying and distinguished meeting is an indication that the Alliance is making hopeful progress in Germany.

NEW APPOINTMENTS IN THE GENEVA COMMITTEE OF THE ALLIANCE.

... Will you kindly communicate to the Committee that, according to the new regulation, adopted last year, our managing committee has at the beginning of January been reconstructed. The three outgoing members who are not immediately re-eligible are Dr. Merle D'Aubigné, M. Gautier, and myself, and are replaced by Pasteur Barde (who has been elected President for three years), M. Max Perrot, and M. Galopin. I am, therefore, no longer President. That office I held for ten years, during which time I have, through God's goodness, seen the work and the position of the Alliance growing and extending in Europe. I regret, however, that I have not seen in my country, the brotherly love among Christians making such progress as I could have desired.

May the Lord bless the efforts of my successor in that direction, who is so much better qualified than I.

With regard to the anniversary of the death of Calvin, it has been decided that a public Conference shall be held on Friday, May 27, when Pasteur Viguet will deliver the inaugural address. He will be followed by various Genevese and foreign speakers.

On Sunday, May 29, there will be special sermons in the National Churches. It has not yet been decided how the intervening Saturday shall be occupied.

A circular will be addressed by the Geneva Committee to the different Foreign Committees of the Evangelical Alliance, communicating to them the detailed arrangements, and expressing the gratification and joy which we should feel in seeing some representatives of their committees taking part in the proceedings.

Among others, our Committee will publish a "Chrestomathie," or selected parts of the various works of Calvin, in one volume, in order to make the people better acquainted with some of the finest parts of the works of the Reformer.

The plan of erecting a large Memorial Hall will be carried out by a special committee, unconnected with the Alliance. That committee is most active, and was on the point of taking important steps, when it lost its chairman, my brother, Gabriel Naville. However, it is so strong and influential, that it will not be hindered by this loss.

The executive committee of the Geneva Evangelical Alliance for 1864 consists of the following persons: M. le Pasteur Barde, President; M. le Pasteur Demole, M. le Pasteur Viguet, Vice Presidents; M. le Professeur Tissot, Secretary; M. Geisendorf, Treasurer; M. Goudet, M. Lenoir, M. Max Perrot, and M. Galopin, Members of the Executive Committee.

strengthen more and more the ties between our Churches and our countries.—Believe me, &c., &c.,

LETTER FROM MATAMOROS.

In laying the following letter before the members of the Alliance, we deem it right to let them know—and we are sure they will be gratified by the information—that we have received many testimonials to the piety and continued steadfastness both of the writer and of his late companions in tribulation. We believe that in their exile they are maintaining, through the grace of God, the consistency of their Christian character, and pursuing their Christian usefulness. Matamoros still possesses the confidence of the Paris Committee, under whose auspices he is now occupied in Evangelical labours among the Spaniards in Bayonne:—

Bayonne, February 25, 1864.

You know, dear brother, what painful and most unexpected disappointments have filled my heart with bitter grief since I left my prison, and strength has failed me to write more frequently to you. I owe to you personally so many many consolations during the years of my imprisonment, and the whole of Spain is so deeply indebted to the pious zeal of your society, that it would have been otherwise a delight and comfort to my heart to have more frequently written to you.

The state of the public mind in Spain presents a most gratifying aspect; our religious centres are daily more animated by an ardent zeal, which shows the blessing and grace which God bestows upon them.

The Bishop of Pampluna issued, some weeks ago, a pastoral letter against me, announcing to his diocese that I was at Bayonne, and warning his people of the “dangers by which they were surrounded.” This pastoral has had a remarkable effect. Many Spaniards who are favourable to religious liberty, or who share my faith in our blessed Redeemer, did not know where I resided. They have learnt it through the Bishop of Pampluna, and since then I have received numerous letters from Madrid, Barcelona, Cadiz, Valencia, Seville, and other places, protesting energetically against the proceedings of the said bishop, and offering me their co-operation and services. Add to this that the Churches in Andalusia grow and are confirmed in the faith, and you will understand all my delight and hope in Him, to whom be all the honour and glory. . . .

About a fortnight ago I began a work among the Spanish residents here. I have held my first meetings, which have been blessed by God. May He grant that my domiciliary visits may lead many to the foot of the Cross, and that soon we may have a Spanish Church in Bayonne. I cannot tell you with what delight the Spaniards receive the Word of life and peace.

My health, though much better than when I was in prison, is still weak; however, I h with God's blessing, I shall in time recover it

Farewell, and may the Lord continue to pro and bless the great work which the Evange Alliance is carrying on with so much zeal love. May He strengthen and illuminate you.

My affectionate and brotherly regards to all members of your society, to whom poor S owes so much.

PERSECUTION OF BAPTISTS IN RUSSIA AND POLAND.

The Committee have been gratified by ceiving a letter from the Rev. James I lard, Secretary of the Baptist Union, enclo the following resolution passed at the quarterly meeting of their Committee:—

That the grateful acknowledgments of Committee be cordially offered to the Comm

RADIANT CHARACTERS.

ONE of the most precious books in the world is in the University Library at Upsala, in Sweden. Even outwardly it is beautiful, in its exquisite binding. It is a copy of the Gospels translated into the old mother Gothic, 1,200 years before Luther translated them into that modern Gothic called German—the version which the good Bishop Ulphilas made nearly as far back as the Council of Nicea, a sort of early protest or prophecy on behalf of the Teuton race, showing that they would always insist on having, in their own vernacular, God's great message to mankind.

The Gospels are written in silver letters, some of them golden, on fine sheets of purple velum, in a bold, clear hand. And so says the apostle to his believing friends, "Ye are the epistle of Christ, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshly tables of the heart." A Christian is a golden epistle, a silver gospel, a Codex argenteus. If you want to know what a Christian ought to be, he is an epistle with Christ's own thoughts and feelings so transferred to his, as to come out again to be known and read of all men: a man who, when outraged or ill-used, carries it so nobly, that in his soft answer or his silence you read, "Blessed are the meek:" a man whose hand opens so easily, and whose movement towards all distress is so instinctive, that, when you look at him, you read, "Blessed are the merciful:" a man to whom God is so endeared and so nigh, that in his company you understand the preface to the Lord's prayer, "Our Father who art in heaven." It is often asked, "What tracts can you recommend? Would we not be the better of some fresh and striking book explaining and enforcing real religion?" Perhaps we would; but the greatest want of all is living epistles. By all means go on scattering by the way-side your tracts, and lending to your neighbour your books; but there is a desideratum yet greater. Let all of us try—those who profess religion and those who wish to begin—let all of us seek to become one of those rare and invaluable publications which, when the Spirit of the Living God writes and sets it a-circulating, is usually more effective than preached or printed sermons—a living letter and a shining one—immortal truths in radiant characters, clear, vivid, unmistakable. This suggests the first thing needful. If you would shine, you must be shone upon; if you would be bright to others, God must be dear to you; and this, I fear, is our great defect. We come near enough to God to know that He is powerful—to know that He is wise: nay, we come near enough to know that He is just, and true, and holy; but who comes near enough to know how kind He is, how abundant in mercy? God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all, and His benevolence radiates through the universe, blessing every creature which it reaches and which does not wilfully shut it out.

Towards our world, and all round it, that benevolence radiates; and although it is met by the all-encircling atmosphere of alienation and enmity, through the thick cloud of man's sin the Incarnation has effected an opening, and down through the crevice God keeps shining, and showing that He still is love. Down through the ample aperture, along the avenue by which the advent was effected, and through which an atoning Saviour ascended—down through that rent in man's rebellion made by the coming and the going of the Son of God, essential Deity keeps shining, and the Goshen thus created, the bright and glittering oasis amidst the surrounding gloom, is called the Gospel—a region clear and lovely, for there is no night there—

God is there pure light, all grace together, and in Him no darkness at all. But we are so foolish and unwise. We pray God to cause His face to shine upon us, and will not go where that face is shining—already shining, always shining; but at best we come near, we come into the border land or twilight; from our and comfortless limbo we peer forth on the children of the day, and exclaim, "Blessed is the people, O Lord, who walk in the light of thy countenance," forgetting that there is no enclosure round that territory—that it is an absolute common, open and free to all the sons of men—much a Gospel for us as for John the Divine. Or if we venture further—if we step across on the faithful saying—we are apt to put up some enormous parasol scriptural, but metaphysical—we are apt to take refuge under some doctrine of our own or some fear or fancy of our own; and then we grieve that we do not share blessedness or feel the comfort which others speak of; or for a moment we do feel but falling into some sin, we are hurried off again into unbelief—we leave the altar and rush back beneath our old murky covert of guilt and estrangement, and find that still God is.

The Gospel rightly understood and steadily believed would fill our hearts with abiding peace and joy. Not only would it enable us to live without carefulness it would give a new energy and elasticity to all our character; and a religion full of happiness, because full of God, would have a wonderful effect on beholders. The shining love of John, the burning and shining zeal of Paul, were a splendid comment on their words, and have caused the way of God to be known on earth better than arguments of all the schoolmen. The shining holiness and far-reaching fervor of Swartz and Eliot and Zinzendorf made known to entire communities the way of salvation—the saving health of God. The shining sanctity of Fenelon sent us from under his roof the scoffing Earl of Peterborough, with the exclamation "I must not stay here, or I shall become a Christian in spite of myself," and the shining generosity of Henry Thornton led some one to remark, "It is not Boyle and Bampton lectures that are wanted to convert the world: it was a thousand Henry Thorntons."

CALVIN: "THE CHRISTIAN INSTITUTES."

"THE 'Christian Institutes,'" says Bungener, "is more than a book; it is an important part of Calvin's life; or, still better, a part, if not the whole, of Calvin himself." It is, we may add, more than any book of the sixteenth century, an historical record of the spirit, the faith, the theology, of the men who, under God, effected the Reformation. If you would know how the Protestants of that time felt and thought—if you would penetrate the secret of that strength which confronted exile, torture, death—which gave serene endurance to the martyrs of Lyons, and woke the echoes of hymns in the dungeons of the Chatelet—if you would understand what was the truth which Protestant Europe asserted in opposition to the system of Popery—and study the "Christian Institutes" of Calvin. The book is an image of the whole age, revealing its defects as well as its greatness, its darkness as well as its light, and enabling us to say with decision wherein we have fallen below the standard of our fathers, and wherein we have risen above it.

Take the best and greatest of Christian men, place him beside the Christ, the type of perfection, Jesus of Nazareth, and you will see his infinite inferiority. Take the greatest of uninspired Christian books, and we are inclined to agree with the late Dr. William Cunningham, of Edinburgh, that the "Christian Institutes" of Calvin occupies the first place in theological literature—it is beside the Word of God, the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments.

and its measureless inferiority will be evident enough to humble the pride of human intellect. When we look upon this work of Calvin's we are ever impressed anew with the comprehensiveness of its plan, with the symmetry yet massiveness of its proportions, with the energy and fervour of its language, with the tremendous power of its logic. But there is something in its mere intellectual elevation, sustained through so many chapters, which oppresses the mind—a monotony of grandeur which is too much for ordinary human faculties. Those powers of the mind which cannot without pain be kept long upon the stretch—the powers of reason, of judgment, of logic—are called into severe and constant operation; no dews of sentiment, no flowers of fancy, relieve the intellectual toil. An inexpressible intensity of emotional fervour burns, also, from its first page to its last; the tone is always that of impassioned devotion, and of prophet-like earnestness; scarcely one soft strain mingles with its terrible music; scarcely does one brook meander through its domain of iron rock and giant mountain. This is no book for children or wayfaring men. How great the difference when we turn to the Bible! No monotony there, not even a monotony of truth. The unity of the Book does not consist in that it bears throughout the impress of supreme human intellect, nor in that it displays an unvarying intensity of impassioned feeling. The unity of the Bible is something far subtler than these: a Presence which dwells in each of its component parts; which presides over the historical narrative, the prophetic warning, the didactic treatise; which inspires the raptures of the psalmist and the pleadings of the apostle. God is everywhere in the Bible. Whatever the theme, we are never out of sight of the altar-flame and the incense-smoke. This is a real unity, and we all feel that the Bible is one Book; but it is a unity which embraces as much variety as the providence of God, of which it is the record. It has that which suits every grade of human intellect, every diversity of mental constitution. Tried by any standard, it is the most interesting book in the world. The simplicities of patriarchal life, beautiful as the green hills and dales of Palestine in the grey dawn of human history; the inimitable idyllic poetry of such narratives as that of Joseph and that of Ruth; the unequalled sublimity of the Exodus, the dividing of the Red Sea, the smiting of the rock, the deliverance of the law, the conquest of Canaan; the profound significance of the history of the chosen people; the spiritual poetry of the Psalms; the terrible grandeur or majestic beauty of the prophetic writings; the New Testament, that "higher strain," to which foregoing revelation had been but the prelude, in which He who, at the fall, had departed from man, is seen once more as Immanuel, God with us: these are what we have in the Bible; these, apart from all theories of inspiration, set the Bible as far above all other books as the heavens are above the earth. And do we not feel that there is more in the Bible than can possibly be systematised and exhausted by human intellect? There is an indissoluble association between its form and the effect it has upon the human spirit. You may survey a country with unexceptionable accuracy; you may collect from its every district appropriate specimens of its rocks, its herbs, its fruits, its trees, its soils, its metals; you may arrange these on the best principles of method, and present an epitome of the whole territory within the walls of a museum; but is there not a difference, which may be called infinite, between the collection of specimens and the country? When we have bestowed the highest commendation upon Calvin's "Institutes of the Christian Religion," we must still maintain that the relation it bears to the Bible is that of a museum to a country, or rather to a world.

These remarks may not be without importance at a time when some men are so jealous of their systems, that they hardly endure to be told that they must not be exalted above, or put in the place of, but rigorously subordinated to, the Word of God.

The corruption into which the Church of Rome had sunk in the commencement of the sixteenth century may be comprehensively but not incorrectly summed up in a single word. Man, aided by the saints, the Virgin, the Church, and with perhaps some indirect assistance from Christ, had been made his own saviour. True, the Church had never adopted formally into her dogmatic scheme the Pelagian substitution of man for God in the work of redemption; but unsophisticated men, perplexed with intercessors as numerous as the deities of Olympus, offered the pardon of their sins by the Church for so much money, accustomed to see their priests presenting the sacrifice of the mass for the remission of sins, familiar with the idea that a multitude of saints had not only obtained their own salvation by force of meritorious works, but were able to spare a good deal of merit wherewith to pave the way to heaven for others, had lost all conception of the divinely-revealed method of salvation. Luther, having, first of all, found peace for his own soul by faith in Christ without the works of the law, was naturally horror-struck by the traffic in indulgences. He could not but see that the spiritual guides of the people were substituting a Satanic lie for God's truth. He lifted up his voice, denounced indulgences, and declared that justification is not of works, but of faith. Justification by faith in the Lord Jesus, and by faith alone, was the doctrine on which he built the Lutheran Church. Calvin passed, as we saw, through the spiritual crisis of conversion substantially in the same manner as Luther; but from the philosophical cast of Calvin's mind, from its unrivalled comprehensiveness, from its intellectual calmness and balance, he naturally viewed justification by faith, not with an emphasis excluding other points, but in connexion with the remaining truths of revelation. For seven years after his conversion, besides, he appears to have devoted himself with unflagging earnestness to the study of Scripture, and he would thus be prevented from laying disproportionate weight upon any one truth revealed in God's Word. "The great heresy," says one of the greatest of modern theologians, "which might be said to have overspread the Church for many centuries, was in substance this, that the salvation of sinful men, in so far as they might need salvation, was to be ascribed not to the one true God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, but to men themselves, and to what they could do, or to what could be done for them by their fellow men and other creatures. This, more or less fully developed, was the great heresy which lay under the whole elaborate externalism of the mediæval and Roman religion. Almost everything that is distinctive, either in the specific tenets and practices, or in the more general features and tendencies, of the full-blown Popery with which the Reformers had to contend, might be traced back, more or less directly, to this great principle; while, on the other hand, almost all the particular features of the system tended to deepen and strengthen in men's minds the comprehensive heresy in which they had their root and origin. Calvin saw that the most effectual way of dealing with this great perversion of the way of salvation—so well fitted to lead men to build upon a false foundation their hopes of heaven—the only way to overturn it root and branch, to demolish at once the whole height of the superstructure and the whole depth of the foundation—was to bring out fully and definitely the whole doctrine of Scripture concerning the place held in the salvation of sinners by the Father, by the Son, and by the Holy Ghost. He made it his great object to bring out and to embody the whole doctrine of Scripture upon these subjects, and accordingly Calvinism is just a full exposition and development of the sum and substance of what is represented in Scripture, as done for the salvation of sinners by the Three Persons of the Godhead."

The "Institutes of the Christian Religion" occupied Calvin, more or less, during his whole life. There is a dispute as to whether the first edition was in Latin or French, and as to whether it was published in 1535 or 1536. The matter is unportant, but the probability seems to be that a French edition appeared in the former year. No copy of that edition, however, is known to be in existence. The first which remains to us is in Latin, and was issued at Basle, in 1536. It is described by Bungener as an octavo volume of some 500 pages, containing only six chapters. These bore the following titles:—

- I. Of the Law (Explanation of the Decalogue).
- II. Of Faith (Explanation of the Apostles' Creed).
- III. Of Prayer (Explanation of the Lord's Prayer).
- IV. Of the Sacraments (Baptism and the Lord's Supper).
- V. Of the Sacraments (Falsity of the five added by Rome).
- VI. Of Christian Liberty (Ecclesiastical Power, Civil Administration, &c.).

The latest edition published during Calvin's lifetime contains eighty chapters, and hardly a trace is retained of this early arrangement; but it is agreed by all that the scheme of doctrinal truth presented in the first sketch was substantially the same as that elaborated in the last. In a few words addressed to the reader after he had put his final touches to the work, Calvin declares that, astonished by the favourable reception which the first edition met with, he had spared himself no labour in improving each edition as it was called for, but that he was never satisfied until the book assumed the arrangement now exhibited. He says that, in the preceding winter, when suffering from a fever which would, he thought, prove fatal, the more the disease had gained upon him, the more assiduously had he applied himself to the work. This was written about five years before his death. There is therefore an almost literal truth in Bungener's words, that the "Institutes of the Christian Religion" forms an important part of Calvin's life, nay, of Calvin himself.

This great book is divided into four parts. The first treats of the knowledge of God the Creator; the second, of the knowledge of God the Redeemer, as set forth, to the fathers, in the law, and to us in the Gospel; the third, of the mode in which the grace of Christ is accepted, the fruits it produces, and the consequences which follow; the fourth, of the external means and appliances by which God invites us into fellowship with Christ and retains us therein. God, and the temple of God: God the Creator, God the Redeemer, God the Regenerator, and the Church, which is God's dwelling-place on earth: such is the scope of this magnificent work. It is impossible to estimate the advantage of contemplating the scheme of salvation, as Calvin here contemplates it, in relation to the unity of God. Man is not saved by three Gods, but by one God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; Creator, Redeemer, Sanctifier. The very idea of an opposition of will between the Father and the Son—the very idea that one Divine Person represents wrath and another Divine Person represents mercy—is thus excluded. From the love of the Triune God, the whole work of redemption proceeds. To bring salvation to sinners, without insult to the Divine attributes or infraction of the moral law of the universe, was the work in which all the persons of the Godhead combined. The Father vindicated justice through love; the Son manifested love in fulfilling the demands of justice; the Spirit brought justice and love, righteousness and holiness, to meet in the soul of the redeemed.

In the first book of the "Institutes," which contains eighteen chapters, and is in itself a volume of considerable size, Calvin traverses the field of natural religion. He starts with the principle that almost the entire sum of wisdom, so far as it can be called true and solid wisdom, consists in the knowledge of God and the knowledge of ourselves. That is a profound and an everlasting truth, a truth which—in these days of physical science, when

Philosophy that leaned on heaven before Sinks to her second cause, and is no more,

when men devote attention to God's works rather than to Himself, and, finding satisfaction for intellect and spirit in the secrets of the material world beneath the feet, "cull simples with their backs turned to the stars"—requires to be loudly proclaimed. The nobleness, the greatness of man, are bound up for ever with his earnest, awestruck recognition of his own spiritual nature, and of his relation to the Divine Spirit. Reverence for God and reverence for himself, these must come first with man; we shall then add, as Goethe wisely adds, reverence for all that is below himself in the order of creation, devout reverence for every work of God, down to the wing of the smallest insect, to the filament of the weed that rocks backward and forward in the remotest cave of the sea. But first there must be the two higher reverences; and we shall find that ages have been great and memorable just in proportion as they have exhibited reverence for God and reverence for man. Calvin points out how the knowledge of God and the knowledge of man are connected; how, in knowing our own weakness and want, we rise to a conception of the Divine fulness; and how, in looking up to the Sun of the moral universe, we perceive our own sinfulness and folly. It may, however, be justly affirmed that Calvin, absorbed in the contemplation of God, did not adequately consider the human term in his twofold classification of true and solid knowledge. In his adoring exaltation of God, he appears sometimes to sink man into nothingness. True, he recollects that man was formed originally in the image of God; true, he affirms that "the image of God in man was not by the fall altogether extinguished and destroyed;" but he does not enough reflect that the remaining traces of this original image, "confused, broken, tainted" though they are, are recognised by Scripture as affording man a light and a law, both from heaven. Hence a prevailing gloom throughout the work, a sombreness and solemnity of tone, in marked contrast to the placid faith and serene joyfulness of Scripture. Had the Christian religion been originally proclaimed in the form of Calvin's "Institutes," it would not have been called Good Tidings.

Let us, however, not be misunderstood. What we now say of Calvin's "Institutes" would apply to any epitome of Scripture drawn up by the hand of man. The partiality might be displayed in a different way from that in which this work is partial, but we may be quite sure that any human representation of scriptural truth will be partial. There is a blending of truth and love in the Bible which is inimitable within the limits of human system. There is a spontaneity of utterance in all that the writers of the Bible declare in reference either to the benevolence or the terrors of God, which imparts to its declarations a tone altogether different from that which they can have when shown in connexion with a particular set of logical principles, however sacred and august those principles may be. When this is said it will be difficult to signalise any statement of Scripture which Calvin has either omitted or misrepresented. If he denounces the pride of man and accepts from Augustine the assertion that the first, the second, and the third thing in true religion is humility—if he goes as far as language enables him in proclaiming the degradation into which man has fallen by sin—his object in emptying humanity of glory is that it may be filled with the glory of God. If he dwells upon the ruin effected by the fall, it is only in order that he may bring out in more vivid beauty, against this dark background, the glorious figure of man redeemed and renewed in Christ. Two things, also, must be borne in mind, as having an important bearing on this matter. The first is, that it is only in relation to the justice and holiness of God, only in respect of possessing merit in the sight of the Almighty, that Calvin degrades man; the second is, that Calvin not only admits the existence of natural virtue, but insists that man's natural gifts and graces are remnants of the Divine image, are due to the operation of the Spirit, and ought to be admired, honoured, and made use of by believers. He distinguishes between these, the most excellent works of the Creating and the effects wrought on the soul of the believer by the operation of the ing Spirit. Only in Christ can man possess merit in the eye of God. But ks of the Creator, the works of that Spirit in whom we live, and move, and ir being, are not to be despised. "So often," exclaims Calvin "as k into profane writers, let us be admonished by that light of hich shines forth admirably in them, that the mind of man, however much ave fallen and been perverted from its integrity, is still clothed and adorned cellent gifts of God. If we consider the Spirit of God the sole fountain of e shall neither reject nor condemn that truth, wherever it appears; unless se to be contemptuous to the Spirit of God. For the gifts of the Spirit are iled, without contempt and opprobrium of the Spirit himself. What! e deny that truth shone upon those ancient jurists who set forth with so rrectness the order and discipline of civil life? Shall we say that philoso- ive been blinded both in their exquisite contemplation of nature and in their description of her beauties? Shall we say that capacity was wanting to those laborating the art of discourse, have taught us to speak in accordance with . . . Shall we deem anything praiseworthy, anything glorious, without ledging that it proceeds from God? Let us be ashamed of such ingratitude, ich the heathen poets did not fall, who declare that philosophy, laws, and all s, were inventions of the gods." In point of fact, whatever may have been the mpressed by Calvin upon social existence as we find it subsequently regu- him in Geneva, the doctrine of the "Institutes" respecting all that is naturally . this world satisfies every requirement of the nineteenth century. It is that all the arts which exalt and beautify life—poetry, painting, sculpture, are at once, by the foregoing passage, not only made lawful for Christians, rned with celestial honour and commended to regard, as illustrating, with a and comprehensiveness second only to their illustration in the scheme mption, the wisdom, the might, and the beneficence of God. Nor did Calvin a less lively sensibility to the loveliness which has been spread by the Creator t external world. He lays down the principle that it is right to make use of ift of God for that purpose which He has adapted it to serve. The question ked is, what was the Divine intention in each instance? "Now," proceeds "if we reflect for what purpose food was created, we shall find that He to consult not only our necessity, but our delight and hilarity. So also, in esides necessity, He proposed to Himself as an end comeliness and dignity. s, trees, and fruits, besides their various uses, we have grace of aspect and ness of odour, benefits bestowed on us by God, unless we are to deny that phet regards as Divine benefits the wine which makes glad the heart of man, which causes his face to shine. Were this not so, the Scriptures would not laces mention, with a view to commending the benignity of God, that He hath ll things of this kind to men. And the natural qualities of things are in ves sufficient demonstration for what end and in how far they are to be l. Did God indeed impart such fairness to flowers, fairness which appeals of accord to the eye, such delightfulness of fragrance, which naturally pleases the smell, and is it a sin that the eye is charmed with beauty, and that the sense l experiences the gratefulness of odour? What! Has not the Lord distin- l between colours, in order that some might be more agreeable than others? Has He not given grace to gold and silver, to ivory and marble, in order y might be rendered more precious than other metals or stones? In one word, how few not many things worthy of commendation for us, beyond what relate to mere necessity? Let that inhuman philosophy, therefore, begone, which, in conceding to man none but the necessary use of God's creatures, not only malignantly deprives us of lawful fruition of the Divine beneficence, but cannot have its way without reducing man, spoiled of all his senses, into a log."

We confess our inability to express or to conceive more liberal sentiments upon the subject than those which inspire these noble words. They include all that is good; they exclude only what is evil. On these principles, the sympathy of the Christian may go out into every province of the universe where falls the light of beauty and of truth. At first sight it appears that Calvin must have deviated in practice from the largeness of his theory. Common representations of the way in which he governed Geneva through the century are almost appalling, from the Spartan rigour and ascetic gloom with which they make us acquainted. It is, of course, possible that Calvin was inconsistent, and that the "philosophy" declared to be "inhuman" in his writings was enforced in the city where his influence was supreme. But no one who has formed the slightest idea of what Calvin was can regard this as likely. The more probable hypothesis is, that the common representations are incorrect, and that the secret of his rule in Geneva has not been penetrated. The question will deserve careful consideration in the sequel. We confess that we have not arrived at an unalterable opinion upon the matter; meanwhile, it is sufficient to observe that in the "Christian Institutes," in which the theological system of Calvin is understood, and justly understood, to be presented in its utmost austerity, the natural virtues of man are recognised as good, and the glory and tenderness of nature are sympathetically exalted. Whether we shall enter with Calvin into the Christian temple, or whether we shall forbear, it is plain that he does not bid us shut our eyes to the temple of nature. No man can find more in God's world than Calvin, if he seeks the Good, the True, the Beautiful, and turns only from sin.

After all, however, the distinctive work effected in the "Christian Institutes" is the exhibition of what the Triune God performs for man in the scheme of redemption. Century after century, human inventions had been obscuring the simple method of the Gospel, and the pile had at length obtained dimensions so vast as to blot the light of the Sun of Righteousness from the heavens. Calvin swept the whole away, and once more revealed God as the architect of salvation. It is for this reason that the book is an epitome of the Reformation, and that it best represents what Calvin did for mankind. We deem it, therefore, appropriate that, in a series of papers intended as a slight but sincere contribution to the literature of the Calvin tercentenary, the central article of the whole, that published in the month when, three hundred years ago, Calvin passed from among men, should have been devoted to a particular consideration of the "Institutes of the Christian Religion."

P. B.

THE ORIENTAL CHURCHES OF SYRIA, AND THE LABOURS OF PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES.

It was not long after the year 1820 that the first labours of Protestant missionaries began in Syria. Those labours, commenced by Fisk, King, Bird, and Nicolayson, have been carried on by others to the present time. But from that small commencement has arisen a large number of foreign missionaries and native agents. With increasing experience, with new resources and agencies, and with the advancement of religious liberty, they now occupy the most important posts in the country, from Jerusalem to Aleppo. Some of the missionaries have been remarkable men. Among

to have departed, to rest from their labours, and receive the rich reward of id among the living, there are names which have won the highest respect and rom the natives of the country, and of those religious men abroad who have r eye upon the work of the Gospel in the interesting land of its birth and first ment. Of the former, it is enough to mention the name of the Rev. Dr. th, the learned Biblical scholar and devoted Christian missionary. Pos- rare order of mental powers, profound learning, a sound and unusually id, and a piety of the deepest and most solid character, he devoted them all, 7 years, to the service of Christ. Respected in his day as hardly any other in this country, the future alone can tell of all the usefulness of his labours. ler the general name of Oriental Churches are included the Greeks, the es, the Greek Catholics, the Armenian Catholics, and the Syrian Catholics. ey number about 400,000 souls in Syria. It will be observed that, with the 1 of the first, all the other denominations are in communion with the of Rome. Seduced by the wiles of Rome to acknowledge its supremacy, ded from other communions in bygone ages. The Maronites boast of their faith from the earliest history of their Church; but it is certain, however, ouncing the Monothelite heresy, which they had held from the seventh to the close of the twelfth, they united with the Church of Rome in the the Crusaders. Notwithstanding all this length of time, and all their perience of the dealings of Rome, the Maronites have, of all the others, e deepest of that cup which the Papacy holds out to those who have com- with her. On the other hand, the Greek Catholic denomination—one of t accessions to the Roman Church—is that which is least devoted to Rome. se denominations are allowed to use their own ancient, though slightly liturgy, their ecclesiastical language, and their own independent Church tion. They are thus independent Church communities, who are connected h other only by their general connexion with the Papal Church and theology. e Greek Church, again, regarded by the Romish communions as schismatic tical, stands aloof from them, proud in the pretension that it is the primitive from which the Papacy has seceded in its love for supremacy and innova- d fanatically infatuated with the idea that all orthodoxy and Christian ; are to be found exclusively within its pale; and yet it is the Church which he least of the energy and vigour of life. In point of number, the Greek is about one-third of the whole; and it looks to Russia for moral and pecu- support, as the other denominations look to Lyons and France.

re the question may be raised as to how far these Churches—Greek and e—have departed from the doctrines and principles of the New Testament and primitive and Apostolic Church, and whether they need to be set right on any f importance. To those who believe that the Episcopal is the divine and re order of Church government, that from it alone proceeds all legitimate ty to the right and valid administration of the sacraments, that the sacraments primary means of grace for the justification and sanctification of the sinner, e Church stands before the Bible, and that the antiquity of these Churches is ing highly in their favour—it will doubtless appear strangely presumptuous otestantism should apply itself to the task of reforming such venerable Churches. ese and similar views, however, we have nothing at present to do; nor can we e that the readers of this journal have any sympathy with them. Carried y a sentimental regard to antiquity; confounding the Apostolic with later hen innumerable innovations and the germ of grave errors had crept into the e; confounding the visible Church with that mystical body of the Redeemer which is composed of all true and penitent believers, and to which alone apply the attributes and promises mentioned in the Word of God; confounding the theology of St. Paul and St. Augustine with the theology of the schoolmen of the middle ages; and inverting the right order of the Word of God first, and then the sacraments—the latter deriving all their authority and power and efficacy from the former—they humbly appear to us to have committed a great error, which, if they were once set right, they would clearly see that the Oriental Churches need a reformation in their doctrine as well as in their practice, and that Protestantism has all the warrant and power to devote itself to such a work. If we take the Word of God as the standard by which we are to measure the purity of doctrine in a given Church, it will not be difficult to find out that both the Greek and Roman Churches have indeed wandered far from the old paths marked out in the Bible, have left the simplicity of the Gospel for tawdry ceremonies of Jewish or Pagan origin, and have perverted and obscured the way of salvation through the rich grace of God and our Saviour. Writing for those who hold views similar to our own on this subject, we shall therefore assume that the Oriental Churches stand in the utmost need of that Gospel which they have abandoned, and which the missionary labours of Protestantism are endeavouring to restore.

What, then, is the result of those missionary labours? Now that forty years have elapsed, what are the definite results of an outlay of labour so long extended, and of the acquisition of an experience so precious? The question may be fairly put, whether by those sceptics who look with suspicion upon every foreign missionary scheme, or by those special Churches under whose fostering care those labours have been carried on, or by Protestant Christendom, whose name and religion are, to some extent, committed in all such enterprises.

1. First and foremost among the benefits which have accrued to the Syrian Christians is the wide circulation of the Holy Scriptures throughout the length and breadth of the land. The editions printed in Rome were always rare, voluminous, and expensive, and have been long out of print; while those printed in Mount Lebanon by the Greek Catholics have also been equally objectionable for public use and are now rarely to be seen. During the last forty years all the demand for the Word of God has been supplied by Protestant Christianity and Protestant liberalism. Printed in London, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and sold at an amazingly low price, chiefly with the object of ensuring for it a respectful treatment, the Bible has been extensively circulated, so that it has found its way to the most remote parts of the country. The labour and assiduity of the missionaries in this department of their work procured for them, and for Protestants in general, one time the name of Bible-men, and have ever filled the people with admiration of their zeal in diffusing the knowledge of the Word of God.

Let it not be supposed, however, that the Bible found an easy entrance into the homes of the Christians of Syria. At first, it was generally refused, on the ground its being either a holy book, unfit for the use of laymen, or of heretical English priests and wicked priests often committed to the flames all the copies which they could hold of. It was owing to the indefatigable industry and zeal of the missionaries acting upon public opinion, that the burning of Bibles was given up, and the Bible introduced with all the respect which its sacred character deserves. No one thinks of burning a Bible, and we have sometimes met with the English edition in rural churches where the people were too poor to pay for one more rare and valuable. These facts are now so well known, that the natives of the country are fully aware of what Protestantism has done for them in this respect; and many of them gratefully acknowledge the kindness and the value of the deed.

A fresh impulse has been lately given to the circulation of the Holy Scriptures in the new translation from the original into the Arabic. The former versions being very faulty in every respect, the new one—the result of many years' labour of the best scholarship—bids fair to be one of the best translations extant. Of the New Testament, which alone has been completed, many thousand copies have been sold. The translation of the Old Testament, which it is hoped will soon be finished, is eagerly awaited by many. The high honour of this great work, which has been so justly appreciated by the Syrian Christians, belongs to the late Rev. Dr. E. Smith and his present successor, the Rev. Dr. Van Dyck. Their version will doubtless soon supersede all others, and its value, therefore, can hardly be over-estimated.

2. The missionaries have promoted the cause of public education and good morals. When they first entered the country, a regular school was a rare thing—if, indeed, such a thing existed at all; and with the exception of two or three colleges in the Maronite district of Mount Lebanon, high schools were unknown. Now, the number of primary schools is very great, while those of a higher class are very common in the larger cities; though it may be truly said that, on the whole, education in Syria is still in its earliest stages. The change, however, which has been effected is relatively great, and may be attributed in some measure to the general progress of the land in civilization, under the influences of foreign commerce and an improved government. While we do not undervalue these beneficial influences, we must, however, do justice to the American missionaries, who, from the very first, established a large number of schools, introduced a higher grade of instruction, had prepared the requisite textbooks, and endeavoured to bring females under the civilising and elevating influences of education. The matter was then taken up by the Papal missionaries and by the natives themselves; but it is due to Protestantism to say that its missionaries were the first, and throughout, the principal agents for introducing the cause of public education, giving it an impulse which it has never ceased to feel, and for advocating the participation of females in all the mental and moral advantages which had been considered to belong exclusively to the male sex.

In addition to their high school in Abail, the American missionaries are about to institute a college in Beyrout, whose standard of education shall be higher than any similar institution in Syria. The value of such a seminary can hardly be estimated; for, besides its direct usefulness, which will be immense, it will give a powerful impulse to the cause of learning throughout the whole of Syria.

Nor must we forget the labours of the missionaries in the cause of religious, moral, and secular literature. The press at Malta was the first—now nearly forty years ago—to issue valuable books of this character. The work was then taken up by the American missionaries, whose press at Beyrout has been vigorously employed for the last thirty years in producing standard works for schools and general reading. Catechisms, works on practical religion, apologetic and polemic treatises, and textbooks on geography, arithmetic, algebra, geometry, trigonometry, Arabic grammar, rhetoric, prosody, and logic, were translated and prepared by the most competent scholars. The value of these books was still more enhanced by the beautiful typography in which they were executed, and the pure Arabic style in which they were written. How far this latter consideration alone is worth in its influence upon a people rising out of ignorance into the first stages of intellectual development and civilization, can be justly estimated only by those who know the Arabic language and the changes which it has suffered during the latter part of its history. The only other source which has contributed to the cause of modern literature in Syria is the Egyptian press, which, under the energetic auspices of Mohammed Ali, has issued many valuable works on history, law, medicine, and Arabic literature.

3. They have gathered converts from the different communions, and thus the foundation of a Protestant Church in Syria. Besides those converts, who have been formed into native Churches, and legally recognised as Protestant communities, many members of the Oriental Churches attend the regular preaching Protestant ministers. Such Churches and congregations are to be found in Jerusalem, Nablous, Nazareth, Sidon, Merj Ayun, Beyrout, Mount Lebanon, Damascus, Hums, and Aleppo, with many other minor places. The number of the members of the various Churches thus gathered must be above 200, and the number of enrolled Protestants above 1,500 souls; while those who attend the regular services of Protestant religion are a great many more. These are not large numbers to boast but they are sufficient to exhibit the power of the Gospel and the faithfulness of missionary labour.

But it may be asked, why separate and estrange such converts, however sincere they may be, from their original Churches, and amalgamate them with the general mass of Protestantism? Why not leave them where they were, in order that they may bring forth, in time, purity of doctrine and the phenomena of spiritual life in the original Churches of Syria? This was, we believe, the original policy of the missionaries; but the uncompromising and fierce spirit of Rome soon displayed itself in the persecution and ejection from its communion of such persons as had entertained Protestant sentiments. The first convert was also the first martyr. He was incarcerated in a small and miserable cell, by the order of the Maronite Patriarch, but the first Syrian Protestant refused to act against the convictions of his conscience, and was put to death by gradual starvation. While the Syrian Christians saw in this act how a Protestant can die a cruel death for his faith, the missionaries saw that their first hopes were delusive, that the spirit of apostate Christianity was the same everywhere, and that they must look to God and the civil Government for the protection of the victims of religious intolerance. Without adverting to other causes, it may be truly stated, that the present state of affairs has been forced upon the missionaries and Protestants of Syria.

4. Protestantism has made itself known and felt among a large number of the people. When the American missionaries first came to the country, Protestantism was unknown, and the stories that were circulated by the priests in relation to it, and that appeared to gain, for the time, universal credence, were of the most false and slanderous character. It was rumoured, for example, that the English (for so were the Protestants called) had no known religion; that in some kind of secret freemasonry they worshipped Satan; that they bought men's souls with money, and in league with the Evil One they bound those souls to secrecy, faithfulness, and perdition. These idle stories are now exploded, and many of the people have some just notion of what the Protestant faith is. Few consider it that vile heresy which it was represented to be, and many are ready to acknowledge it to be one of the pure forms—if not the purest form—of Christianity. From their pulpits—in the Bibles which they have distributed, and the religious books which they wrote and published—in the instruction of their schools—in their converts and Churches, and in their friendly intercourse with the natives of the country—the missionaries, after much time and patient labour, have succeeded in making known that the Bible is the religion of the Protestants. Nor have they spared the errors and formalism and self-righteousness of the theology and practices of the Oriental Churches. Controversial books were written on both sides—by the ablest theologians and dignitaries on the one side the Papacy—and always and palpably in favour of Protestantism. The great doctrine, however, which the missionaries ever kept in full view as the central and fundamental point of their faith was salvation by grace through faith in a Divine Redeemer. To place before the people of Syria the pure Gospel in its primary and fullest significance has been their great labour and the secret of their success.

But if Protestantism has shown itself competent to disabuse the minds of men from the foul aspersions which had been cast upon it, and to make its doctrines known and respected, it has also shown itself fully competent to introduce, with the Divine blessing, something of its spirit into the Oriental Churches. The Churches of Syria are not now what they were when Protestantism first appeared among them. Watched and stimulated by a foe which they have often affected to despise, the clergy have been more vigilant in their pastoral work, have led more regular lives, open abuses have been somewhat checked, preaching sermons after something of an Evangelical model is not uncommon, the Word of God is tacitly allowed to be read by the common people, Church errors are glossed over or explained away, and the name and work of Christ have taken in some measure the place of legends and superstitions. In our own missionary life we look back with the greatest satisfaction upon those hours when, with a Greek or Papal priest, we preached together the same Gospel; or, better still, when we preached together the name of Jesus to some departing soul, and when no other name—of angel or saint—was allowed to intrude itself upon the last solemn moments of life.

These are significant changes. But let us not be misunderstood. All the results of missionary labour, and all the changes which we have indicated, have not brought the Oriental Churches to a state of reform or to a desire for it. Of a strong conservative disposition, neither the clergy nor the people are ready for changes in the dogmas and usages of their Churches. Let everything stand as it did in the days of our fathers and forefathers, they say; if any man see a mistake, let him not believe in it, but let him not leave the religion of his people or disturb the peace and integrity of his Church. Nor are there among the Syrian Christians—whether clerics or laics—men of strong principles and courage to prosecute with energy and patience, and faith, such a great object. It makes the prospect still more discouraging when we contemplate the general and natural apathy to vital religion, the spirit of infidelity which has crept among some of the most intelligent and influential men, as well as the worldliness which is growing with the commerce and riches of the country.

These are serious difficulties, and they often rise up like great mountains which tower their heads far into the sky, and obstruct the fair and bright vision of the future. The fact is, without a great revolution in the ideas and sentiments of the people, and a still greater revolution in the elements of the Syrian character, we cannot hope to see a general reformation in the Oriental communions, or a general movement among them towards the Protestant Church. For, to be partially affected with influences emanating from Protestantism is one thing, and to evangelize the Oriental Churches is another. While much, therefore, has been done, much more of assiduous and patient labour is laid up for the future, and the work is not that of a lifetime, but that of many lifetimes strung together. Taking, however, the Word of God for our guide in this matter, we believe that a happier time is reserved for our race than we can at present see. The changes which this single century has evolved—great and oftentimes sudden as they have been—may be the prelude to other changes far greater and more sudden. The fulness of the Gentiles, the conversion of Israel, the knowledge and glory and kingdom of the Redeemer diffused over all the earth—are not the morbid fancies of visionary enthusiasts, but the sober and faithful announcements of Holy Writ.

FRANCE.

—, France, April, 1864.

A NEW GRIEVANCE OF THE ULTRAMONTANES AGAINST ENGLAND.

The enthusiastic reception given to Garibaldi in England has excited to the utmost the ill-humour of the Jesuitical press. The editors of the Monde make it the theme of violent invective against the people and the Government of Great Britain. "What!" say they, "a Garibaldi, an adventurer, a filibuster, a brigand in the uniform of a soldier, is welcomed as a hero not only by the working men and shopkeepers, but by the élite of the aristocracy! Even the Ministers of Queen Victoria express their admiration for this individual. The delirium is universal. But is it nothing else than delirium? Can we help seeing in this glorification of Garibaldi a perfidious scheme, an odious piece of Machiavelism? The mask is thrown aside; England is endeavouring to supplant France in the gratitude of Italy; she seeks to appropriate that which we have gathered upon the field of battle."

It is clear, however, that the English of every rank, in receiving Garibaldi with enthusiasm, have not had any such deep and perfidious designs as are imputed to them by the Ultramontane press. They have simply yielded to the admiration with which they have been inspired by a patriot, a great citizen, a valiant soldier. The absence of all motives of self-interest, and a constant devotion to the cause of his country, are salutary lessons for the age in which we live, and it does well to honour him.

DISCUSSION IN THE SENATE ON THE LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

Our two Legislative Bodies now very seldom sit. It seems that the Government is endeavouring to restrict within the narrowest limits the sound of those eloquent voices which have excited such lively sympathy among the masses of the people. Nevertheless, the Senate have recently devoted two days to the consideration of a question which bears upon liberty of thought and of the press. A retired officer, M. Merlin, having addressed to that body a petition, in which he begged that more rigorous measures might be adopted against the circulation of bad books, the princes of the Romish Church, who are also senators, and especially Cardinal de Bonnechose, Archbishop of Rouen, embraced this opportunity violently to declaim against irreligious works. The fiery cardinal accused the Ministers of State of being too indulgent to writers who attack Christianity, and he declared, among other things, that M. Renan's book ought to be suppressed by the judicial authorities. One of the arguments of the Most Reverend Archbishop is certainly curious. "The penal law," he says, in substance, "punishes those who insult the ministers of religion. Now, the priests testify that Jesus Christ is God. M. Renan maintains, on the contrary, that Jesus Christ is not God. He imputes, therefore, to the priests falsehood. Well, to accuse the priests of falsehood, is to insult them: consequently, M. Renan ought to be punished." According to this strange reasoning, all the Protestants might also be put in prison; for to certain assertions of the clergy they oppose negations; and they might be incarcerated under the pretext that they insult the priests, by accusing them of falsehood!

The speakers on behalf of the civil power replied to Cardinal de Bonnechose and the other intolerant senators, that religious liberty, as established in France, allows any author to dispute the dogmas of this or that religion, and that the Penal Code is only applicable to those who, with their controversial writings, mix up gross ridicule or personal abuse.

THE LITURGICAL DISPUTE AT LYONS.

I have spoken more than once of the quarrel which has broken out between the Archbishop and the clergy of Lyons on the subject of the Roman Breviary (December, 1863, p. 579; March, 1864, p. 122, 123; April, p. 170). This affair assumes proportions more and more serious.

Pius IX. has addressed to Cardinal de Bonald a Brief, or official letter, in which he pronounces the strongest censures upon the canons and priests of Lyons. The Pope says that these ecclesiastics have committed a very grave fault in resisting the authority of the Apostolic See and the wishes of their archbishop. He declares that their conduct is culpable obstinacy, discreditable resistance to his paternal advice. He adds: "We address this letter to you, to make known our decision clearly and openly. We will, ordain, and command (volumus, præcipimus, et mandamus) that the Roman Breviary be gradually introduced into the diocese of Lyons, and imposed first on the deacons," &c.

This is all very well. But Pius IX. and Cardinal de Bonald have forgotten the article of the Concordat which interdicts the publication in France of any brief, bull, or other Pontifical document, without the previous permission of the Government. These high officials of the Romish Church have a very good memory for laws which guarantee their privileges, but none for restrictions which place a limit on their omnipotence. Napoleon III. and the Minister of Worship recollected the rights of the civil power better, and the police have received orders to prevent the circulation of the Pontifical Brief. Moreover, Cardinal de Bonald has been censured for having forgotten and violated the laws of the State.

INAUGURATION OF A STATUE TO THE IMMACULATE VIRGIN AT LOURDES.

Your readers will perhaps not have forgotten that I related, a few years since, the pretended appearance of the Virgin Mary to a little girl of ten or twelve years old, called Bernadette Soubirons, in the Grotto of Lourdes, at the foot of the Pyrenees. When this miraculous story was told, the doctors declared that the little girl was subject to mental delusions, and advised her parents to place her under the care of a medical man skilled in cases of lunacy; but the bishop of the diocese of Tarbes, and the priests under his jurisdiction, thought very differently. They admired the reality of the supernatural apparition; they even asserted that the Virgin Mary had shown herself seventeen times to this little Bernadette Soubirons, saying to her, "I am the Immaculate Conception!" (What fine language this to put into the mouth of Mary!) They encouraged the Bearnese to visit the grotto. Moreover, they sold at a high price bottles of miraculous water, obtained from a spring in the holy cavern. And they published a declaration that cures and other miracles, the genuineness of which had been proved by episcopal inquiries, rendered convincing testimony to the reality of the apparition.

Now is this all. On the 4th of the present month the Bishop of Tarbes, accompanied by the priests, and followed by more than 20,000 pilgrims, solemnly inaugurated the statue of the Immaculate Virgin in the famous Grotto of Lourdes. To add to the attractiveness of the fête, a Popish preacher from Paris, the Abbé Alir, was engaged expressly to deliver the principal address upon the occasion. The abbé displayed, in fact, all the treasures of his oratory. For more than two hours he discoursed to the poor inhabitants of the Pyrenees upon the entire series of supernatural spiritual appearances, beginning with those of the Old and New Testaments, then going through the theophanies taken from the legends of the Romish Church, and concluding from the whole that the manifestation of Mary to Bernadette was a new proof of the truth of Christianity in general and of Roman Catholicism in particular.

Such is the depth of error and degradation to which the Popish clergy in the remote provinces of France have descended!

AGITATION AND CONFLICT AMONG THE FRENCH PROTESTANTS.

If the Romish communion is not in a creditable condition, it must be acknowledged that the Reformed Churches of France present a sad and depressing spectacle. My last letter (p. 171-3) contained lengthened details upon the results of the non-reappointment of M. Athanase Coquerel, jun., as an assistant-pastor in Paris. Upon this particular subject there is little more to be said. The pastor (M. Martin-Paschoud) by whom M. Coquerel was nominated as his assistant, having appealed to the Consistory of Paris, that body has confirmed the decision of the Presbyterial Council. In doing so, the Consistory expresses its opinion that "the Presbyterial Council has judiciously and firmly discharged its duty towards the Protestant Church of France, and especially towards the Protestant Church of Paris, in watching over, in its selection of pastors, the maintenance of the Evangelical and traditional faith upon which that Church is founded."

On the other hand, the Consistory of Nismes has addressed to the pastors and members of our ecclesiastical bodies a circular in which it alleges:—

1. That the Church of Paris has set at nought one of the great principles of Protestantism—a principle necessary to our internal peace and prosperity.

2. That there exists among the Protestants of France two great tendencies.

3. That these tendencies are equally legitimate, and that they contribute by their mutual counterpoise to the development of Christian vitality.

4. Consequently, the Consistory of Nismes maintains, on the ground of the independence of the Christian conscience and the pastoral dignity, that none of our ecclesiastical bodies is authorised in excluding one of these tendencies to the advantage of the other.

One might occupy a volume in the discussion of these questions, if this were a suitable time and place. I shall content myself with making a few brief remarks.

First, what right had the Consistory of Nismes to inflict a public censure upon the Presbyterian Council of Paris? Our consistories are independent of each other. The liberal or rationalist pastors of Nismes have usurped the power which belonged exclusively to a General Synod.

Secondly, what do these vague expressions, two tendencies, equally legitimate, signify? The fact is that our pastorate embodies not only two tendencies, but two religions—yes, TWO RELIGIONS, and very different ones. One acknowledges the Divine authority of the Bible; the other does not. One teaches that Christ is God; the other does not. It would be easy to show that upon every important point the Evangelicals and the soi-disant Liberals are entirely opposed to each other. How, then, can they fill the same pulpits and constitute the same Church? That is the question.

Thirdly, as to the pastoral dignity and independence; if a pastor, after receiving a call from a congregation, changes his belief, and attacks the doctrines which he undertook to preach, what right has he to remain at his post? This would be a most monstrous privilege. The people would be at the mercy of his individual belief, however it might vary; and would, in fact, become slaves, under the pretext of protecting the dignity of the pastors.

A number of other consistories, under the impression produced by the dispute between Paris and Nismes, have also published addresses on one side or the other. There are soi-disant Liberal pastors, who have obtained signatures to their protests from schools, cafés, concert-rooms, and even taverns, in the name of religious liberty! To these lamentable proceedings we shall have to recur hereafter.

DEATH OF PROFESSOR JALAGUIER.

Before concluding this letter, I feel impelled to give public expression to the deep regret which has been excited in our Church by the death of M. Jalaguier. This is a new and severe loss, added to those which we have sustained for some time past.

M. Jalaguier occupied the principal chair in the Protestant Theological College at Montauban; he was professor of dogmatic theology. For more than thirty years this venerable divine fulfilled his high functions with such constant fidelity, that he obtained the respect of the Rationalists themselves. He was at once firm and conciliatory, new yielding on the fundamental points of the Christian faith, but abstaining from controversies and disputes. In his personal demeanour there was gravity, blended with gentleness. He died in the sixty-ninth year of his age. The Lord grant that he may have such a successor as shall continue his piety, learning, and his example! X. X. X.

ANNUAL MEETINGS OF THE FRENCH PROTESTANTS IN PARIS.

Paris, April 20, 1864.

The approaching crisis, feared by some, hailed by others, looked for by the whole of intelligent Christendom, influences all things; and our religious gatherings, which annually take place in Paris at the present season, have derived this year the greater part of their unusual interest and importance from its special bearing upon our churches, particularly on the Reformed Church of France. The meetings of our various societies, which have their centre in Paris, have been more than usually solemn, the fundamental truths of Christianity have been more positively laid down, the real aim of our Christian life more clearly stated, the one result of our societies' varied labours more earnestly sought after. The attendance both of pastors and elders, and of the Protestant public, was also more numerous. The two divisions of time and interest during this eventful week were the public meetings and the private conferences.

THE RELIGIOUS ANNIVERSARIES.

The public meetings commenced as usual with special devotional exercises at Taitbout Chapel, on Sunday, the 3rd. On Monday the Sunday-school Society, presided over by Pastor Montandon, resigned his functions definitively this year, on its twelfth anniversary. A greater impulse will be given to its Christian energies in future; the year has been one of change in several respects. The Sunday-school Magazine has been given up, and in its stead are published a quarterly list of prepared lessons for the teachers' use and a well-illustrated journal for children, intended to counteract the dangerous periodicals in vogue, by treating all subjects from a moral and religious point of view. The society has published two volumes during the year, one with the medal received from the society at the London Exhibition conferred upon it, and called Les Cirques, to be given to all the children present last year at the City of Napoleon; and the other an expensive volume with engravings giving an insight into the life of Nineveh. The society has hired rooms, and has established an independent agency. Hitherto it had employed the agency of a bookseller. The work of Sunday-schools is yet but little appreciated or understood in France; but it is increasing, and little by little pastors will brought to see the advantage of the class system over a general lecture given by themselves or the schoolmaster, which is too often called a Sunday-school. I know of a school in a large town where the pastor, after reducing the class-teachers to the miserable taskwork of mere repetition, forbade them to meet as teachers to prepare or even to pray for the school. I need scarcely say the teachers were earnest Christians and the pastor a rationalist. But this shows the need of action on the part of the society, which God has hitherto blessed through its agents' visits to the churches. There is an increase of six in the Paris Sunday-schools, making the whole number in the capital forty-one. Expenses of the society, 4,768f.; and receipts, 25,264f. On the same evening the French and Foreign Bible Society met for the thirty-first time. It was presided over by Pastor Guillaume Monod, who showed, in eloquent words, what nations and individuals owe to the blessed Book. The report gave the receipts as 85,053f. this year; and expenses, 4,720f. It has sold 76,309 copies of the Scriptures. Its colporteurs, with those of the British and Foreign Society, continue to find their labours abundantly blessed.

On the following day the twelfth anniversary of the French Protestant Historical Society was celebrated at the Oratoire. An interesting paper was read by M. Jules Bonnet on "Calvin's Friendships," carrying one into the inner circle of his acquaintance, and showing the warmth of heart of the stern Reformer. An important letter was also read from a converted priest of Bossuet's diocese, written to his bishop from Holland, where he had taken refuge, and by which it becomes certain that Bossuet did imbrue his hands in persecution, a point hitherto contested by Gallicans. The twenty-second annual meeting of the Paris Religious and Bible Society was held on the same evening at Taitbout Chapel. Dr. Holland was in the chair. The report endeavoured to clear the society from the contradictory charges brought against it, on the one hand, by certain earnest Christians, who wish its publications to be exclusively devoted to the direct evangelization of the masses, and on the other by those who complain that they are too secular. Its aim is twofold; by some of its publications it seeks to promote morality among the masses, and by others to convert them. Those who will not hear the plain Gospel, may, it is thought, be prepared for it by a moral stepping-stone. Its finances have permitted no new publications during the year; but two tracts for adults, one a sermon of Oberlin's, on paying one's debts, and the other a life of Luther, by Professor Rosseau St. Hilaire, and four tracts for children, are in the press. Its monthly journal, Ami de la Jeunesse, continues to obtain a circulation of 11,000, and its Almanach des Bons Français reached a sale of 210,000 copies this year. Its expenses have been 88,887f., and receipts 4,964f., but it is indebted 43,000f.

Very great interest attached this year to the annual meeting of the Bible Society. Its forty-fourth meeting was held on the 6th, at the Oratoire. M. de Pressensé presided, and his able speech brought to a degree of confusion over the countenances of the rationalists who surrounded him, not a single speaker rising except himself. "Bible Society," he remarked, "have recently passed through some severe trials, and now offer a grand spectacle. The authenticity of many portions of the Scriptures is called in question, as well as their dates and their authors, and what is much more serious, their Divine inspiration is doubted or denied. But the more the Bible is opposed, the more numerous become the devoted defenders who arise to affirm its truth and to spread it abroad; it derives fresh strength from its trials, and every contest ends by its gaining another victory. In the fifteenth century the Bible effected a second conquest of Greece and Rome, by subjugating the reawakened energies of classical antiquity; in the sixteenth the Bible brought in the Reformation. At the end of the eighteenth the Bible societies arose to counteract the attacks upon its truth. When the Protestant Bible Society insisted on circulating the Apocrypha with the Scriptures for those who would not read them without, the difficulties of the question caused another and most flourishing association to arise, the French and Foreign Bible Society. The late question of publishing various versions have had the same result—a new society is in the course of formation; and thus the Bible will be circulated more widely than ever." After having voted with the orthodox minority in favour of the status quo, when the admission of the obnoxious Genevan version with others into the society's list of Bibles was voted by the majority, M. Guizot bowed to the decision, and instead of separating with the six members from a rationalist majority, he retained his office, not considering the versions inaccurate enough to warrant such a step on his part. "I adjure you, gentlemen, to reflect," said M. Guizot in conclusion. "Certainly no human book could have borne unscathed such attacks, overcome such trials, and come off victorious in such contests. Take the sublimest ideas of the sublimest of sages, and say if they would not ere this have disappeared and retreated to the libraries of the learned. . . . The Sacred Scriptures are the Divine witnesses to the laws of a moral order, revealed by the supernatural power of God, to be the light and salvation of mankind. The Bible will triumphantly traverse all human controversies; we are here but the instruments and servants of a Divine energy which it is not in the power of men to counteract." The society has received 46,170f., and expended 57,748f. It has been the means of distributing during the year 12,000 copies of the Scriptures. Its principal work has been to furnish wedding Bibles and communion Testaments to married couples on their wedding-day, and to young people on their first approach to the Lord's Table, and in every way to supply Protestants with the Word of God.

The seventeenth anniversary of the Protestant Sou Society met the same afternoon. By collecting one sou (halfpenny) a-week from Protestants, it assists thirty-two religious societies. This year it has received 58,295f. to be thus divided.

The thirty-first anniversary of the Evangelical Society of France was held the same evening, at Taitbout Chapel, and was presided over by M. de Pressensé, sen. The fact of his having been brought to Christ when present as hearer at Dr. F. Monod's Sunday-school, and his touching allusions to that departed brother, excited much emotion. The society is prospering. Certain stations where the work had slackened are now again vigorous, and Paris has been made the most important centre of action. Six stations, from each of which operations are carried on around, and twelve schools, are part of its Paris work. Receipts, 138,447f.; expenses, 135,049f.

All the Paris Sunday-schools were invited to the Cirque Napoleon on Thursday, the 7th. It is an animating sight to behold above 4,000 bright faces, tier above tier, facing their 2,000 or 3,000 friends. Never was the circus so crowded, and never were the speeches more to the purpose than this year. All was solemn, dignified, affecting. Each short speech was, as usual, followed by a hymn sung by the children, or by the pastors and children in alternate response. Mr. Woodruff, the energetic American merchant, the friend of Sunday-schools, who inaugurated these gatherings in 1857, when we mustered about 1,500, was present, and was not a little pleased to see the little stream swelled to such a river. The Missionary Society met the same evening for the fortieth time, with Count J. de Laborde as chairman. Its chief energies have from the commencement been devoted to the Bassoutos, an African tribe of about 20,000 souls, and which it has saved from destruction and civilised. This year one of the missionaries has brought out a paper in the language, called The Little Light of Lessouto. The missionary sent to Senegal has found every door closed; he has more hopes of Senegambia. The great event of the year is the happy arrival and successful recommencement of the work long in abeyance at Tahiti, by the missionary Arbousset and his family.

On Friday, the 7th, the eighteenth meeting of the Protestant Central Society for Evangelization was held at the Oratoire, presided over by General de Chabaud-Latour. Its receipts have been 154,000f., and expenses 158,000f. Its direct aim is to collect and attend to the spiritual wants of scattered Protestants, and old churches dying out, or reviving; but it cannot do this without exerting a powerful evangelizing influence on Roman Catholic populations. Its work is greatly blessed, like its elder sister, the Evangelical Society, which always sends a messenger to congratulate it. Its important preparatory Theological Seminary at Paris prospers; it has sent out forty-six pastors since its foundation, and has at present nineteen students.

On Saturday the Primary School Society held its thirty-fifth anniversary; M. F. Cuvier presided. It has aided 228 schools this year; it has thirty young women in course of training for teachers at its school at Saint Leger, and twenty-five young men in the Courbevoie Normal School. Its receipts have been less abundant this year, and yet never was there a greater need to encourage educational exertion.

To these directly religious societies we must add the anniversaries of several benevolent institutions. The Paris Deaconesses' Institution is quietly pursuing its mission among the poor and the sick and various other departments of women's mission. Its schools are flourishing. Receipts, 81,000f.; expenses, 95,156f. The Agricultural Colony of St. Foy, for juvenile offenders, has about 100 boys under its truly Christian wing; and this year it has increased its domain by purchasing 26,000f. worth of ground for vine-dressing. As soon as it becomes self-supporting a similar establishment for girls will (D.V.) be formed elsewhere; it is loudly called for. The Asylum for the Aged in Paris, and the meetings of Apprentices, who are watched over by committees of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, awakened the lively sympathies of all. The series of meetings was worthily closed by an excellent gathering of friends of the Evangelical Alliance, on Tuesday, the 12th, at the Chapelle du Nord. Never was the Alliance meeting so numerous, so animated, and so full of spiritual life. M. Guillaume Monod presided, and Pastor Fisch gave a verbal report. Every speech was telling, and a spirit of animating love penetrated all. The meeting was addressed by MM. Paulain and Pronier, of Geneva; Olivier, of Lausanne; Woodruff, of Brooklyn; Pulsford, of Paris, &c. A very numerous attendance at the Lord's Table in the evening, over which, as usual, pastors of various denominations presided in turn, worthily closed the very interesting assemblies of 1864. I must not omit to mention an affecting drawing-room meeting for mothers, presided over by Pastors Meyer and G. Monod, in response to the general appeal to pray for children on Tuesday, the 12th.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCES.

The great interest, however, of the time has been in the Conferences. These are twofold—the General, opened to pastors and elders of all denominations; the Special, or National, composed (1) exclusively of pastors and elders of the Reformed National Church, to which members of the Lutheran Church are admitted; this year has been added (2) the Special Conference of the Union of Free Churches.

Never had there been so many members present. All felt the intense importance of the time, on the eve, as we are, of a crisis hurried on in the Reformed Church by the faithful refusal to reappoint Pastor Coquerel, junior, to his post of suffragan. About 200 voting members were present at the General Conference; and after long discussion, in which the Rationalists showed the weakness of men who have come to no firm decision, the following proposition was voted by 160 against 6, nineteen Rationalists having previously left the place of meeting. The question for discussion was, "Are not the existence of any church, and the rights of the faithful, endangered by unlimited freedom of religious teaching?" and the reply voted as follows: "Considering that for some years past there have appeared, in books of all kinds, in the periodical press, in Protestant journals, and even in manuals of religious instruction, with the signature of pastors and theological professors, opinions which attack not only the fundamental principle of the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures hitherto acknowledged by all the Churches of the Reformation, but the most elementary notions of Christianity; considering that the writers alluded to question the authenticity of the greater part of the Saviour's teaching, such as it is preserved to us in the Gospels, keep silence upon or deny His supernatural birth, miracles, and, above all, His resurrection, overturn not only the Christian idea of the creation of man in the image of God, and His fall, but the very basis of natural religion, shaking belief in the Divine personality and in future judgment; considering that the authors these negations justify themselves, by alleging that it is of the essence of a Protestant Church to admit unlimited freedom of teaching; this Conference is of opinion that as to what is involved in the conditions of the existence of every Church, the free expression in the pulpit, by any other public and official means, of doctrinal opinions of the pastors, has for now any and legitimate limit the belief professed by the religious association from which those pastors derive their commission; and that as regards the rights of the faithful, the authority given to the pastors by their sacred ministry resides entirely in the conformity of their teaching with the declarations of the Holy Scriptures, and particularly the fundamental doctrines of the divinity of Jesus Christ and Redemption, which the universal Christian Church has always considered as evidently attested in the Bible, and which are expressed in all Protestant liturgies; and that, consequently, is an abuse of power and spiritual tyranny to take advantage of the position as a minister of Jesus Christ, and in a Christian Church, in order to propagate, directly or indirectly, doctrines contrary to the faith. The Rationalists had presented a counter declaration, worded so that both sides might join by giving their own different meanings to the expressions. The words "Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God," occurring in it, an explanation was requested; it was declared that Jesus was the son in the same sense that every Christian may become a son of God, and the text Matt. v. 45 referred to. This is a sample of the degree of insensibility of science manifested by those who leave the path of God's truth.

THE SPECIAL CONFERENCES.

In the Special Reformed Conferences two propositions were voted; one proposed by Professor Dezert, "I propose that the Conference declare that the Reformed Church of France has positive traditions, and official bodies bound to make them sacred;" and the other proposed by Pastors Vauvillier, Lourde-Rocheblave, and F. de Coninck, "We ask the Conference to renew the steps taken to obtain from the Minister the restoration of our rights, a restoration the importance of which circumstances render daily more indispensable." The Rationalists were led to express their deplorable indecision, separating vital doctrine from religion, making light of the miraculous birth and resurrection of our Lord, declaring that these might or might not be true, but that there was no religion in them! After a day's discussion, M. Guizot presented the following declaration, which was carried by 141 votes out of 23: "We, the undersigned pastors and members of the Reformed Church of France, meeting according to custom, in conference in Paris, deeply sorrowing and anxious as to the spirit of doubt and negation which has been lately manifested respecting the fundamental basis of the Christian religion, regard it as an imperative duty towards God, towards our Lord Jesus Christ, and towards the Church, to express boldly on this subject our common conviction. The Christian principles peculiarly attacked are: 1. Faith in the supernatural action of God in the government of the world, and especially in the establishment of the Christian religion. 2. Faith in the Divine and supernatural inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, and their sovereign authority in religious matters. 3. Faith in the eternal divinity and miraculous birth as well as in the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ, God-Man, Saviour and Redeemer of men. While these fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith are being contested or formally denied, it is urged that the Reformed Church must, and should not, have any positive doctrines, and that every pastor is free to profess and propagate in the very bosom of the Church all his personal opinions. We regard these negations as utterly destructive of both the Christian religion and the Reformed Church. We have full faith in the supernatural action of God in the government of the world; in the Divine and supernatural inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures, together with their sovereign authority in religious matters; in the eternal divinity, the miraculous birth and the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ, God-Man, Saviour and Redeemer of men. We are convinced that these foundations of the Christian religion are also the foundations of the Reformed Church, which positively acknowledges them as such throughout her liturgy, and with the universal Church, gives public expression to her belief in them in the Apostles' Creed. We hold as firmly as any, both for those who differ from us and for ourselves, the tutelary principle of religious liberty. In virtue of this principle, every one is free to profess openly his belief, and to unite with those who also profess it; but we cannot comprehend the idea of a church without a common faith, and in which the most diverse or even contradictory creeds might be alike professed. Such a state of things would not be the exercise of religious liberty, but the destruction of religious society, which needs, more than any other society, intimate and serious sympathy. The Reformed Church of France is an organised religious society of long standing; she has vital principles and historical institutions, and even in the absence of her long-expected synods, she has in her consistories and presbyterial councils legal powers which, by State law as well as by her own rules, have the right and duty to maintain her principles. The Reformed Church acknowledges, as her rule of faith, nothing but the Holy Scriptures, and she never did nor could admit that those who dispute the Divine and supernatural inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, and their sovereign authority in religious matters, should nevertheless be authorised to speak and teach in her name. We have the firm conviction that, in expressing thus our deep and common convictions, we are responding to the sentiments of the great majority of the members of our Church, at the same time that we remain true to the faith of our fathers and to the dignity as well as the stability of the Church they founded." A most manly speech developed this proposition. Its closing paragraph was as follows: "I call your attention to the capital and supreme fact of the present situation. Look around; the attack on the foundations of the Christian faith is everywhere apparent in Germany, Switzerland, Holland, England, France. Some say they have no fear, nor have I; so that those who defend the citadel reply to those who attack it, so long as the faithful are not indolent and inert in presence of the active and zealous infidels. I have full confidence in the Christian cause; but men are fellow-workers with God; it was by the faith and effort of the first Christians that God established the Christian religion; it is by the faith and effort of the Christians of the present day that it is to be defended. Gentlemen, we have before us a great situation and a great duty, greater than we can fathom; in the warfare we wage, in the crisis we are traversing, we are the vanguard of entire Christendom. We have in our wake all other Christian communions. Let us show ourselves equal to so great a task, and firmly resolve to perform it.

The Free Church Conferences had no such painfully-interesting questions to discuss. The principal subject was the propriety of laying on of hands to devote men specially, and for a season only, to evangelistic work.

P.S.—The Rev. J. Denham Smith is preaching with great acceptance to English and to French; he leaves on the 22nd.

ITALY.

Florence, April 15, 1864.

NEW CHURCH IN ELBA: OPENING SERVICES.

A few days ago I returned from a delightful trip to the famous little island of Elba, the residence for a time of the great Corsican, and recently the scene of many triumphs of the Evangelical faith. There are now flourishing Protestant congregations in Portoferraio, Rio, and Longone, the three principal towns of this islet in the Tuscan Archipelago, which contains, in all, about 25,000 inhabitants, and is as valuable to the Italian Government for its iron mines as Sicily is for its caves of sulphur, the ore being quite equal to that of England, and the very soil being so impregnated with the precious metal, that it is shipped off to the foundries of the mainland and the smelting furnaces of France.

The brethren in Rio had built a handsome church, capable of holding 250 people, at an expense of 600*l.* sterling, and were about to open it, happily free of debt. Some eight years ago Francisco Madiati, the sufferer for the Lord, gave a Bible at Nice, to which he was banished by the late Grand Duke, to an Elban sea captain, whose soul was converted through the perusal of the book, and who was the instrument, under God, of introducing the Bible into the island. With this same Captain Cignoni we lodged during our stay, as there are no inns at Rio, and the respectable members of the congregation had placed some twenty beds at the disposal of the strangers, Drs. Revel and Stewart, Mr. Ribet, and several members of his congregation at Leghorn, and representatives of the Portoferraio and Longone Churches. One worthy son of St. Crispin had shut up his shop at Marciano, and gladly trudged the twenty miles with his wife and three children, to be present on this happy occasion.

Every arrangement for our comfort had been made against our landing at Portoferraio which a loving forethought could suggest, and when next day we crossed the mountain on mule-back, and descended upon Rio, one band after another of Christians came to meet us, as the brethren of old went out to receive Paul, and by their hearty salutations and beaming countenances showed plainly that the Spirit of the Lord had wrought a true work of grace in the hearts of these simple and sturdy seamen and highlanders. We did not need the testimony of the indefatigable evangelist to the indirect effects of the Gospel on his people; our own eyes convinced us afresh that cleanliness is next to godliness, and that the genuine Christian is the real gentleman. To say that they have been preached against and slandered is saying nothing. Bibles have been insultingly burned in the open streets. Their neighbours have been hounded on to violence by monkish eloquence. Every entrapping snare which priestly cunning could devise, from the bishops of the diocese to the bigoted local curates, has been set for them in vain. Their houses have been set fire to, their lives plotted against, their females threatened with insult and their temporal welfare imperilled many a time. But nothing has daunted them, and forgiving love has won over many an adversary. Crowded though the church was at every service, there was no attempt at tumult. The townsfolk treated the large Evangelical gathering with respect, as moved along to church, or strolled the benches in the intervals of service, or joined in the abundant and yet frugal repast.

It was most refreshing to enter into the joy of these sturdy witnesses for Christ. One could see the endearment of their valiant minister, Signor Marchand, who is a veritable apostle of love, as he eloquently discoursed from Ps. lx. 3, 4, after Dr. Revel had offered up a solemn and fervent dedication prayer and the response they gave to Signor Ribet when in the evening he ably opened up the unscriptural tenets and unchristian action of the Church of Rome, to which they had bade adieu for ever; and when in broken Italian, but with a thorough sense of the unity of all true believers in our one and blessed Redeemer, we spoke out the greetings and well-wishings of brethren of other lands and Churches and tongues, and bade them Go speed, and cheered them on to greater sacrifices and fresh efforts in the cause of Christ. The social gatherings at breakfast and dinner were truly love-feasts, where heart responded heart; and when seventy of us on the morrow partook together of the commemorative bread and wine, and swelled the lofty hallelujah of praise to God, as only Italian voices can, the emotions of love and joy stirred up within the breast were of the tenderest and most powerful kind. When the hour of parting with these dear brothers and sisters in Jesus arrived, they accompanied us en masse to the beach, and, strong men though we all were, the big tears were coursing down our cheeks and our hearts were bursting with gratitude to Almighty God for all His wondrous work of grace among these worthy islanders. If God only visit other parts of Italy as he has done Elba, I assure you the question of this country's future will soon be solved, for Italy will speedily take high rank as a Christian land, and the hoary superstitions of the Vatican will give place to the light and freedom of the Word of God.

PRIESTLY INFLUENCE—EVENTS NEAR FLORENCE.

In your January number I referred to two works of grace going on in the neighbourhood of Florence. The present varied position of these two missions it will be now useful to mention, as similar to many other cases. The first was a meeting of some fifty men and women close to one of the gates of the town. The word was preached by two Waldensian students. All went well till Easter came, when the parish priests leave confession and communion tickets at every house. Any absentee from these rites is a marked individual. Such an old-established custom is this, that in this way the very census and other popular statistics have hitherto been obtained through the priests by the Governments of Italy. The preaching of the monks and the force of the old habit of conforming to the rites of Rome have gradually thinned the Evangelical meeting until it has been wholly deserted. On their last three or four visits the two evangelists have gone from house to house inquiring if there were any who wished to join in reading the Word of God. The answer has been a cold negative. Such is the moral cowardice which the priests are still able to create among their parishioners.

A MONKISH POLEMIC DEFEATED.

The other instance of the power of the Gospel has ended very differently. A countryman from the hills, five miles distant from town, purchases from curiosity a Testament in the Florence depôt, and the shopman takes occasion to speak an earnest word for Christ to his soul. The reading of the life of Christ works a change in the manners, reforms at once a wild and drunken life, and brings him often to the depôt for religious instruction. His aged father and the whole family are violently opposed to the truth, make every effort to divert his mind, but he manages to read the Scriptures to them, coming to the depôt constantly for spiritual converse, until shortly, in answer to prayer, the aged father and mother and several members of the family are brought to Christ. I had the pleasure of seeing the old man, tottering on the brink of the grave, resting on the arm of his now much-loved son, when he had believed in the living Saviour, and yet could scarce realise it. He rejoiced, and yet was astonished at such glad tidings. He saw men as trees walking, and could scarce credit the evidence of his senses. The shopman goes out, at their request, to evangelize on Sabbaths, and they come in betimes to hear Mr. Geymonat in town. Forty of the country people in one place, and thirty in an adjoining farm, come to hear the humble evangelist. A liberal proprietor offers his hall for the meetings, and a large sale of Bibles and tracts takes place in the district. The parish priest is alarmed. He offers Bosi, the countryman, four barrels of oil to return to the Church, but the simple peasant insists on being convinced before he can take the step. A pistol is fired at Bosi one evening, but the threat of death has lost its power. The authorities are investigating the matter, and a process, at the same time, begins against the priest for selling the valuables of his church, and replacing them with tinsel ware, for fear of the new law whereby the Government lays hold of all Church property. But the priest resolves to convince Bosi, and so, conscious of his own stupidity, he invites Padre Cherubino, of Seravezza, a controversial monk, who has preached and printed much of late against Geymonat, Ribet, and Protestantism generally. The monk, on Saturday night last, assures poor Bosi that he will hold a public discussion with one, ten, or fifty of the heretics, there or elsewhere, confute them all, and prove from the very Scriptures the mass, confession, prayers for the dead, &c. The poor countryman seems staggered at the frankness of this monk, who has made many similar challenges, but always failed to appear when Ribet or others accepted the offer. Meanwhile, the day after, Dr. Revel, De Vita, an ex-monk of Salerno, the shopman, and an Evangelical member of the town guard (the latter dressed in soldier apparel), all of them interested deeply in these rustics of Cereena, go out to evangelize among them, receive a warm greeting and a Christian hospitality. For once the monk is fairly caught; so that, putting the best face on a bad business—the separate Roman Catholic and Evangelical services being concluded—he accepts discussion, the open Bible in hand, on justification by faith, and other leading truths of Scripture. The meeting is convened in the large hall of the priest's house; 150 parishioners are present. For three and a-half hours the controversy is carried on, and the speakers part in a more friendly way than could be expected. Need I say that the loud-voiced and manœuvring frate was driven from pillar to post, gave up one passage of Scripture after another, as insufficient to warrant his assertions, and that the auditors clearly saw the terrible shortcoming of his performance from his boasted confutation of the heretics. Such a public discussion, which, with God's blessing, will greatly promote the Evangelical cause, is unique in the history of the work in Italy. The first result has been that twenty strong men of the place have assured Bosi of their protection in every case of need.

SUCCESSFUL PREACHING IN SIENNA AND LUCCA—MISS BURTON, ETC.

It is not often that so much has to be said of Tuscany, where the work has been so sadly hindered and thrown back by the bitter sectarianism of Plymouthism, but I have still further to mention a few gratifying particulars. Sienna, which has been so dead to all former appeals, has at last awakened to the Gospel call, and crowds are flocking around the evangelist Peccennini, whose life has been threatened by the hirelings of the sacristy. In Lucca such steady progress has been made, that a house has been purchased by the congregation; and since the bargain has been completed, it is found to be one of the old chapels of the Evangelical party three centuries ago.

A bazaar on behalf of the Waldensian Evangelical Schools in Florence and Leghorn has just realised here 126*l.* sterling, in addition to the ordinary subscription of 50*l.* made earlier in the winter among the residents and strangers.

Miss Burton (the Miss Marsh of Italy) continues her labours with blessed results among the Italian soldiers. Upwards of 600 men have visited her rooms and been instructed more or less in the Gospel. The letters of some of these recruits, who are absent on leave in Naples or Sicily, are very touching.

Miss Burton has been officially thanked by several officers for the good she has done during the winter to these men.

We are privileged to have now resident in Florence a gentleman of large property, who was a leading instrument of God in connexion with the Kerry revival, Wm. Talbot Croebie, Esq., and who has latterly, along with his servant, been greatly owned of God on board of several English and American men-of-war in the port of Naples.

DR. DE SANCTIS AND THE PLYMOUTH CONTROVERSY.

As a faithful narrator of passing events, I am bound to return to the subject of the Plymouthist controversy now raging in the Italian Churches. I regret to say that the "Declaration" of De Sanctis, referred to in my last letter, was not generally circulated by the evangelists of the Free Italian Churches, to whom it was sent by the author, among the brethren of the Churches, for whom this learned man has zealously laboured in word and doctrine, and through popular treatises, for so many years. Yet, while the ban has been laid on this short and effective tract, explaining the grounds on which every Christian should protest, along with the author, against the Plymouthist pronunciamento made in their name by Mr. Rossetti, a wide circulation has been everywhere given to a captious and vulgar Florence tract, attributed to Mr. Magrini and Count Guicciardini, against the Evangelical Alliance, as designed to destroy Christian principle, and in which the Waldenses are practically excommunicated as sectaries and heretics.

In such circumstances, Dr. De Sanctis returns to the charge in a lengthened pamphlet of eighty-two pages, just published, supporting his "Protest" and "Declaration" by a calm but unsparing exposure of the historic blunders, doctrinal errors, and calumnious assertions of Mr. Rossetti's "Principles of the Romish, Protestant, and Christian Churches," which had been sent forth in the name of the Italian Churches. The excuse with which Plymouthism in Italy has always imposed, and still imposes, on many good English people, is that the Churches are too young as yet to decide upon any form. Dr. De Sanctis tears this frivolous plea to pieces, by showing the point in dispute to be no mere form, but the verities of the Christian faith, and that the Churches have not been too young ignorantly to adopt, pure and simple, under the guidance of a few sectarians, the most rampant principles of Plymouthism. He enters into the work of Rossetti, and lays the Christian world under obligation of intelligent defence of all the Churches; his noble estimate of the services of the Waldenses and the Evangelical Alliance. It is to be hoped that the pamphlet, which is entitled "Theists: Warning to the Evangelical of Italy," will reach the parties for which it is intended, despite the obstacles raised against its introduction. It is an avail that the scandal is now dead. It is too late. Two of the Free Churches in Florence have united in Dr. Aitken's protest, Christians of all the denominations of Christ continue to pour in their sympathies with him, action for or against his views is unavoidable, and far-reaching consequences, for good or ill, in the Italian evangelization may be anticipated.

THE SCOTCH AND ENGLISH SERVICES IN ROME.

Mr. Tulloch, who has spent the winter in Rome, writes from Rome, giving some account of the Protestant services which are attended at Rome. Of the Scotch service a marked feature of which is the union of Christian union it embodies—he says it can scarcely as yet be said to be established, but a fair and hopeful commencement has been made:—

In the last two winters, certain Free Churches have had a private service which was attended at the commencement of the present year by Mr. Carlyle, lately a Free Church minister in Bombay. Shortly afterwards Mr. St. Luke's, Glasgow, arrived. When Mr. Carlyle occupying the field he very readily entered into communication with him, and it has been a happy combination. The service is held in a large room in the Via della Pace where Mr. Carlyle lives—a central and excellent place, above the English Club. Mr. Carlyle undertakes the conduct of the service in the morning, and Mr. Aitken in the afternoon, or vice versa. There is no formal union—each represents his own Church, and merely professes to do so; but there is local concurrence and the most brotherly sympathy. Established Church and Free Church, if not forgotten, are never mentioned, and there is no reason why they should be so. The writer of the present notice has been glad to render any assistance to Mr. Aitken in the discharge of his duties: he was privileged to preach for him on the first Sunday of the New Year, and to assist him in the dispensation of the Lord's Supper last Sunday—a service peculiarly touching in its great simplicity; but he has had no responsibility in the arrangements, and deserves no credit for any success which may attend them. It has been to him peculiarly pleasing to assist in a service so far catholic—a feature which was peculiarly shown last Sunday, when the Lord's Supper was partaken of not only by Established and Free Church communicants together, but by two clergymen from America and a clergyman of the Church of England.

The Church of England service, well known and largely attended as it is, is not formally established. The Papal Government permits it "without the gate" (it is at the outside of the Porta del Popolo), but does not recognise and sanction it; and only this winter Cardinal Antonelli refused permission to have an additional service, in connexion with the Church of England, in a large hall attached to the British Consulate. It is needless to say, therefore, that the Scotch service is unrecognised, and, in fact, only exists because unknown to the Government.

It may interest our readers to learn what provision the Church of England makes during the winter for British residents here. There are at present three Anglican services every Sunday—an interesting morning service having been commenced, to meet the accommodation of the numerous worshippers, at which Dean Alford regularly preaches. The Dean is a quiet, impressive preacher, saying much in few words—not eloquent, but effective and touching, from his comprehensive grasp of Scripture, and the solemn practical turn which he gives to all his discourses. It is well that the Church of England should always maintain a high order of preaching in Rome, for one of the most subtle and silver-toned of the converts to the Church of Rome from her pale is here, and has been for many winters. It is impossible to hear Dr. Manning preach without being deeply struck by his peculiar eloquence, destitute of fire or passion, but clear, insinuating, and deeply earnest, sometimes thrilling in tenderness, sometimes breaking into bursts of poetic beauty.

Frankfort, April 15, 1864.

THE FUTURE OF THE CONTINENT, AND DOES NOT DIRECT THEM.

Mr. von Bismarck has really found out the way for procuring rest. Since he shut the doors of his Parliament, in order to give place to the loud voice of cannon, he speaks any longer about him; nor is he any more disturbed by the ridiculous conference of diplomatists who are about to meet in London with a view "to obtain peace for the Duchies," while these same Duchies are ravaged by the horrors of war. Before the plenipotentiaries of Europe are assembled round a green table-cover, the entrenchments of Düppel will have been taken, and Denmark crushed by the two greatest military Powers in Germany. There peace will be made by force, without diplomatists. Holstein itself has not awaited their deliberations to dispose of its future.

The States (representatives) of this little region have assembled spontaneously; they have protested beforehand against every diplomatic decision which might be come to without them, and they have been supported in this by the magistracy of the towns, by the whole people, and finally by the assembly of the clergy recently convened at Neumünster. The conference will therefore only have to register what has been already done. Decidedly the reign of diplomacy is passed.

But let us leave politics, and occupy ourselves for a few moments with facts of a moral and religious nature, which come up amid this terrible conflict. Since my last letter the clergy of all the Protestant portions of Germany have continued sending to the pastors of Holstein addresses of approval and of sympathy, and at the same time energetic protestations against the Kreuzzeitung, which, on its part, continues to condemn them. Never has this organ of political and religious despotism, this unhappy advocate of Herr von Bismark, been the object of reprobation so universal as at the present moment. It is no longer political characters alone who combat its retrograde principles in the name of liberty, but religious men of all churches, who repudiate them in the name of conscience. Several of these manifestations altogether lay aside the political question, in order to plead only the cause of the religious and moral interests of Holstein.

This is what, in particular, the professors of the University of Berlin and the pastors of that city have done. In a petition addressed to the King of Prussia, and signed with the names which are most justly respected—such as, among others, Nitzsch, Twesten, Dörner, Hoffmann, Büchsel, &c., &c.,—they have intimated to this monarch the system vigorously pursued by Denmark, of imposing upon German populations the Danish language in establishments for public instruction, and in the worship of the Church. In a host of parishes, the pastors and schoolmasters expelled since the year 1848 had been replaced by Danish functionaries; the schools and churches remained empty, because the populations were unwilling either to receive public instruction or to hear the preaching of the Gospel in a language which they did not understand. Those who signed the petition, therefore, asked of the King of Prussia the redress of these abuses. The King replied that this object lay very near his heart, and that it was one of the reasons for which he had sent his army into the Duchies.

Whether this was indeed one of the motives of Count von Bismark, and, above all, of the Emperor of Austria, in undertaking the war, is what we are permitted to doubt. However that may be, the fact is, that already the Federal Commissioners in Holstein have taken divers measures for re-introducing the German language into public instruction and into divine service. Several Danish professors, teachers, and pastors have been replaced by Germans. On its part, the Danish Government, in its recent circular to the different Cabinets of Europe, complains of these measures, pretending that the German language is imposed upon Danish populations. Thus it is that moral and religious interests are always involved and agitated by political struggles. For this immense evil there is but one remedy—the cessation of State religions and National churches, by the complete separation of politics and religion. This holy cause of religious liberty makes rapid progress in all those countries of the Continent where civil and political liberty reign; but it is unhappily very little recognised and practised as yet in Germany and the North of Europe.

MORAL CONFLICTS SIDE BY SIDE WITH WAR.

Another order of religious facts which manifests itself in this war, and upon which our thought gladly rests amid these terrible calamities, is the immense activity displayed by Christians for relieving the sufferings of the soldiers, and for offering to their immortal souls, in the midst of dangers, the consolations and hopes of the Gospel of Christ. Protestants and Catholics nobly rival each other in these works of benevolence. Abundant distributions of the Holy Scriptures and religious books; personal attentions lavished upon the sick in the hospitals, and on the wounded in the lazarettos; distributions of medical comforts and of warm clothing during the rigours of winter;—everything has been undertaken and prosecuted with admirable constancy by Christian charity. Thousands of copies of the Holy Scriptures have been sold to the soldiers of the different nationalities which compose the Federal armies by four or five colporteurs of the British and Foreign Bible Society. To organise this work, and to assign to every one his task, the agent of the society, the Rev. Mr. Davies, has gone from Frankfort to Holstein and Schleswig, where all possible facilities have been accorded him by the civil and military authorities, and where he has found a vast field for the work to which he consecrates his intelli-and his devotedness. On their arrival at na, the colporteurs found themselves in the presence of a Hungarian regiment. Not able to speak to these soldiers in an own language, they contented themselves showing them the New Testament in Hungarian tongue. Immediately the rank cried out full of joy "Magyar! Magyar!" and in a few moments the whole of the colporteurs was exhausted by brave warriors, who paid the price of with pleasure. One of them, having money, drew from his pocket his handkerchief which he offered, with a sad countenance, to the regiment. Thus the colporteurs have access to barracks, to the camps, to the hospitals, to the lazarettos, distributing abundantly words of the Saviour to those thousands of men, who, in the sufferings of war, may find from them the knowledge of eternal life.

CHRISTIAN BENEFICENCE IN WAR.

The excellent Dr. Wichern, founder of the noble institution called the Rauhen Haus, Hamburg, has also betaken himself to theatre of war, in order to set in action the "brethren," pupils of his establishments, and particularly instructed in the duties to be given to the sick. Their intelligent activity is displayed among the dead, whether on the field of battle or in the lazarettos and the hospitals. Dr. Wichern has also found in full activity other "brethren" from the institutions at Duisburg; and numerous Deaconesses from Kaiserswerth and the establishment of Bethany, Berlin. Finally, the order of Knights of St. John, founded by the late King of Prussia, which includes in its ranks the greatest nobles of the aristocracy of the kingdom, has found in the actual war an immense field of action among the sick and wounded. This order has founded, at its own expense, sundry lazarettos, where the administration of the sick might not be equal to the emergency. Private persons have not shown themselves more earnest than associations in these works of Christian charity. The houses of the poor of the rich are everywhere open to receive and minister to the wounded. And it must be added that the Danish soldiers, the wounded or prisoners of war, have been everywhere the objects of the same solicitude as those of the German armies. On his return to Berlin, Dr. Wichern gave the most interesting details concerning this noble activity in a numerous meeting, at which the Queen and several members of the Royal Family were present. He there showed that almost all the services rendered in the numerous lazarettos and hospitals are performed, under the direction of army surgeons, by the voluntary hands and devotedness of "brethren" and "sisters," as well Protestants as Catholics. We must also notice what there is new in this activity of Christian charity amid the disasters of war. It reminds us of the noble example of it which was given in the Crimean war by Miss Nightingale and her numerous English friends. Formerly, and even still, in the terrible wars of the empire nothing like it has been seen; an evident and cheering proof of the progress of Christianity, for which we ought to give glory and thanks to the Saviour of a sinful and suffering world. How many words of consolation and of Christian hope have thus fallen into the souls of the poor soldiers—prisoners, wounded, and dying! Neither have the spiritual and intellectual necessities of the armies been more neglected than their physical sufferings. Besides the distribution of Holy Scriptures of which we have spoken, several tract societies have also set themselves to the work, and Dr. Wichern has had the happy idea of addressing an appeal to the principal booksellers of Germany, from whom he has obtained thousands of volumes suitable for placing in the hands of the soldiers and officers. Thus, if we are permitted to deplore this war in its causes and in its effects, it is also permitted to rejoice as we see love for the Saviour strive to mitigate its woes; it is in fine permitted to hope that it will have been to many the very unlooked for occasion of their finding the way of salvation.

COMPOSITION OF THE COLLEGE OF CARDINALS AND THE ELECTION OF A NEW POPE.

Before concluding, let us cast a glance upon a very different domain. At a moment when the public journals are constantly speaking of the enfeebled health of the Pope and his approaching death, one German journal supplies us with details, not without interest, in reference to the actual composition of the Sacred College of Cardinals, on whom would be incumbent the difficult task of electing a new Pope. Under present circumstances, there is no one who does not feel the importance of this eventuality. Now the Pontifical Annual for the year 1864 reckons sixty-four members to the Sacred College, among whom seventeen remain of the nominations of Pope Gregory XVI. The oldest of the cardinals, Antonio Fosti, is eighty-eight; the oldest in regard to his nomination is Mario Mattei, aged seventy-two, and has been cardinal thirty-two years. Four cardinals are more than eighty years old, and twelve are more than seventy. We may then be allowed to think that the influence of all these old men, in case of an election, would be exerted in favour of the retrograde ideas of another generation, and would hardly contemplate the necessities of modern society. As to nationalities, the College of Cardinals counts eight Frenchmen, six Germans and Hungarians, four Spaniards, one Portuguese, one Englishman, and one Belgian, or twenty-one foreigners in all; so that all the others, forty-three in number, are Italians. There is no need of imagination to suppose that a body thus composed would not have the least desire to enter into the path of conciliation for the political regeneration of Italy, and of Catholicism in general, but would have no other thought than to elect a man who would continue the desperate conflict of Pius IX., against the interests and progress of modern civilization. For the rest, it is affirmed that the principal Catholic Powers of Europe, and in particular the Emperor Napoleon, who rules at Rome, have this long while given secret instructions to their ambassadors in reference to the eventuality of which we have spoken. There will then be a secret struggle of influences which are much more political than religious. Now as, according to the Catholic doctrine, it is by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit that the cardinals elect the Pope, a malicious journal has recently asked whether the Holy Spirit would be sent this time from Paris or from Vienna? Instead of a jest, fervent prayers ought to be addressed by all Christians to God, almighty and merciful, that in times as serious as our the great events of which we are witnesses may have for their result the advancement of His kingdom of truth, justice, and peace.

DENMARK.

We have been compelled to abridge the subjoined communication from a Danish correspondent; but we are assured that the omissions thus made will be more likely to secure the perusal of that which appears:—

Jetsmark, April 14, 1864.

PERSECUTION OF THE CHURCH OF SCHLESWIG.

The Germans have pretended that the Schleswig Church was persecuted by the Danish Government, because preachers were deposed, and the Danish language was introduced in the churches. Up to the 29th March the bishop and forty-seven pastors had been deprived by the Prussian and Austrian commissioners, and ejected from Schleswig, or informed that they soon will be ejected, merely because they are loyal subjects of their king. If the German assertion is true, that the deposition of pastors merely on political grounds constitutes a religious persecution, then a religious persecution has actually taken place in Schleswig, where pastors who are loyal subjects of their king are ejected on that sole ground. I need not add, that several of these pastors are personally known by me to be persons who would be an ornament to any church—Christian and zealous men—and that not a few of them are natives of Schleswig, several of Holstein, one of Mecklenburgh, and one of Hesse. The Germans assert that when the language used in churches is altered, a religious persecution takes place. In 1850, the Government required that in Danish parishes the Danish language was to be used; in German and Frisonian parishes, the German language; in parishes with a mixed population of Danes and Germans, both languages. The Prussian and Austrian commissioners have decided otherwise. They have commanded the pastors of these mixed congregations to declare that they will aid the commissioners in Germanising their parishes, and the pastors who would not sign such a declaration have been deposed. The commissioners issued, February 19th, a decree, by which in many of the mixed congregations the Danish language was forbidden to be used in the churches, and it is said that the other mixed congregations already are, or soon are to be, deprived of their Danish language. At Adelby, a village one mile from Flensburg, sixty-nine children were to be confirmed on February 21, and all the parents of the children had demanded that the confirmation should be performed in the Danish language; but on February 20 a decree from the German commissioners commanded that the confirmation should be performed in the German language, contrary to the wishes of the parents. Already one sees German pastors exult in German journals, that if things go on as they have commenced, the Danish element in the mixed districts will soon be eradicated, allowing, by these words, what hitherto they always have denied, that the Danish element is to be found in these mixed districts.

Taking the two facts which German Christians pretend do constitute a religious persecution, I assert that the Schleswig Church does suffer a very severe religious persecution from the German Powers, and singularly enough, without eliciting any protest whatever from those Christians and theologians who protested against the just measures of the Danish Government in Schleswig. Would to God that their eyes might be opened to what are the true bearings of this matter! and would to God that all might learn to render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's!

MISSION WORK IN THE ARMY.

During the sad times with which our dear Lord in His wisdom has been pleased to visit our dear little country, and when almost all our thoughts again and again revert to our national disasters, much happens that must rejoice a Christian's heart. When one considers that we are a little and comparatively poor people, and sees the large donations of money, victuals, and clothes, with which our soldiers, their families, their widows and children, are liberally provided, one cannot but rejoice at these tokens of patriotism and philanthropy that often emanates from Christian acts. Nor are the bodily wants of the soldiers less thought of; their spiritual needs have begun to be cared for. The Government has sent several excellent men to the army as chaplains; the Tract Society has supplied the hospitals with tracts, and endeavours, as well as its scanty means will allow, to supply the active army therein; the Bible Society also has made considerable grants to the army. The Home Missionary Society has sent out several colporteurs, jointly with the chaplains, labour amongst the soldiers. Stirred up by a lady belonging to one of our first families, it has circulated an appeal to Christians to aid it in its work amongst the soldiers. Notwithstanding the large claims on the Christian's benevolence in these times, this appeal has been largely responded to, and every number of the Home Missionary Journal brings fresh lists of donations, principally collected amongst the peasantry. When a nation fights for its independence and liberty against a foe twenty or thirty fold more numerous, and its highest earthly interests are hazarded, we cannot wonder that the present time is not the best for the furtherance of the kingdom of our Lord. Yet His cause does make progress, and one cannot but be rejoiced when he reads the truly Christian letters which many of our soldiers send to their families in their dear homes. Would to God that they may fight as bravely and perseveringly for their heavenly fatherland as they fight for their earthly! and would to God that we may come thither, when all the strifes, discords, and misunderstandings of this world are banished for evermore!

HOLLAND.

Amid the prevailing absence of spiritual life in the Dutch Protestant Churches, it is cheering to receive an occasional letter like the following:—

Amsterdam, April 15, 1864.

BAPTISM OF A CHINESE CONVERT.

On the 20th of last month a young Chinese, sin Hea, was baptized here by the Rev. Dr. Ambrock, and a few lines regarding that interesting event will, no doubt, be acceptable to the readers of Evangelical Christendom.

Born at Shanghai, about eighteen years ago, he was taken, in 1859, to Macao and offered for sale to his step-mother, when Captain Verhoeven, of the Dutch ship Jeannette Cornelia, bought him for 41. 10s., in order to his being brought up as a Christian. Friends of the mission cause resolved that if he, on growing up, showed a fitness and disposition for missionary work, they would prepare him for labouring among the Chinese in Java. As time passed, an impediment in his speech began to show itself, which unless cured would be a hindrance to his being employed as a missionary, but in all other respects he seems to remain well.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE SPREAD OF THE TRUTH.

The lay association, called the Society for the Spread of the Truth, goes forward with zeal and success. The principal building has been enlarged at an expense of nearly 700*l.*, chiefly raised by an appeal to the members and friends. From the report for 1862-3, it appears that during the year 14,000 tracts, 400 books, 55 Bibles and Testaments, had been distributed; 2,000 children, taught by 88 male and female teachers, attended the 16 Sabbath-schools; 1,200 visits were made to families living without ordinances, also to 80 ships; 89 persons, of whom 21 were formerly Roman Catholics, had been admitted members of Protestant churches; 43,062 volumes were lent out of the free libraries; 104 females had taken advantage of residing, for a longer or shorter period, in the lodging-house; in the sewing, knitting, and drawing-schools (for boys learning trades) were 582 pupils, and in the infant-school 387.

AMSTERDAM CITY MISSION WORK.

The zealous and faithful Rev. Adama von Scheltema, one of the city ministers, has also pushed forward successfully the erection of a mission-house, in which to meet with the poor in his district, for reading the Bible, prayer, and other religious purposes. It is the first of the kind in Holland, and he has had many difficulties to overcome. In November last, the burgomaster, in name of the king, laid the foundation-stone, and the building is now nearly completed, while by subscriptions raised in this country, aided by friends in Glasgow and elsewhere, together with the proceeds of a bazaar, which is being held, it will be nearly free of debt, his Majesty William III., on a recent visit to Amsterdam, having also contributed 200 florins.

A PASTOR OF PECULIAR SENTIMENTS WANTED.

A vacancy occurred, some time ago, in the French Protestant Church in this city, and there has been considerable delay in filling it up, as the rulers wish to have a minister neither too far advanced in liberalism, nor yet strictly orthodox. I am rather curious to see what choice will be made, and fear that the result of a selection on such principles will be anything but satisfactory.

PALESTINE.

We are indebted to a missionary of the American Board for the following account of the services of a memorable Lord's-day in the ancient city of Sidon, where, as he remarks, as early as the days of Paul, there were found Christian friends with whom the Apostle could "refresh himself," when on his way to Rome, "a prisoner of Jesus Christ":—

Sidon, February 19, 1864.

NEW PROTESTANT CHURCH AT SIDON: OPENING SERVICES.

Sabbath before last witnessed the dedication to God of the first house of spiritual worship that has been built in Sidon for many a century, if, indeed, there was ever such a one built here. Evangelical worship has indeed been established in this city for nearly or quite fourteen years; but it has always been celebrated in a private house, and latterly the only apartments which could be secured for this purpose were so unsuitable and so inconvenient of access, that none could be expected to resort thither except those who had a very earnest and decided interest in the truth. To remedy this evil was not an easy matter when the congregation was so small and so poor, and while the policy of our Missionary Board (wisely enough) prohibits us from asking money of them to build churches, even at the more important stations. But God raised up for us a friend in our need, and through the liberality of Hugh Tennent, Esq., of Glasgow, the "Well Park Chapel" has been erected. It is a neat edifice—small, indeed, compared with ordinary churches in Christian lands, but large enough, as we supposed, for any audience we were likely to see gathered in it for some years to come. But on the Sabbath referred to, it being generally known that the chapel was to be dedicated, and that the sermon would be preached by Dr. Van Dyck, of Beyrout, whose labours for the people of Sidon in former years have greatly endeared him to them all, a crowd gathered larger than could be accommodated, at least in the part appropriated to the men; so that quite a number went away, unable to find an entrance. The preacher most forcibly described the essential requisites of a house intended for the spiritual worship of God, as contrasted with the darkened temples devoted to superstitious rites, or the ostentatious piles on which is too often wasted the wealth of even Protestant Christians—wealth that might carry the bread of life to thousands who are perishing for lack of it. The sermon was listened to with deep attention, and seemed to bring home the truth to all hearts, even those of the Papists who were present. In the afternoon a goodly number assembled for the celebration of the Lord's Supper, when two new members were admitted to the communion, and the ordinance of baptism was also administered. It was a day of joy and hope to the little band of Evangelical Christians in Sidon, not only as giving them a place wherein they can worship God with propriety and cheerfulness, but as offering a prospect that the words of saving truth will thus reach very many who would never have come to hear them in our former obscure and gloomy place of meeting.

The location of the new chapel is central and convenient, and it is invested with additional interest in the eyes of the Sidonians, from its having been the site of the Mahkemey, or Moslem court of law, a place esteemed by the Mohammedans nearly as sacred as the mosque. Here for many years was the focus of Moslem fanaticism and Christians could not pass it without trembling. Both Christians and Moslems are astonished to see it now converted into a church, and we ourselves cannot but wonder that we have been enabled to obtain possession of such a place, and erect there a Christian church without a word of opposition or even a question asked from any quarter what ever. It is surrounded by Moslem houses, and the minarets of two mosques rise in rather close proximity, and yet our bell rings out the summons to the worship of Jesus, without the least manifestation of displeasure. We feel that the hand of God is in it, and we are encouraged to believe that He will make this a house to His praise and glory, and the gate of heaven to many souls. Will not all who read these lines pray that it may be even so?

Bhamdun, Mount Lebanon,
February 19, 1864.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE LEBANON—PROTESTANT SCHOOLS—THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

Of all the achievements of this age of progress, no event seems to have been more wonderful or providential than the permanent establishment of a Christian Government in Mount Lebanon. Lebanon has become a distinct province, and of forty provinces has the only Christian governor, Daoud Pasha, from the terrible scenes of 1860. Long may his Excellency continue to govern the mountain in a policy so liberal and honourable, and an administration so efficient and successful!

Under this Christian Government, guaranteed by the Great Powers of Europe, Mount Lebanon is now a most deeply-interesting field for missionary labour. It extends a hundred miles from north to south, and twenty-five miles from east to west, containing a population of perhaps 400,000 souls. In its immediate evangelization we have the highest hope for the moral emancipation of Syria; and all the agencies and means for that earliest evangelization have been inaugurated here, and in Europe and the United States, for the consummation of this great and powerful work of the Lord.

In the first rank of these agencies and means the Lord has placed the Lebanon schools. These schools, commenced in 1853, numbered twenty-four in 1863, situated in twenty different villages, contain 1,500 pupils from all communities, Christians and Druses, Jews and Mohammedans.

I am happy to say a little band of nearly forty has been gathered to Christian fellowship at Bhamdun. We observed here as well as at Beyrout the weekly concert of prayer in January.

CHINA.

A missionary of the American Board writes to us as follows:—

Fuh-chau, China, January 11, 1864.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER IN FUH-CHAU.

The fourth observance of the annual Week of Prayer at this place has just been closed. The missionaries of the societies represented here who were present in the place very generally attended, with their families, the various appointments. We are beginning to feel that this annual concert of prayer for one week is an established institution. We rejoice in the fact that so many churches and communities, besides missionaries in many mission-fields, observe it. It was remarked at one of the prayer-meetings that our number was smaller than last year. The missionary and his wife have been called to leave the work, on account of impaired health. Another missionary has died in the happy hope of a glorious resurrection. Another missionary and family will soon leave China, on account of his health. Two missionaries were providentially ports at this protracted season of the present last January.

irring news from my field of labour encouraging signs are, however, not in my school and in our village. ling is training young natives for hera. By the grace of God we have my former scholars labouring with nsive mission-field. Some of the present class are promising young them baptized, and two are appli- tion. Those less gifted become hools connected with our society. ut year only a few have been admitted into the Church. Four persons have applied for baptism. Amongst the former was one of the older men of our village, long acquainted with the Gospel, but still reluctant to break with heathenism till brought to the verge of the grave by severe illness. He called for me, after having hired several Chinese doctors, and asked leave to remove to our house. I assented, but his relatives hesitated, saying he was mad. There was something wrong with him, but neither the cause nor the extent of it was I able to detect. He at last declined to take food in his house, for fear of being poisoned. I now interfered on his behalf, and succeeded in obtaining the consent to his removal. As soon as he was in our house a change was perceivable. He grew better, though very slowly; of madness there was no sign; he felt himself very comfortable amongst us. After some days he was taken home again and grew worse, so that his family allowed him a second time to stay with us. He soon applied for baptism with great urgency, saying, "I wish to become a Christian; I don't know how soon I may die, and will die as a Christian." I could not immediately comply with his request, he being an opium smoker; but taking his circumstances into account, I instructed him with two others, who for some time had applied for baptism. His disease was of such a kind that medicine was of little avail, so I told him to rely solely upon God for his recovery. Yet his faith was not yet confirmed. A Chinese physician in the neighbourhood promised to cure him, and he went wholly against my wish. For two months I heard nothing of him, till he one day entered my room quite unexpectedly, to all appearance recovered, but still very weak. He confessed that the doctor had not cured him; but rest of mind, the change of air, and nourishing food had, by the grace of God, effected his recovery; so that he, formerly scarcely able to walk from one room to the other, was able to walk home a distance of several miles. He now became a constant attendant at our daily services, and kept close communion with the members of the Church; but still he smoked opium, being afraid of giving it up in his weak state of health. It is often the case that a Chinese physician, being unable to effect a cure, advises his patient to try opium-smoking. In many instances the malady is checked by this powerful narcotic; but the patient becomes the victim of opium. To abstain from the use of it would cause the former disease to appear again. My patient entertained a similar fear, though I stated it as my conviction that the abstinence from opium would complete his recovery. At length he yielded. He diminished his dose of opium daily, and was soon free from this vice. His health improved day by day. I could now comply with his repeated requests for baptism. After the preparatory instructions, he was accordingly received into the Church, and has ever since shown himself a sincere Christian.

This conversion has made a commotion in the village. The people think it remarkable that a man, being declared mad by his parents and wife, and suffering from an apparently incurable disease, should have become restored in body and soul after having joined the Christians. His giving up opium smoking without experiencing any injurious consequences, is another cause of astonishment to them. I am, however, afraid that it will subside without leading them to follow his example or examining the truth which made him free.

A case like the above is an exception, at least in my experience. The Chinese pass from heathenism to Christianity so smoothly, that one not acquainted with them might well doubt their conversion. How often have I longed to see the undoubted proofs of repentance, like those evinced in the conversion of persons at home, or to hear them, constrained by a deep conviction of sin, make a free confession of it. With the exception of three of our assistants and two pupils of my present class, I do not remember to have experienced this during my ministration in China. How seldom do they feel the need of spiritual advice, or the necessity of asking for intercession on their behalf! Of course they desert the idols and other superstitious customs; they attend the church, and use the means of grace, but still there remains the sad want of spirituality. Few of them think it their duty to spread the truth amongst their relatives and try to lead others to Christ. Most of them seem to be satisfied, to have found the truth themselves, leaving it to the paid agents to disseminate the Gospel amongst the heathen, like those at home, who, having contributed the mite to the mission fund, think their duty at an end. On the other hand, I must confess that some of them have given proof of their faith, by suffering persecution from heathen as well as from their relatives, and adorned their profession by Christian life, but these cases are few.

I speak thus freely about the want of our churches, not in order to make the friends at home despair of our final success, or to damp the expectations and hope, but to let them know what we and they have to pray. It requires the combined efforts of the Christian Church abroad to make intercession at the throne of grace, not only for the conversion of the heathen, but, above all, for the churches gathered in heathen lands which, having just emerged out of spiritual darkness, and being still surrounded by darkness, have to wrestle for their spiritual existence with the power of darkness more than their sister-churches in more favoured lands.

New York, April 8, 1864.

REVIVALS IN NEW ENGLAND.

The signs of religious interest in our country do not diminish, but increase; and they are distributed very widely. Many towns in New England are enjoying remarkable revivals; among the rest, Northampton, Mass., the scene of that "surprising work of God," of which Edwards was the instrument, a hundred and thirty years ago. Springfield, also, the beautiful seat of our national armoury, is visited by an awakening so considerable in its extent and effects, as to command the respectful testimony of the secular press. But the most compact account which I could give of the towns and churches which are similarly favoured, would more than fill my letter. Let me only say, that most encouraging statements are made concerning many parts of the State of New York; concerning parts of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. All this, as I said a month ago, does not by any means indicate a revival of religion all through the nation; but it does evince a measure of interest in spiritual things which would be remarkable at any time, and which is especially becoming and encouraging in a time like this.

CONVERSIONS IN THE ARMY.

There are two developments of this extensive interest which we watch with great delight. Much has been said of late of the religious feeling prevailing in many parts of the army, and cautious readers have been afraid to credit the glowing statements which they have seen. The last few days, however, have brought to us the most trustworthy testimony of well-known pastors of Philadelphia and New York, who have returned to their own large congregations after weeks of absence laboriously employed among the soldiers. These gentlemen fully confirm the accounts which have been given by other observers. Rev. Mr. Corkman, of New York, states that in one camp of the Army of the Potomac containing about 5,000 men, he witnessed credible conversions as numerous as seven in a week, and that this great work is still going on. Other witnesses, who equally command the confidence of the community, bear testimony to results scarcely less remarkable which are crowning the labours of Christian ministers and others in the neighbourhood of Charleston, South Carolina; of Fernandina and St. Augustine, Florida; and of New Orleans. That all these seeming conversions will prove to be real, is not to be expected. No doubt those very features of a soldier's life which, in the absence of religious influences, tend to harden him into recklessness may greatly increase his susceptibility to anxious and tender feeling, when once a wise and opportune appeal may have reached him and this natural emotion may easily be mistaken for the proof of a substantial change. But when these deductions are all made, solid and abundant evidence remains that multitudes of our soldiers are finding in the camp and in the hospital that blessing of salvation which they never found at home. The men who labour among the sick and wounded especially, gather up many touching proofs of the power of God's grace, which, if you readers could know them, would seem as if and fragrant as those early violets which are now blooming out of the last year's battle-fields.

PRAYER ANSWERED FOR COLLEGES AND SEMINARIES.

It is a matter of great joy to us that the existing religious interest extends to so many of our colleges and seminaries. The American Churches have for years observed the fourth Thursday of February as "the Day of Prayer for Colleges." The observance has, from the first, been most serious and hearty, and it has been followed almost uniformly by speedy and precious results. It is easy to see why this might be so, for the increased interest and efforts of pious parents and teachers would be the direct means of answering their own petitions. By this time, moreover, the day has a history, and both teachers and students expect results to follow it. The experience of this year will not diminish that expectation. I have before me the names of six of our colleges and large seminaries in which a work of grace is going forward. The most remarkable case, perhaps, is that of La Fayette College, in Easton, Pennsylvania, in which, according to the statement of its president, there is not a single student who is not either converted or deeply impressed. In this college the unusual seriousness began within a fortnight of the "day of prayer." In Williams College, Mass., it began upon that very day; and within a week forty young men were either "rejoicing in hope" or openly confessing their sins and their need. The female seminary at Mount Holyoke, Mass., has had in former years a remarkable religious history, and has educated many American women for distinguished usefulness both at home and among the heathen. In the beginning of last September the school included among its 340 pupils 110 who were not known as Christians. At different times in the autumn and since, that number has been diminished, until there remains only about thirty who do not give evidence of conversion. Rev. Dr. Kirk, of Boston, has been one of the helpers and witnesses of this good work.

CIRCULATION OF THE SCRIPTURES — BIBLES SENT FROM THE NORTH TO THE SOUTH.

The American Bible Society, at its approaching anniversary, will report a great work most generously supported. Its issues of Bibles and Testaments during the year ending March 31, 1864, have exceeded 1,400,000. Its income for the same year has been more than 550,000 dols., which is an excess of more than 125,000 dols. over the previous year. A considerable part of this large sum has been expended upon its foreign work in Papal and heathen countries. But the chief outlay has been made upon the domestic field, which the war has so thoroughly ploughed for the seed. It ought to be known—not so much for the reputation of the society as for the Christianity of our nation—how large that domestic field has been considered to be. A correspondence between the Bible Society of Virginia and the American Bible Society has recently been published, and has attracted general attention. I enclose you a copy of it. From this it will appear that the American Bible Society, so far from ever declining to furnish Bibles to the South, has, according to its avowed purpose, responded to every call which has been made upon it from that quarter; and that nothing but those interruptions of transportation which have been incident to the war has ever prevented the prompt receipt of any supplies which may have been asked for. More than two hundred thousand volumes had been thus gratuitously furnished to the South—especially to the Confederate armies—before the close of the year 1863. The multitudes of British Christians who wish to think well of American piety will be glad to know these facts.

THE MONSTER FAIR.

Our monster fair for the relief of the sick and wounded soldiers is under full headway. The enthusiasm is unbounded. If patriotism and tender kindness were not so largely concerned in it, we would call it frenzy. We are told that the receipts of two days have been 250,000 dols.

BRITISH AMERICA.

MISSION WORK AMONG THE ABORIGINES OF THE NORTH-WEST.

The Church Missionary Society has three stations on the shores of Hudson's Bay, each of which—as indeed is the case with all the stations in the North-West—forms a centre, and the missionary extends his labours, to considerable distances, wherever human beings are to be found. At one of these—Moose Fort—there are no fewer than 1,800 aborigines either baptized or desiring baptism; the annual increase by baptism, last reported was 112. Dispersed as these are over a wide territory, the numbers must be regarded as considerable. They comprise Indians and Esquimaux. Natives instructed in the tenets of the Romish Church were despatched by their priests in Canada to some of the posts in this region for the purpose of making converts, but they have failed of success.

Farther west, at English River, the missionary describes the country as in a transition state, and his work as being influenced by the change. "Free-traders," he writes, "are approaching us, and the Indians are kept as much as possible from the leading thoroughfares of the country by the influence of the [Hudson's Bay] Company." The result is a conviction that it is a fruitless expenditure of strength and means to endeavour to benefit the Chipewyans from this place as a centre, and that a post further north must be occupied. There is encouragement to do this in the anxiety displayed by the tribe for instruction. The Rev. T. T. Smith, a newly-arrived missionary, writes in his journal :—

During their late visits to the station their wail has been, "We have been deceived : after waiting these many years, the teacher who has now come cannot come to see us : for the other teacher is going home. We must go to the priests."

Mr. Smith therefore started on an exploratory journey to the Chipewyan country. Of the perils and hardships of travelling in the North-West he and his fellow-labourers afford us some vivid impressions in their respective journals. On this occasion, the missionary set out with an Indian and a boy, the party having to haul two sledges, containing their provisions and bedding. Encamped at sunset, they retired to rest ; but soon after midnight they were compelled, from the intense cold (upwards of forty degrees below zero), to rise and sit up. After a few days spent in visiting some scattered groups of natives, an accident to his Indian attendant compelled the missionary to bend his course homewards, alone, a distance of 100 miles, hauling his sledge as he went. On his way, he tells us—

The monotony of the vast expanse pressed heavily upon the mind. But how many voices there are this day [it was the Sabbath] lifted up on behalf of "those who travel by land or by water !" Tried to join mentally in the sublime Litany of our Church with the great voice of prayer and praise which ascends this day before the throne of the Redeemer. Last night, in the still darkness, my mind was with the dear brethren at Islington, and the words of their Saturday-evening prayer came forcibly to my mind to cheer and encourage.

Night drew on, and there was no track ; but the light at the last long lake was just sufficient to enable him to see the hill, under which, in a cache, were deposited his provisions :—

Just at the time, also, a star shone out of the rich golden light of the sunset exactly over the hill. Keeping the star in view, I went on with more confidence. Soon the outline of the hill was lost in the darkness, but the star shone out with greater brilliancy. I now had fears that I had struck into the wrong bay, but there was now no hope but to gain the shore. Looking up at last to the faithful star, the bundle appeared in relief against the sky, as we had placed it, on the end of a long pole stuck in a hole in the ice. This was a great cause of thankfulness : I had been led straight to it. A mixture of pemican and flour was soon simmering in the pot, and after that had been disposed of, tea was made, and I lay down to sleep.

Three nights was he thus travelling alone—a hazardous undertaking which even few of the old servants of the Hudson's Bay Company have encountered.

Mr. Smith narrates that after preaching to a group of Chipewyans, whom he met for the first time, he gave them leave to ask any questions they pleased :—

The old man of the party spoke first. He said that he was glad that he now saw a minister, for whom he had been longing for such a time. Several questions were then asked and answered. The first was amusing, but significant—"Do the praying men who come from the far country know all about a man directly they see him ? What a testimony to the power of the Word of God ! Another was—"You tell us that Jesus will come again to separate the bad from the good : does the book say when He will come ?" The old man then spoke—"I have come from far : my son beat the track for me before me : it reminded me of the Son of God, who has broken the track to heaven for us." Then he asked a question rather timidly—"When I get up in the morning, and at night when I think upon the works of God, I say to the sun, moon, and stars, and this earth, 'The God that made you bless me and take care of me : am I right in doing so ? My people say I am wrong ; you will tell me.'" This led me to point to Jesus Christ as the manifestation of God.

The Chipewyans were not satisfied with the visits of a missionary ; they wanted one located among them, and sent down deputation after deputation for that purpose, to English River station. At length, as his Indian friends assured him that there was "fish at the door, and sufficient wood to build with," the missionary decided to go, sending first, however, a carpenter and his son to construct a house. Wollaston Lake, their destination, was reached after a journey of twelve days :—

There they were greeted by a large party of Chipewyans with firing of guns and such-like Indian demonstrations. A feast of fat things was then prepared, and they sat down to partake of such a dish of meat as never greeted their eyes in this district of the country before. They then delivered their message concerning our desire to do something for them, and stated that we wished to help them, if there was a corresponding desire their part to assist us in what we would do. After a conference among themselves, the Indians then said that they were willing to meet with work, and would send help on the morrow. Another feast was then prepared, to ratify the treaty, I suppose, and the day's proceedings terminated. On the morrow, men, women, and children came and lent a willing hand: trees were felled at some distance off, and brought upon canoes to the spot selected. One hundred and twenty hewn up were thus collected and landed. A requisite number were then squared and groved, and a moderate-sized house was erected and finished, with the exception of the roof: wood sufficient in quantity was left to erect another house, should it be needed.

After his successful expedition, the carpenter returned, and a schoolmaster, accompanied by a Cree and his wife, was despatched:—

A Romish priest was in the boat to the head of the lake, and signified his intention of following Adams the [schoolmaster] to Wollaston Lake. There is another priest and two brothers already at the north end of Deer Lake. Adam says: "I am uneasy about these priests thinking to go to Wollaston Lake, but in the strength of the Lord alone we will be able to stand."

The missionary tells us that, placed "in the forefront of battle," he "feels that his honour is at stake if he steps not forward into the very ranks of the enemy." Can those at home who share his faith do less than, as he asks, sustain him by their prayers and the means at their disposal?

MEETING OF CONVOCATION.

The Convocation of the Province of Canterbury met on Tuesday, the 19th of last month, and sat four days. Dr. Gilbert Eliot, Dean of Bristol, having resigned the office of Chancellor of the Lower House, which he had long held, Archdeacon Bickersteth was unanimously elected in his room—the honour having previously been declined by Canon Wordsworth and Dr. Jelf.

The first business of importance that came before the Upper House was the report from a committee that had been appointed to inquire whether it would be desirable by authority to license lay teachers to assist incumbents in house to house visitation and teaching, and what should be the qualifications of such lay teachers. The committee recommended that every incumbent of a parish should be empowered to recommend one or two of his parishioners, being communicants, to be lay teachers to help him; that the bishop should issue, by authority, his licence to those persons, to extend to the 31st of December, those licences being necessarily renewable, if not asked to be renewed, in six months. They recommended that it should be left to the discretion of the bishop to fix the qualifications of the proposed teachers by examination, and that the duties of these persons should be, in addition to the usually performed by district visitors, to visit and pray with the sick and infirm, to visit cottage and schoolroom lectures, and to hold short religious services in hamlets; that they should be entrusted with the management of parochial charities. The committee thought it would be right that the incumbent should have the power of assigning a stipend to the new lay teachers where necessary, but they did not consider it necessary to give any specific name to the new order.

The Bishop of London, who brought up the report of the committee, moved its adoption, and urged, as a singular corroboration of its fitness and adaptability to the wants of the time, that a committee of laymen and clergymen who had been appointed to consider how the spiritual wants of the metropolis could be best met, had drawn up a report substantially the same as this, though they knew nothing of the course taken by the committee of bishops.

The Bishop of Lincoln, in a few earnest words, seconded the Bishop of London's motion. He said it was thought that there were a large number of persons, living on their property, or engaged in professional pursuits, who would be willing to devote themselves more closely to the service of the Church. There had been a general feeling throughout his diocese in favour of such a scheme.

The Bishop of St. David's doubted the power of their lordships to do what would clearly make a new order of preachers in the Church. It would, no doubt, bring in a large number of persons who would be disposed to work, but they would be only those who were ambitious of displaying their talents as preachers. It was a measure of great importance, and demanded their lordships' gravest consideration.

After some further discussion, the report was received, and referred to the Lower House for its consideration.

The subject of the "Essays and Reviews" came afresh before their lordships, in consequence of a deputation from the Lower House having brought up a gravamen, signed by forty dignified and beneficed clergymen, affirming that injury had been done to the Church by the delay of synodical judgment upon the subject, and that it was expedient now to proceed to such judgment.

The Bishop of Oxford explained that the action of Convocation with regard to this volume had slumbered since July, 1861, in consequence of the book being under the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts. Now that those courts had definitively, and, he said, so lamentably determined the question, the authority of this Convocation revived, and he proposed they should not allow the matter to rest longer. After showing at some length that it was within the legal power of this Convocation to deal with the book, and even, as some lawyers thought, with the authors too, though he did not propose that, he proceeded to say he did not want to bind thought or to frown down speculations by authority. But he held that the Church had some power to deal with error, and that power was not possessed by the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, which could only try the subtle forms of modern heresy by the honest literal application of ancient formularies that had scarcely any bearing on these new heresies. But he thought the authority of Convocation would come in to supplement the defects of the Privy Council. And this he thought the Church had a right to require at their lordships' hands:—

It had a right to demand that they should show that it was not a mere adoption of old words, but a living reality, capable of being brought into action when required, saying that when the teacher's office was abused, that such was not her teaching. This might be done by new articles, but the reasons against the adoption of such a course he need not explain. It might be done by new declarations, which he thought would be equally open to objection; but if it could be shown to the faithful laity, who believed that if the Church admitted her clergy to teach error it was the loss of one of the principal notes of membership, that such was not the case their minds would be at ease, because the Church through Convocation would say, "No, we condemn these errors." If such a course were to be taken by the Church, it must be taken by some body in an authoritative form, and that synod in which their lordships were assembled would be an authoritative utterance—an utterance which he believed would tend in the minds of many to re-establish a faith which had been grievously shaken. He thought the course he had suggested, having reference to the book only, and not to the writers—with no intention to stifle thought—might be taken safely, deliberately, and kindly. He would not attack any person, or desire to put down opinion by authority, but he did most earnestly desire to protect the Church from complicity with false teachings in the persons of her ministers. He moved the appointment of a committee to consider and report on the subject.

The Bishops of London and St. David opposed the motion. The former remarked that they might regret the decision of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, but would be utterly impossible for that House or Convocation to override it. These proceedings, he went on to say, tended to the establishment of a new article of faith, and in these difficult matters there seemed to him to be nothing more dangerous than the feeling that was apt to come over men's minds, that it was necessary to do something:—

Men had not faith enough to believe that God who had watched over the Church would continue to watch over it still, and they came forward with their petty and temporary devices, in order to aid God, which He was able to do well enough for himself. It needed no synodical action of the Houses of Convocation to make that more clear which they desired the faithful soul should find in the formularies and in the Word of God. He expressed his conviction that in quietness and confidence the strength of the Church of England lay in this age, and that persons in their high positions should not be parties to the increase of an agitation which, he feared, had already done much harm. It was a most painful thing that even deacon throughout the country had been called upon to subscribe that melancholy declaration. He rejoiced to know that the clergy of the diocese of London, who were behind no others in intelligence and zeal, had maintained their calmness throughout all the recent storms. He did not think that the Church was in danger because the highest Court of Appeal had said that a clergyman was not legally liable because he held that statements with regard to physical science in the Bible were not the inspired Word of God, nor did he believe that the Church was in danger because a clergyman might think that God in His infinite mercy might find a means of escape for the souls. He believed the judgment gave no cause for alarm.

On the motion being put to the vote, there appeared an equal number for and against adoption. The Archbishop of Canterbury then gave his casting vote in its favour, and the committee was appointed.

In the Lower House, the business transacted was less than usual. There was a debate on a motion for establishing diocesan Synods, which resulted in the adoption of the following resolution:—

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that diocesan synods be annually held to which the whole body of the clergy and of churchwardens (being communicants) may either personally or by representation, invite and on which occasion the synod may be opened sitation only, and not by the business transacted at visitations; they are further on that, to render such an assembly as possible, the bishop, if he sees fit, should the synod any other laymen in his diocese attendance may by him be deemed desirable. They would contemplate the extension of sessions of this synod to as many days as required by the business before it. And, that an humble address be presented to the House praying their lordships to take the matter into consideration.

Only other important discussion—that Burial Service—was left unfinished. It should be remembered that a committee, appointed upon the subject, reported against the extension of the service, but recommended that there should be a revival of the service in the Church, at least to such an extent that notoriously evil livers should be excluded, all civil penalties connected with non-communication being, of course, re-enforced by the Legislature; but as excommunicated persons, they would not be entitled to the services of the Church. The discussion occupied two days, and was only terminated last—without any resolution being passed—by the prorogation of the body. The point in dispute was, whether the service should be made more general, or whether the report of the committee should be adopted, and the members divided to be pretty equally divided in opinion.

Mr. Williams, of "Essays and Reviews" fame, presented a petition, praying that, when the Convocation were going to sit in London on his Essay, they would hear him. It was before they proceeded to condemn the petition was received, but it was too late, there was no precedent for complying with such a prayer.

THE OXFORD DECLARATION.

The important Declaration to which we have alluded last month (p. 189), on the subject involved in the late decision of the General Committee of Council, has received the signatures of 12,000 clergymen. It is a statement that the subscribers would be still numerous but for various reasons, on the part of a conscientious minority, who are not having anything in common with the majority and Reviewers. One of these thus writes to us:—

It is a great mistake to suppose (and we ought to be put off our guard) that those holding the doctrine of the assumed Apostolical succession, and the whole Sacramental system based upon it, are actively engaged in carrying out their duty. Witness the last charge of the Bishop of Exeter to his clergy, in which he says, "We do not possess, as we cannot see that others do, Christ's direct commission for our ministry, and a certainty and fulness therefore of His presence and of His Sacramental working, which, to say the least, may be lacking elsewhere." [This charge, I am happy to say, has been ably answered by my excellent friend the Rev. Henry Barne, of Farrington, published by Nisbet, London.] Observe, again, that the Kalendar of the English Church Union, for 1864, published at 11, Burleigh-street, Strand, and at Rivingtons, London, represents the English Church Union to consist of fourteen hundred and twenty-five members and associates; and in Part IV. of the Kalendar, under "Church-work," it mentions, "Society of the blessed Sacrament to unite in a bond of prayer, fasting and alms deeds, members of the English Church, in order that by such acts of devotion they themselves have kindled within them a more perfect devotion to Jesus, veiled in the adorable Sacrament of the Altar." Also, "The association for the promotion of the unity of Christendom, formed with the object of uniting in a bond of intercessory prayer members both of the clergy and laity of the Roman Catholic, Greek, and Anglican Communion. The association consists of more than 6,000 members."

Surely it is the right course for the Evangelical body to stand off from any amalgamation with persons holding such dangerous opinions, and whose aim has ever been to recede more and more from the principles of the English Reformation.

I wish heartily that it could be considered that Archdeacon Denison and Dr. Pusey, and so many others, have altered their sentiments as to Apostolical succession and the Sacramental system, but we are led to believe it is far otherwise. Is it not, then, greatly to be feared, lest the Evangelical clergy and laity, uniting with those so adverse to their views, may not essentially injure the cause of vital truth? Rather is it not for us (always remembering the law of kindness towards the individuals) to stand fast to our own opinions, and not to give way in any one essential point, but to be determined, God helping us, to carry out and promote in every way the great principles of the Reformed Churches since the time of the Reformation.—I am, yours faithfully,

CARR J. GLYN, M.A.

Stanbridge Rectory, Wimborne, Dorset,

A NATIVE BISHOP FOR WEST AFRICA.

One of the most remarkable men who will take part in the anniversaries now commencing is the Rev. Samuel Crowther. Born in Africa, stolen while a youth, and forced on board a slaver, as part of its living cargo—rescued by a British cruiser, and converted by the preaching of the missionaries in Sierra Leone—he became a devoted Christian, a diligent catechist, and an ordained clergyman, faithful and energetic in the prosecution of missionary enterprise among his fellow-countrymen. We learn that Mr. Crowther is about to be consecrated bishop of the native churches of the Episcopal communion in parts of Western Africa beyond the dominion of the British Crown. All who are acquainted with his character and career will rejoice in the appointment, and we trust that the new see will long continue to be filled by its first occupant.

THE LATE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH.

The amiable Dr. Davys, Bishop of Peterborough, died somewhat suddenly, on the 18th ult. One of his last acts was to dictate a message of thanks—he could no longer write—in reply to kind inquiries made, through the telegraph, by the Queen, when she heard of his illness. Before her accession to the throne, Dr. Davys was tutor to Her Majesty. A daily contemporary describes the bishop as having been a moderate Evangelical at one time, but, we are told, “he gradually more nearly approached what may be called Anglicanism. He had a horror of extremes.” “In Peterborough no man could be more beloved. He ‘dwelt among his own people,’ went in and out among them, lived simply and contentedly, was accessible, liberal, a true Father in God.”

THE LATE REV. R. H. HERSCHELL.

It is our painful duty to chronicle the decease of the Rev. Ridley H. Herschell, minister of Trinity Chapel, John-street, Edgware-road. The facts contained in the following brief notice, which appear in the Record, are, we believe, so far as they go, quite accurate; but it is our impression that a somewhat complete sketch of his life and character could alone give any adequate idea of Mr. Herschell's worth as a man, a Christian, and a faithful minister of God's Word:—

Mr. Herschell was a Polish Jew, of very considerable talents and acquirements, who, after his conversion to Christianity, was baptized in London more than thirty years ago, and entered the Christian ministry. He could hardly be said to be attached to any particular denomination, but was much interested in promoting the diffusion of the Gospel, and especially amongst his own “kinsmen after the flesh.” His visits to the Jews in Italy, and especially at Rome, were attended with very interesting and hopeful results, and it is said that his death was the result of an access of illness induced by a recent visit to Rome and Florence. His loss will be deeply felt in many quarters. His chapel, near the Edgware-road, was remarkable for the admirable school attached to it, which is said to have been the means of very extensive usefulness. Mr. Herschell was a man of much practical talent and of an enlarged mind. We are informed that his death, which was unexpected, was brightened by a hope full of immortality and by an unflinching faith in Jesus Christ as the true Messiah.

THE CALVIN COMMEMORATION.

A letter from our Geneva correspondent, “A. L.,” received too late for insertion in an earlier column, reminds us of the app published in these columns, last year, under his signature, for aid in the erection of a hall for the purposes of evangelization among the humbler classes in the city of Geneva. The promoters of the plan were several leading laymen of that city, and the appeal referred to was not without some tangible result. Our correspondent requests us to announce that by a concurrence of circumstances, which it is needless to relate, this project, while remaining the same, as to the end to be sought, has undergone an important modification in the means by which it will be effected, the support of several influential ministers of Geneva being thus obtained for it. That modification, he adds, consists in this—that the edifice in question will now be identified with the memory of the great Calvin, and will be invested with a commemorative character of universal interest to Evangelical Protestantism, and which will certainly elicit the sympathy of British Christians. He adds some particulars, for which we must refer to the address, issued by the Evangelical Alliance, which will be found among the concluding pages of our present number.

We may here add, however, that the Rev. Dr. Barde, one of the pastors of the National Church of Geneva, having been deputed to visit this country, and invite British co-operation in the undertaking, met at an informal assembly, on the 15th ult., at the mansion of the Hon. A. Kinnaird, to whom he made a statement upon the subject. He also read a letter from the Rev. Dr. Me d'Aubigné, from which it appeared that the building will be called the “Hall of Reformation,” that it will be inscribed both within and without, with the name of John Calvin, and that it will be devoted chiefly to the preaching and defence of the Gospel, but will also serve for lectures on missions and other religious and general subjects. The company was also addressed by the Hon. A. Kinnaird, Prebendary of the Bishopric of London, Dr. James Hamilton, the Rev. Wm. Bunbury, Dr. G. H. Davis, Mr. A. Haldane, and Mr. T. Chambers (Common Serjeant), all of whom expressed their sympathy with the movement. A committee to aid in obtaining funds has been organised, the Earl of Shaftesbury, who was present, most cordially responded to Dr. Kinnaird's invitation to become its president.

Dr. Barde has also had an opportunity of giving information upon the subject at a drawing-room meeting at Sir Morton Peto's residence, at which the Rev. Dr. Steane, Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, and others, were present.

THE MALAGASSY AMBASSADORS.

The two Malagassy ambassadors now in this country, who have been presented to the Queen by Earl Russell—Rainifirringia, 15th Honour, and Rainandrianandriana, 14th Honour—brought with them a letter of introduction from certain native Christians to the directors of the London Missionary Society, in which they were referred to as able to tell of the progress of Christianity and the benefits conferred on the people by the teaching of the missionaries. This they have done, and their testimony must be regarded as the more valuable from the fact that, though they have renounced idolatry, they themselves are not among the missionaries' professed converts. They were entertained at dinner, at the London Tavern, on the 8th ult., by a number of the leading members of the society, the Earl of Shaftesbury and some half-dozen members of Parliament forming part of the company invited to meet them. Their object in visiting Europe is to obtain a modification of the treaties made between the late King and the English and French Governments, which, if enforced, would operate most prejudicially to the welfare of their country.

ENGLISH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The annual meeting of the English Presbyterian Synod was held in the course of last month at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The Rev. John Fraser, of Lowick, in Northumberland, was chosen Moderator. The meeting was a very harmonious one, and the business of the Synod related, for the most part, to the development of the denomination in various parts of England. The subject of a union with the United Presbyterian Churches in England, as well as the proposals for union now going on between the Free and United Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, formed the principal topics of discussion, and both subjects were favourably regarded by the Synod.

THE REV. DR. CAIRNS.

It is not often that the settlement of an individual minister excites a general interest in the country, extending even far beyond the bounds of his own denomination. Such an event, however, occurred within the last month in the case of the Rev. Dr. Cairns, of the United Presbyterian Church. This well-known able divine has been settled for the eighteenth or nineteenth years—indeed, ever since he entered the ministry—over a congregation at Berwick-on-Tweed; a town geographically within the English border, but Scotch in its sentiments, habits, and religion. Many efforts have been made, from time to time, to draw him into a more conspicuous sphere, both in Edinburgh and Glasgow, but hitherto without success. Another attempt has recently been made, which it was thought he could not resist. A new and extremely handsome chapel has been erected in the western suburbs of Edinburgh by a few members of the United Presbyterian body; and they did not disguise from the first that they grounded their hope of prosperity, under God, on the condition that Dr. Cairns would leave his semi-rural retreat and become their minister. The church was opened, the congregation was formed, and the call to Dr. Cairns was duly and generally made. According to the old theory of government within the communion, the Church courts have the power to determine whether a minister under such circumstances shall go or stay; and to the Presbytery of the bounds in which Dr. Cairns is located the application for his translation was made. But, of course, the opinion of the minister himself had always great weight in determining the decision of his brethren; and some years ago it was agreed that his opinion should be decisive. When the application came before the Presbytery, the excitement both in Berwick and in Edinburgh was very great; the Scotch papers filled nearly a page of their journals with the pleadings at the bar, the opinions of the Presbytery, and the speech of Dr. Cairns. That speech, as it happened, was not at the first meeting decisive. Dr. Cairns desired time to weigh and to pray over statements that had been made on both sides. So an adjournment was agreed to; but the Edinburgh petitioners went off well pleased, believing that hesitation would land in consent. But in this instance they were deceived. When the Presbytery again met, the doctor, in a speech of great feeling, announced that he had made up his mind to remain at Berwick; on which, it is said, his attached people were so overcome, that many of them burst into tears of joy. They had offered him, if he would stay, to provide an assistant, so as to leave him more free for those studies with the fruits of which he has so recently enriched the world in his masterly reviews of Strauss and Renan. If his increased leisure shall lead to more of such publications, we think the whole Christian world will have cause to join with the good people of Berwick in rejoicing over Dr. Cairns' decision to remain among them.

Miscellaneous.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

TURKEY.

One of the most promising and influential young converts connected with the mission of the American Board at Bitlis, in Eastern Turkey, has repeatedly suffered from the bitter hostility and injustice of the Armenian tax-gatherers. One of them having summoned him before the city council, not satisfied with going to the extreme limit of insult allowed in his calling, took occasion, in presence of the venerable assembly, to abuse and slander the Protestants, stating that they were infidels, and did not worship God.

The young man, hearing his religion thus scandalised, and seeing the barefaced impudence of his accuser, in endeavouring to make the Mussulmans believe such charges, which he did not believe himself, was moved with righteous indignation, and could keep silence no longer. With calm boldness, and in courteous language, he turned to the twelve men constituting the council, and said: "Venerable Sirs, you hear that we are accused of being infidels, and not worshipping God. This is a matter which you can decide; and with your permission, I will pray to my God, after which let this man, my accuser, pray to his; and it shall be left to you to judge which prays to the true God." Contrary to all precedent, permission was granted and improved. The young man kneeled down, removed his fez from his head, spread out his hands to heaven, and began his prayer. At the head of that body sat the only green-turbaned Mussulman present, indicative of his being the high priest of that religion. Next him in rank was the judge, with his turban of spotless white, and then the white-bearded members of the council of lower grade. All these not only tolerated the young man, but listened to him in breathless silence, while he prayed (in their language) for twenty minutes, embracing in his petitions all orders and classes of men, from the Sultan down to the most menial subject, and ending each petition in the name of Christ! The venerable members of the council turned to each other, and candidly declared that to be a sincere, heartfelt prayer to the only true God! They then gave opportunity to the accuser to pray; but he, utterly confounded, and shrugging his shoulders, declared that he did not know how to pray! One of the council, perhaps better informed than the rest, assayed to remove the embarrassment of the tax-gatherer by telling his companions how the Armenians prayed—viz., by often kneeling and kissing the ground, making the sign of the cross upon their faces, kissing the Bible, &c.—and then this most singular interview was brought to a close.

INDIA.

The baptism of six young men—one at Calcutta and five at Mahanad—is reported by the Free Church missionaries in Bengal. One of the latter, Jodu Nath, is a Brahmin, whose mind, some time previously, gave way under the excitement and persecution attending his forsaking of Hindooism and all his earthly relatives, in order to embrace Christianity. He has been for the last six months in the full possession of his faculties, and is now quietly rejoicing in his Saviour. Of the rest, the eldest, Ram Chunder Dass—who is approaching his thirtieth year—is a man of considerable education and intelligence, and occupies the position of head-master of a Government school. Two others are respectively a brother and a cousin of Ram Chunder. One is a convert from Mohammedanism, but a friend and associate of the three last mentioned.

Another young Brahmin, named Shoshy Bhushen Mukerjee, has been baptized at Calcutta by the missionaries of the London Society. It was not the first time that he had declared his wish to submit to the sacred rite. On his determination becoming known to his friends, he was beaten and threatened, but nothing shook his resolution. In his sharpest trials he declared himself a Christian, and called on Christ for help. Deistical doubts were insinuated and atheistical books were given him to read, but he always sought help from one or other of his Christian teachers. Twice during the year he threw off his "poita," the Brahmins' sacred thread, and declared that he would not wear the sign of a false religion. Twice—from solicitation in one instance, from physical force in the other—he was induced to put it on again. Finally, he again sought baptism; having obtained it, his relatives have sought to carry him off forcibly, and every precaution is required for his personal protection. One feature in this case, and an inference which it suggests to the missionary who administered the baptism, deserves notice:—

Shoshy, being a Brahmin, lived at home for two months and a-half without a "poita," during which time he ate with his father and brothers. Five years ago this would have broken the caste of the whole family, and have brought the denunciations of the community upon them; but now it has been passed over without notice. This is a straw showing both the direction and rapidity of the current. I know many who have cast off the worship of idols, who read the Bible, and who pray in the name of Christ, but who have not the courage to face the consequences of an open profession. If it be possible to be a "secret disciple," I think there are thousands amongst the timid Bengalees.

of it. In his house we had to take care lest his cooking vessels should be defiled by coming in contact with them. In the bazaar he was noisy, and opposed the missionary in an undignified manner. There is scarcely an old missionary in the country who has not been forgotten in days gone by. . . . Now this state of things is entirely past away. The old man is respected and welcomed as a friend wherever he goes. A charpoy is brought, a blanket is offered, and many say, "This day my house has been sanctified by your presence; they listen to the story of man's salvation by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; the resurrection and death for them touches their hearts. . . . The Hindoos feel that they must be reconciled to this idea; for, according to their book, caste is in the abolished, and all people are to become one. The Mohammedans, too, expect their reconciliation with Christ, and if Christ then introduce a new reign, then they will be ready to follow him."

CEYLON.

A Scottish clergyman at Kandy lately met with one of the priests of a temple who wished to throw off his yellow robe and become a Christian. The clergyman sent him to school. The ex-priest supports himself by working part of the day in an office. Application has since been made by two or three more priests, who profess a belief in Christianity and are being instructed in its doctrines.

A new station of the Church Missionary Society an agency altogether new in the mission-field has been brought into operation:—

Women have been appointed as Bible-women, to go from house to house to read and explain it to their deeply-sunk and degraded sisters. One of them is supported by the station.

This is done partly by a weekly collection made at the church door, and partly by cocoa-nut trees, dedicated by the native Christians to that special object. Every dealer at the station has set apart a tree, the produce of which is sold once a-month for the Bible-woman.

CHINA.

For the spread of the Gospel, mentioned in our last impression, being now in operation at Peking, we must add that of the American Board. The missionaries of the six ecclesiastical bodies now represented in the city are ten in number. Dr. Lockhart says that they "cannot gather crowds in the city as they wish, so long as they act prudently."

At Victoria mentions having admitted an excellent native catechist, Lo-sam-sing, to the orders. The bishop adds, "Two native deacons, ordained by me at Hong-kong, and sixty Chinese converts confirmed at Hong-kong, Shanghai, and elsewhere among the happy events which I am privileged to associate with the work of the Gospel."

A recent account has been received of a series of outrages committed upon the American mission at Shanghai. On Sunday, January 17, the chapel of the American Methodist Church, in the East-street of the city, was violently entered, the furniture broken reason of the tumult. The mob was dispersed; and thus the houses of Rev. Mr. Wolfe and Mr. Smith were saved, as well as those of Rev. Messrs. Hartwell and Woodin in another part of the city which they had declared their intention to destroy. Mr. Martin escaped with his family just as the mob were at his gate, by breaking a hole through a partition into the Taoist temple adjoining where they were kindly received by the priests, and kept until the mob had retired.

The British and American consuls took the most prompt and efficient action when informed of what had occurred; but the magistracy showed the usual disposition to screen the Chinese offenders; so that, if they should be really punished, it will only be in consequence of the resolute determination of those gentlemen.

Other interesting facts from China will be found in our Foreign Intelligence.

NEW ZEALAND.

Thirty adults and eighty infant aborigines were baptized at the Kaitia station (Northern District) of the Church Missionary Society during the year 1863. Of the adults, the missionaries say they for a long time opposed the Gospel, in connexion with natives who had joined the Papists, but now they were convinced of their error, and wished to embrace the truth. The missionaries also report—

Our teachers afford us much help, and moreover render their services gratuitously. They are generally humbleminded, and always anxious to receive fresh instruction—to have, as they say, “a little of the rust rubbed off the gun, and also “to have it newly primed.” The teachers and monitor in connexion with us amount to forty, and the people honour the servants of God, and esteem the work of a teacher as the work of a chief or gentleman. If the war chariot shall for ever be broken to pieces in New Zealand, then the natives will do well, for as a body they dislike war, but they require a power to keep the turbulent spirits for ever in check.

MADAGASCAR.

The missionaries report that numerous additions are made every month to the churches and that the congregations generally crowd the spacious places of worship in which they assemble. In every department of the work the agents are busily and successfully employed. The country remains quiet, the Government is apparently becoming settled, and no relaxation on the part of the Sovereign and others in visible devotedness to the idols is manifest. The Christians, however, continue to enjoy the utmost liberty. On Christmas day, seven or eight thousand of them, after early religious services (to secure places at which some slept in the chapel the previous night), went in procession to the palace to pay their respects to the Queen. For nearly an hour her Majesty listened to the hymns sung by the choirs of the chapels, and expressed her satisfaction with the whole proceeding. The event is deemed of much importance, as being the first official recognition of the civil equality of the Christians. The Popish missionaries are unremitting in their efforts among the young. There are said to be seven Romish priests and three sisters who devote much of their time to education. “They assert,” says the Protestant schoolmaster, “that we have all the adults and they all the children. Now, whilst it is true that we have all the adults, it is not true that they have all the children.”

In January last the Prime Minister, amid a large concourse of spectators, laid the foundation-stone of the hospital to be conducted by Dr. Davidson, of the London Missionary Society. The foundation-stone of the church at Ambatonakanga (on the spot where the first Christians in Madagascar met for worship, and which, during the persecution, was used as a prison) has also been laid by the Prime Minister.

There is another report of King Radama being still alive; but it is palpably of French fabrication, and as the evidence known to our readers proves, must be utterly without foundation.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The Bishops of Capetown, Grahamstown, and Orange Free State have held a Synod and adopted certain “Acts and Constitutions,” which, if legally valid, will prove of great importance. They assert the independence of the “Church of South Africa” from the final Court of Appeal “by law established” in England. They say:—

As the laws of England have by treaty no force in the colony, those laws which have been enacted by statute for the English Church as an establishment do not apply to and are not binding upon the Church in South Africa; and that this Church, therefore, receives the English ecclesiastical statutes only in so far as it may serve to remedy and supply manifest defects or omissions of the canon law or of laws framed and enacted by the Synods of this Church.

Speaking of the special case of Bishop Colenso, they consider it highly desirable that it should be allowed an appeal to the Archbishop of Canterbury, but without expressing an opinion upon the general question of appeals to England. Should the Bishop of Natal attempt to exercise episcopal functions in his diocese after the passing of the sentence, and without having made any appeal to the Primate, he is declared ipso facto excommunicate, and after due admonition, formal sentence of excommunication will be pronounced. They recommend that a new bishop should be appointed to head the Propagation Society's mission in Independent Caffraria.

The Free Church of Scotland has four principal stations in British Kaffraria, the most important of which is Lovedale, about forty miles from King William's Town, the capital. A minister who has visited this station, in accordance with instructions received from home, reports that on two occasions, separated by an interval of three months, there had been admissions to the Church, by baptism, from amid the surrounding heathenism, numbering in the one case fourteen adults and six children, and in the other twenty adults. He observes that numbers of these wild and warlike Kafirs, influenced by a higher than any human power, seek admission into the Christian Church, and the fact is often scarcely known beyond the locality in which it occurs.

From another part of Kaffraria—Emgwali, where there is a United Presbyterian mission—the Rev. Messrs. Soga and Chalmers write that they had, on the previous communion Sabbath, admitted to the Lord's table twenty persons—the largest accession to the membership of the Church ever witnessed there since the station was founded. Of these, two were baptized in infancy; one was a relapsed member, the remaining seventeen were converts from heathenism. The Rev. Mr. Chalmers thus describes some touching incidents which occurred :—

At the close of the service, according to our usual custom, all the members had an opportunity of giving the right hand of fellowship to those who had just been baptized. Never can I forget the scene which followed. Old men and women, young men and maidens, welcoming into the bosom of the Church the repenting prodigals. There was one touching circumstance we witnessed. Among those who were coming forward to welcome the persons baptized was one woman who, when she came to this station years ago, during the starvation, was a wild and reckless character, but had been changed by the Gospel, and made a meek follower of Christ. When she shook hands with one of the women, both wept very bitterly. We knew there must be some cause for these tears of joy. On inquiry, I found that they had lived together in Kafirland, had gone together to the dances, and been participants in evil. Now they met under different circumstances, the works of darkness had been cast aside, and both were now grasping each other's hand, being followers of Christ. I give utterance to no sentimentalism when I say that my brother Soga and I, as we stood side by side at the pulpit, spectators of such a glorious sight, and listening to the muffled sobs around us, would gladly have fled to some secret place and given vent to our emotions.

The Rev. John M'Kenzie, of the Bamangwato mission of the London Society, has visited the Matebele country, in order to obtain, if possible, from the Chief Moselekatse permission to occupy a new district, besides Inyati, as a field of missionary labour. He was accompanied by the Rev. John Moffat, who was returning thither. Mr. M'Kenzie had at first some difficulty in obtaining admission to the country, for on entering it he was met by the chief's messengers prohibiting him from proceeding further. Moselekatse and his people persisted in regarding him as the missionary of Sekoni, his enemy. Mr. M'Kenzie, however, persevered, was allowed to proceed, and obtained an interview with the chief :—

He was not living in a town, but at the foot of a mountain. His four waggons were drawn up near to each other; behind these were the temporary huts of his harem and servants, closed in by a hedge of thorn branches; and in front a large pen for cattle, and another for sheep and goats. After passing the little huts and the waggons, we were shown into the sheep-pen, at the door of which sat a number of machaga. A fire had been placed in the middle of the pen, and near to this, seated in an old-fashioned arm-chair, the gift of Mr. Moffat, sat Moselekatse. As we advanced, we got each a warm and rather lengthy shake of the hand, the attendants shouting lustily, "Great King," "Mantse," &c. On taking our places on the ground, opposite the arm-chair, we had a full view of the object of this praise, and saw an old, frail man—so frail that he has to be carried about by his wives, and whose only clothing then consisted of an English blanket brought loosely round his loins, and a naval officer's cap on his head. An old great-coat, the original colour of which was to me matter of speculation, served as a footstool, and was removed with the chair when the king desired to change his position. One could not help looking with peculiar feelings on the countenance of a man whose whole career has been so bloody and so successful. His features are still indicative of intelligence and force of character, while at the same time expressions occasionally flit across them which help us to realize that we are in the presence of one who could listen unmoved to the voice of justice or mercy. His reception, on the whole, was gracious enough as things go here. He seemed to lose sight of my connexion with Sekoni, and recognised me as a missionary from Kuruman or England, the difference of distance between these places not being very clearly understood by the Matebele.

After visiting Inyati and its out-stations, Mr. M'Kenzie remarks upon the trying character of the mission. He adds, however :—

I am happy to be able to testify to the change which is gradually taking place in the minds of the Matebele towards missionaries. Received four years ago with the utmost suspicion, they are now invited throughout the country, but more especially in the neighbourhood of Inyati, where they are best known. The overbearing haughtiness with which they were at first treated by all classes, and the browbeating and rudeness which they had to submit to from many, have now given place in most cases to respect. The whole population which comes under the constant influence of missionaries some 700 or 800, while of these about 150 constitute the number of hearers at the four stations in any given week. Repeated attempts have been made in the way of teaching the young, but hitherto without success. Learning to read seems to be regarded by the people with fear; they are not sure how Moselekatse would regard such a movement. The work of your agents, therefore, has hitherto been, to a great extent, of a preparatory nature.

The French Protestant Missionary Society's agents in South Africa are about to receive in addition to their number. M. Eugène Casalis (son of the Principal of the Missionary Training College in Paris) and his wife (niece of Dr. Grandpierre) were commended to the blessing of Almighty God in a valedictory service, held a few weeks since, in the French metropolis over which Count Jules Delaborde presided. They afterwards left Europe, by way of Southampton, on board the Cambrian, for Lessouto. M. Eugène Casalis goes out to Lessouto as a medical missionary. He is a native of Africa, having been born during his father's residence there.

CENTRAL AFRICA.

Bishop Tozer, of the Universities' Central Africa Mission, having come to the conclusion that the ground it occupied could only be held at a ruinous sacrifice of life, has broken up the station at Morumbala, and withdrawn to the Cape to reorganize the mission. He has taken with him a party of twenty-five native boys. It is suggested that operations should be resumed among the tribes north of Natal. The intelligence of Dr. Livingstone's safety, which we gave last month, is happily confirmed.

WESTERN AFRICA.

The financial difficulties of the Baptist Missionary Society—which not long since were its most threatening aspect, but which now, we are glad to say, appear likely to be wholly overcome—have elicited some marked instances of liberality on the part of sundry native converts. People at home may be heard occasionally to speak of giving their "mite," when the word in their mouths can only suggest to a thoughtful mind a contrast rather than a parallel between themselves and the poor widow in the Gospel. But here, among other examples of generous giving, is one of a woman who really reminds us of her who was commended by the Master, as she cast into the Lord's treasury "all that she had." The Rev. R. Smith states that at a missionary meeting, held at one of the society's stations in Africa—

An aged African woman came up to the table and placed a shilling thereon, saying, "I don't know about my food to-morrow, but my heart says I must give this to God." She had scarcely spoken, when a number left the chapel to bring something. Several poor men, who do not earn more than a shilling a-day, came with smiling countenances, and said, placing two shillings and a three-penny piece down, "Dis for me, dis for my wife, and dis for my child." One very poor woman said, "Me no get money; I go give two bunches of plaintain." Just as we were leaving the chapel, a young man (an inquirer) came running in with a shilling and a bar of soap, saying, "Take this for missionary." Since the meeting others have brought starch, mattocks, and fowls. Is the question asked [continues Mr. Smith], what influence has the Gospel upon the minds of cruel and benighted Africans? Why, dear Sir, some who were at the meeting, and gave liberally, once refused even a cup of cold water to the missionaries.

NORTH-WESTERN AMERICA.

The Romish clergy lose no opportunity of opposing Protestant missions. Several priests have penetrated to the North-west from Canada, and are endeavouring to make proselytes upon the ground so diligently cultivated by the Church Missionary Society. Some facts illustrative of the progress of the good work, which the priests will essay to overthrow in vain, may be found in our Foreign Intelligence.

HAYTI.

Some cases of cannibalism have lately come to the knowledge of the Government of Hayti, and sin, we are told, in every form, is as rampant as ever among the masses. Yet a few faithful labourers here and there scatter the good seed with evident success. A Baptist missionary writes: "As to our Scripture-readers, I do not hesitate to say that they do more for the mission than the same number of white missionaries possibly could do." He names one of them, Lolo, who goes from plantation to plantation reading and expounding the Scriptures, and who has been made useful to the conversion of some twenty-four souls. This is in Jacmel. In another part of the island, we read of a few Christian people who have been deprived of the ordinances for years, and who, on partaking of the Lord's-supper from the hands of a missionary visiting the place, fairly wept for joy. In a third locality, we hear of a Baptist congregation without a pastor obtaining the aid of a Wesleyan minister to baptize for them—of course by immersion.

Literature.

The Songs of the Temple Pilgrims: an Exposition, Devotional and Practical, of the Psalms of Degrees. By ROBERT NISBET, D.D. James Nisbet and Co.

THIS is one of those books about which we might say many things. Its title at once enlists our sympathies, because we know the importance and value of a really judicious devotional and practical exposition. The Psalms of Degrees are the same "Songs of Degrees" whose title used to seem so mysterious, and so excited our curiosity in our early days. These Psalms are favourites still, but on far other and better accounts; but even then what could we not have given for the three or four opening pages of this volume, wherein Dr. Nisbet has rehearsed the different explanations of these titles, and told us which he prefers! Of these explanations the one which we have oftentimes met with is that which regards the "degrees" or "goings up" (so the Hebrew has it) as referring to the return of the Jews from the captivity of Babylon. That which the author adopts refers to words to the stated pilgrimages to the Temple, and we regard this as by far the best supported. These fifteen psalms, then, were those ordinarily pointed to be chanted or sung by the devout singers as they journeyed up to Jerusalem thrice a year. Of these journeys Dr. Nisbet gives a somewhat glowing description.

The Psalms of Degrees are mostly anonymous, a few of them bear the name of David, and one of Solomon. Each of them has devoted to it one section of the volume in our hands. The 121st (Ps. cxx.) is headed "The Wounds of the False Tongue;" and similar characteristic headings are prefixed to them all. An amended translation of each is introduced along with the authorized version, and so arranged that the poetic nature of the original is shown. If this were a place for minute criticism, we could sometimes object both to the alterations of rendering and to the arrangement, although we should recognize frequent improvements. We have a liking for the italics of the English Bible to indicate the variations which have been judged expedient to supply the brevity of the Hebrew, and to bring out its sense; but Dr. Nisbet has not deemed it wise to employ them. Let us illustrate what we mean. In our Bibles, Ps. cxx. 3, 4, read thus: "That shall be given unto thee? or what shall come unto thee, thou false tongue? Sharp are the words of the mighty, with coals of juniper." We have a double question and an answer. The amended version is:—

What shall it give to thee, and what shall it do to thee, Thou deceitful tongue?
It is like sharp arrows of the mighty one,
It is hot coals of juniper."
The words in italics are added by the translator, but he has not italicised them. In the last line the word "like" is put for the Hebrew word meaning "with," or "as well as." When such liberty is taken it should certainly be noticed in some way, because these things constitute a kind of commentary, and give quite a new turn to a passage. We observe further that the word "it" occurring twice in the first line above quoted is intended to represent the deceitful tongue, thus: "What shall this deceitful tongue give to thee, and what shall it do to thee?" Such is the sense which Dr. Nisbet intends to convey, and we admit that it may be correct in the main, although "broom" is more probable than "juniper," and "what shall it do to thee" is a paraphrase of "what shall it (or he) add to thee." If the passage is to be understood as our author writes it, the idea may be that the deceitful tongue can inflict no injury upon the Lord; and the lesson may be, that while evil is powerless when directed against Him, it is a source of affliction to us, and therefore we call upon Him to deliver us. Dr. Nisbet, however, gives it quite a different turn, and his paraphrase of it is, "What evil, O servant of God, can the false tongue give to thee! Nursling of Omnipotence, what can it do to thee!" In other words, "How little a true servant of God can be really injured by slander." All this is in harmony with sound doctrine and Christian experience; and indeed it is one of the wonders of Scripture, that many passages which exercise the critics and have many interpretations put upon them, however explained, convey important and precious teachings. But let us not be misunderstood: when we say "however explained," we only refer to explanations which rest upon the basis of sound learning.

There is another observation upon this Ps. cxx. which we cannot refrain from making. We live in peculiar times, and all our expositions of Holy Scripture should be as minutely exact as possible. The words, "Woe is me that I sojourn with Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar!" are thus paraphrased: "The Assyrian that has led me captive, the Arab that has plundered me, are not more cruel than my brethren." Have we any reason to suppose this Psalm more recent than the captivity? or to suppose that Mesech means the Assyrians? None whatever. As for Mesech, it is almost, if not quite, universally understood to be the home of a northern race, perhaps of Scythians (see Ezek. xxxviii. 2—4; xxxix. 1, &c.). The other word, "Kedar," no doubt means an Arab tribe.

Yet again: the commencement of Ps. cxxi. is thus printed:—

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills,
From whence cometh my help.

My help is from the Lord
Who made heaven and earth."

Here we prefer the pointing :—

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills.
From whence cometh my help?
My help is from the Lord," &c.

At p. 27 this same passage is printed so as to convey no clear meaning to the mind: "I will lift up mine eyes to the hills from whence cometh my help, my help cometh from the Lord who made the heaven and the earth." We see the meaning here, but it is obscure.

It is because we like this book that we have endeavoured to point out some of those small defects which we find at the very outset, and of which we could easily multiply examples. The book is one that is very probably destined to be reprinted, and if it is we earnestly hope it may be subjected to minute revision by its talented author. There are multitudes of passages of real beauty and excellence, and none, we suppose, will read the work in the spirit of the author without much profit. The book is truly a devout utterance of the Christian consciousness; it speaks to the heart which knows the power of Divine grace, the love of God and of goodness. Almost all the phases of the ordinary experience of the believer pass under review, and every one calls forth good words. As a volume for quiet perusal for the purposes of personal edification, we desire to express ourselves strongly in its favour. Dr. Nisbet has found the Psalms of Degrees a mine from which he has extracted many grains of golden ore, and these he has on the whole skilfully wrought for the benefit of his fellow pilgrims to a nobler temple than Jerusalem ever saw.

Pleasant Hours with the Bible; or, Scripture Queries on Various Subjects. The Religious Tract Society.

A REPRINT from the Sunday at Home, consisting of "Bible Questions," and "Bible Characters," in prose; and "Bible Enigmas," in verse. These ingenious exercises form one of the best possible means of promoting an acquaintance with the Scriptures, and are so attractively constructed, that they cannot fail to be popular among the young.

The Christ of the Gospels and the Romance of M. Renan. Three Essays, by the Rev. Dr. SCHAFF and M. NAPOLEON ROUSSEL. The Religious Tract Society.

THE first of these essays, by Professor Schaff, was written before the appearance of Renan's book, which it may be said to have answered by anticipation. The perfection of our Lord's character, as portrayed by the evangelists, is set forth by the professor as an argument for the divinity of His person and mission. This is done in so earnest and candid a spirit, yet with such skill and power, that a healthful glow of indignation may well be awakened when the mind reverts to some of the French writer's insinuations and assumptions. It is a masterly composition, and deserves wide circulation in a separate form. In M. Roussel's essays the sound sense, keen logic, and trenchant criticism, which have been so often felt the Romish priesthood, are directed against the infidel. They are such as a Frenchman only could have written, and that Frenchman the author of the "Religion of Money."

Sweet Childhood and its Helpers in Heathen Lands. By M. A. S. BARBER. Nisbet and Co.

SOME eighteen years ago, the Rev. Samuel Crother, the native African clergyman (now about to be appointed a bishop), wrote a loving letter to English children about the settlement which was then being formed, by liberated captives from Sierra Leone, at Abbeokuta. This letter, being published in a juvenile missionary magazine, had important consequences. It gave rise to the "Coral Fund," to which many children in private families, boarding-schools, and Sunday-schools contribute, and which at the present moment sustains a number of native catechists and schools in connexion with the Church Missionary Society. Miss Barber's volume tells in a charming manner the good that has been done by these means among children in heathen lands, and affords much interesting missionary information. The first portion of the work relates to the black children on the West Coast of Africa, and the early mission there; then follows some account of Oriental children and schools in different parts of India; Indian fur hunters and their children form the subject of the succeeding chapters; and the work concludes with some judicious remarks on missionary work among the young. The whole is illustrated with a number of attractive engravings on wood.

Autobiography of Maude Bolingbroke. By EMMA JANE WORBOISE. W. Macintosh.

As stated in the preface, this work originally appeared in the Englishwoman's Magazine, and has been reprinted "by desire." Miss Worboise is an indefatigable member of a school of female writers of religious fiction, which seems to find much favour among us. There is an extraordinary demand for tales, and if the younger members of the community are not supplied with that which is wholesome and profitable, they may provide themselves with what is injurious. The autobiography of Maude Bolingbroke is a record of the perversion of a young lady to Popery, and of succession of events which brought her to the point of entering a nunnery. At this crisis circumstances lead to reconsideration, and a renunciation of Romish delusions. After this the story is continued for some time, and then the former personal narrative is exchanged for that of ordinary biography until the records of the life are completed. The book is written with much skill and judgment, and the incidents throughout admirably depicted. We have real pleasure in giving it our best recommendation.

FOREIGN.

THE state of France, at the present moment, presents a problem that is deeply interesting to every thoughtful mind. In spite of the immense pressure of the Imperial system on the people, the political situation is precarious enough to inspire grave alarm in the minds of the authorities, and to induce them to take precautions that only aggravate the evil; and both in the Romish and the Protestant Churches there are the mutterings of coming tempests that threaten to shake, if not to uproot, existing institutions. The politicians have been disappointed by the reactionary tendencies of the Ministers, while the Roman Catholic dignitaries are still more irritated against them, because they exceed the worst fears entertained of them in the license they allow to infidel publications. They bitterly complain of them that they have more regard for the honour of the Emperor than for the glory of God: any one who pleases may attack the last; but no one is allowed to move his finger against the first. It is difficult to understand how, in the present critical state of affairs, the Pope and Cardinal de Bonald, the Archbishop of Lyons, should be so ill-advised as to attempt to force upon the people of that diocese the Romish liturgy, to the supersession of the old form of prayer, which has been in use for centuries, and which the people themselves believe to have been bequeathed to them by their compatriot and martyr, the venerable Polycarp. The Pope has issued a brief, commanding peremptorily the change in the liturgy. The civil authority comes to the aid of the people, and—mindful of what the Pope appears to have forgotten, that the introduction of bulls and briefs into France, without the consent of the civil power, is an infringement of the last Concordat—the copies are seized wherever they appear. Those who are most familiar with these circumstances say that the issues involved in them are more important than any that appear on the surface. But it is not the Roman Catholic Church alone that is divided—the Protestant Church is also torn by dissensions. We alluded in our last number to the withdrawal of the licence which M. Coquerel, jun., enjoyed from the Paris Presbyterial Council, as assistant to a pastor within its bounds, on the ground of his rationalistic opinions. The decision excited some attention, as M. Coquerel's friends protested with no little vehemence against the decision in the name of liberty. Since then there has been held a conference of pastors and elders, belonging to the National Reformed Church, from different parts of France, at which these questions were discussed, when the opinions of M. Coquerel were condemned, and a resolution affirming that the Protestant Church of France holds positive doctrines, not mere negations, was carried by a majority of 141 votes against 23. Among those who took the orthodox side was the venerable Protestant statesman, M. Guizot, who made a speech in favour of the resolution that was much admired. We may add that M. Guizot disapproved of the late decision of the Paris Bible Society to circulate unsound versions of the Scriptures, though he did not think that the decision justified his secession along with those whom he designated as his dearest friends. In the meantime, he comforted the friends of the Bible with the recollection that this was not the first assault that had been made on its veracity, and would probably not be the last; but that the Bible had triumphantly vindicated itself in times past, and there was no reason to doubt the same result would occur again. On these meetings and discussions the letters of our French correspondents will be found to throw much interesting light.

The Italian population is much excited by the reception which the people of London have accorded to Garibaldi. From one town after another telegrams are received by our Lord Mayor, thanking the people of England for the warmth of their welcome, in which they see only a proof of the sympathy which Englishmen have for Italian unity. But further efforts on behalf of that unity there are at present none. The Italians themselves seem tardily to have come to that conclusion, and action is adjourned for the present during the lifetime of the Pope. Very contradictory accounts of the health of the Pontiff have been circulated during the month. It is certain that he made his usual public appearance at the Church ceremonials during Easter week; but it was said that he looked wasted and pale, and that he had been dragged out, to the prejudice of his health, for political purposes. It is alleged that when he dies the friends of a united Italy in Rome mean to resist against the election of a successor, hoping that the French Government will thine with them as to throw no obstacle in their way. In this we fear these excitable people attribute more generous sentiments to the French Governm will be found, on trial, to entertain. In other respects, the religious state of extremely interesting. Garibaldi is reported to have stated, in reply to an religious society—speaking more the language of a soldier and statesm simple believer—that he did not profess himself to be a Protestant, for he v if he did his influence with the people would be gone. This is strong te power which the priesthood still retains in that country ; and a curious thou corroboration of its truth occurs in the letter of our Italian correspondent, who in the neighbourhood of Florence, where a promising meeting had been opene about fifty persons, who regularly attended to listen to the simple truths of the G well till Easter came, the period for annual confession, when, by the s withhold absolution, the people were induced to cease their attendance al meeting was for the time given up. Happily, there are other indications of not prove so deceitful. The work of the Gospel thrives in various pla remarkable in the famous old island of Corsica, and in each of these cases the to be traced to the distribution of Bibles. When it is remembered how many Bi their way of late to Italian homes, we are encouraged in the hope that the sa may be produced, though perhaps less conspicuously, at thousands of differen great drawback, worse than the ignorance and apathy of the people, is to k perverse and senseless disputes raised by the Plymouth Brethren. HOME.

A new chapter on the vanity of human hopes might be wri country of Garibaldi. The very reports of his coming created a his arrival threw the metropolis into a delirium of joy. All clas with each other in the warmth of their welcome to the illustrious stranger ; and in his presence factions feeling and class jealousies alike disappeared. How comes it, then, that before ten days had elapsed all these halcyon splendours were overcast, and his name had become the watchword for party strife, class jealousies, and envenomed feeling between the high and the low in our community ? The tale is soon told. From the first there was a feeling, suppressed, but never eradicated, that the upper classes sought to monopolise the Italian hero. The extreme section of democratic politicians in our own country, and the refugees from landed Governments abroad, desired that Garibaldi should belong to them ; and they urged every hour that was spent in the saloons of the aristocracy ; and when an attempt was made, on medical authority, to circumscribe his visits, and to lay some embargo on the reasoning enthusiasm which would have held him every day and all day long in the hot and unnatural atmosphere of popular excitement, with all its stimulating influence on nerve and brain, the ill-suppressed jealousies at once found vent. The cry was raised that Garibaldi was spirited out of the country for political reasons, at the beck of foreign despots, to facilitate the settlement of the Danish quarrel. Mutterings of resentment, threats of agitation, hints of monster meetings in the open air—all were to be brought to bear upon the Government that had dared to interfere between Garibaldi and the people, and to turn the nation's guest out of the country, rather than displease a few foreign tyrants. Now unreasoning was all this anger may be seen from this simple fact, that all his friends, acting on medical advice, asked him to do, was to circumscribe the list of towns he meant to visit, but by no means to give them all up. It was Garibaldi himself who decided, against his wish, and much to their regret, that if he could not visit every town to which he had given a promise, he would visit none, but would at once leave the country. That Garibaldi himself suspects some other reason than the medical opinion to be at work in the advice given to him is very evident, and it is not for us to say he is wrong ; but we must add that the reason assigned, whether the real one or not, is quite adequate to account for their latitude, without seeking for any other or craftier motive. But who could have supposed at the glow of enthusiasm, which was so demonstrative on the 11th of last month, should have declined into the dull gloom of distrust in which the visit ended. Alas for the frailty of human expectations !

The state of political affairs in this country is more settled now than it was last month. When Parliament separated for the holidays at Easter, the general impression was that the fall of the present Ministers was imminent. Since then a succession of circumstances has contributed to strengthen their position, and to postpone to an indefinite period the inconvenience to the country of a change of Government and a general election. The success of their policy in inducing a Conference to assemble and attempt the settlement of the Danish quarrel is one point in their favour ; the restoring of the cordial understanding between France and England, through the medium of the Earl of Clarendon, who has lately joined the Ministry, is another. The popularity of Mr. Gladstone's Budget, showing a decrease in the expenditure, and a further reduction in the national burdens, is an additional source of strength ; and we might have added the visit of Garibaldi as a fourth ; but through the blunder of Mr. Gladstone's interference in his movements, which has given rise to the suspicion that a Ministerial intrigue is at the bottom of his departure, it is doubtful whether the visit of the great Italian has not done them more harm than good. For the present, however, the design which was avowed by the Opposition to oust the Government has been abandoned, though in the present nicely-balanced state of parties a crisis may arise at any hour.

The meeting of Convocation last month was one of peculiar interest. Every year, it may be observed, there is a tendency to deal with higher questions, to grapple with the wants and defects of the Church, to adapt itself to its felt needs, and thus to root and transplant itself as a living power in the country. The time has gone by when it could be regarded as a mere playing at Church councils. For good or for evil, it is gradually attracting to itself the attention of Churchmen, and familiarising them with the idea of finding a solution of Church difficulties through its means. This object, however, we believe, will never be completely realised till the Convocations of the two provinces be fused into one, and the laity are represented in the united body ; and as it would always be the policy of the Government of the country to keep the Convocation weak, and prevent it growing into the dimensions of an ecclesiastical Parliament, they are not likely to concede either boon, though the Church were disposed to ask for both. The questions with which both

It is not much above twenty years since the Government of this country applied systematically to encourage the work of education by Parliamentary grants. Since the progress of the system has been so rapid, and its adherents have acquired so much influence that it threatens to prove too strong for the very power that first called it into existence. It absorbs about an annual million of the national money ; it resists all attempts to reduce the grants, and bears impatiently with any endeavour to regulate them, and has more than once shaken Governments and individual Ministers who attempted to interfere. It exploits in this way is the driving force from office of Mr. Lowe, who presided over the education department. Mr. Lowe had made himself specially obnoxious to the Government class of educationists. They looked upon him as an enemy ; and it was enough for him to forward any revision with regard to education to induce them to band together in opposition, and to compel the members of the House of Commons to obey their behests. A charge was brought against him of garbling and mutilating the reports of school inspectors which were sent to him previous to publication at the public expense. The charge proved to be one from which he was wholly, perhaps culpably, free—for surely no Minister of Education would be justified in using the public funds to publish, as was done in the report of a Roman Catholic inspector, who wandered from his proper duty so far as to enter into an elaborate comparison between the state of morals in Protestant and Roman Catholic countries. The guilt or innocence of Mr. Lowe, however, was of minor consequence ; the great object was to humiliate, perhaps to oust him ; and succeeded beyond their hopes. Mr. Lowe has resigned his place at the Education Office. His successor, warned by his example, will probably hesitate to draw down upon him the opposition of such a powerful class by pesterling them with reforms.

The 23rd of last month was the 300th anniversary of the birth of Shakespeare led to, perhaps, a larger amount of foolish talking and foolish acting than has at any time been witnessed in England. The central exhibition was at Stratford, which assumed that honour as being the poet's birthplace; and there, on the following Sunday, the Bishop of Dublin and the Bishop of St. Andrews mounted the pulpit of the parish church and preached sermons, or more properly delivered essays, on the moral aspects of writings of Shakespeare—essays, be it said, singularly beautiful in themselves but strangely out of keeping with all our ordinary notions of what should be in the Lord's house on the Lord's Day. The Archbishop, however, did not forget that Shakespeare was a gift of God to the nation; but he seems to have been about the only one of all the speakers at all the celebrations who bore that idea in mind. In all other respects the proceedings were open to Cowper's noble resistance against the Garrick festival of 100 years ago. It must not be supposed from the circumstance, however, that Englishmen at large are about to substitute idolatry of Shakespeare for the recognition of God. The truth is, that the chiefs of our literature have themselves aloof from those absurd displays, which fell into the hands of second and third-rate men, who, straining to produce an effect, fell into the grotesque when they were reading at the sublime.

centuries have passed away, this year, one of the most illustrious of the Reformers from his labours, and entered into rest. Calvin died on the 27th May, 1564.

Let us expose our fellow-Protestants of Geneva, that they should desire in a fitting manner to commemorate the tercentenary of this

On the contrary, such a commemoration in harmony with some of the noblest and lightened sentiments by which human is governed, nor less with the principles of Christianity. If our veneration for the wisdom of our fathers, and our gratitude for the benefits conferred upon mankind, prompt us to do honour to their memory, so also to the Word of God. In the Old Testament, the attainment of this object are by the prophetic declaration, "The Lord shall be in everlasting remembrance;" and in the New we are especially enjoined to obey them who have the rule over us, and to speak to us the word of God.

While Geneva most properly takes the lead on this occasion, with equal propriety does she the Protestants of Britain to follow her. We are scarcely less indebted to Calvin for his immortal writings than is the country of his birth.

His sincere and lively interest in the Reformation in England, is well known to all lovers of the ecclesiastical history of those times. His letters to King Edward VI., to the Duke of Somerset, to Archbishop Cranmer, and to others—under God, the originators and distinguished promoters of that glorious Reformation yet extant, and are filled with wise counsels and encouragements, fitted to nourish and to direct their zeal. With deep grief, he and his friends, Bullinger, and others of the Swiss Reformers, deplored by death of the young King, so appropriately styled by them "the English Josiah." "We have good reason," he says, writing to Bullinger, "to feel anxiety, yea, even for that nation (i.e., England). . . . Meanwhile the Church of God will be in a manner overwhelmed by manifold tempests. Let us, therefore, say, commend this troubled state of our God." And Bullinger writes with still more eloquence:—

nothing has any other thing so much distressed me as this English affair. I am hourly expecting more certain information, of which I will not fail to let you know. O how truly wretched are the times into which our good Lord has thought fit for us to enter! Let us earnestly implore His mercy, that He may show pity upon us and upon His most afflicted Church. But where is our Peter Martyr? where John à Lasco? where is Hooper, Bishop of Worcester? where is Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury? where is the Duke of Suffolk? where are numberless other excellent men? Lord, have mercy upon them! I cannot easily express how greatly these things distress me."†

Nor did their sympathy expend itself merely in words. During that disastrous interruption of the blessed progress of the Gospel which was occasioned by the reign of Queen Mary, Calvin and his colleagues received with Christian hospitality many of the illustrious men who were driven into involuntary exile from their native land, maintained with others of them a friendly correspondence, and laboured to sustain the courage of them all, and to reassure their drooping hearts by the hope of better days.

The accession of Queen Elizabeth, accordingly, was to them, as well as to their English brethren, an occasion of unfeigned thankfulness. Calvin, especially, on the very day of her coronation, dedicated to her a new and improved edition of his "Commentary on Isaiah," the first edition of which had been dedicated to her brother King Edward VI. In it he encourages her Majesty to devote her chief care to the restoration of those religious privileges of which her subjects had been deprived; and shows what obligation she was laid under to do this, by reminding her of the wonderful manner of her deliverance from that dreadful storm which had fallen upon her, though a king's daughter, as it had upon the heads of all the godly. This was done (he tells her) for the express purpose that, with invincible determination and unshaken firmness of mind, she should acknowledge her obligation to her Protector and Redeemer, and, laying aside all other kinds of business, which at the commencement of her reign would crowd upon her, labour to have His worship, so basely and disgracefully corrupted by her predecessor, restored to its former purity.

"This (he adds) will be the crowning proof of your gratitude to God, and a sacrifice of most delightful savour, that the faithful worshippers of God, who, on account of their profession of the Gospel, were constrained to wander far and wide through distant countries, shall now, through your kindness, be restored to their native country. We, too, in whom that mournful spectacle awakened, as it ought to have done, the most poignant grief, have abundant cause for rejoicing, and for congratulating you, when, through the gracious exercise of your Royal will, we see the way opened for the return of our brethren, not only to be at liberty to worship God in your Majesty's dominions, but to render assistance to others."

Thus did this eminent man, by his timely and wise interposition in various ways, aid our Reformation while yet in its incipient growth. Our reformers knew how to appreciate his solid learning, his profound knowledge of the Scriptures, his enlightened, calm, and well-balanced judgment amidst the conflicting opinions and controversies of the times, his holy fortitude and indomitable zeal; and were not backward to ask that advice which his deep experience qualified him to render, and which his love for Christ and for them never permitted him to withhold. One proof in place of many may be sufficient to establish what is here said of the value attached by our reformers to the authority of Calvin as a master and instructor in theology. In the Academical Statute of the University of Oxford of 1579—fifteen years, that is, after his death—it is enacted that, for the extirpation of heresies, and the instruction of the young in true piety, the students shall use, among other books mentioned in the statute, Calvin's "Catechism" and Calvin's "Institutes."

In times subsequent to the Reformation, the writings of but few men have had more influence than those of John Calvin in moulding the theology of our nation: nor its theology alone, but, in the northern parts of Great Britain and Ireland, its ecclesiastical polity as well. And if there are many among our different denominations and within the pale of the Establishment, and one large and influential body of our fellow-Christians in particular, who adopt another modification of Evangelical doctrine, yet, viewing him in the light, not of modern Protestantism, but of the great Reformation which gave it birth, all will unite in paying homage to him as a profound theologian, as an able and enlightened expositor of the Word of God, and as one of the chief luminaries which His grace has placed in this western hemisphere of His Church.

It will create no antagonism, therefore, nor unfriendly strife, if the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, in compliance with the desire of the Genevese brethren, call on all the members of that institution, and on the Evangelical Christians of their country and its dependencies at large, to seize the opportunity of the approaching tercentenary of the day when this bright light was withdrawn to commemorate his worth; and still more than that, to unite in devout and general thanksgiving to God for the untold blessing which, through him and his brother reformers were vouchsafed to the nations of Christendom.

They submit this proposal with unfeigned respect and love to the pastors of churches, the tutors and professors of theological colleges, and, in a word, to all who, placed in stations of influence, acknowledge the unspeakable value of the Reformation, and desire still to perpetuate and extend its principles.

Strongly marked as were the peculiarities of Calvin's theology and of his personal character, he was a true lover of the whole household of faith, and laboured much to promote peace and brotherly communion among the Reformed Churches and their founders.* It seems, therefore, all the more becoming that such a proposal should be submitted, not in any spirit of party or sectarian zeal, but with a generous confidence in the sympathy of the entire Christian brotherhood; and the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, from whom it emanates, regarding their duty from this point of view, will rejoice to find that, in fulfilling it, they have given occasion for another manifestation of that precious agreement in the faith and love of "The Lord our Righteousness," which, in the face of all its diversities, evinces the essential unity of the Christian Church.

In accordance with the resolution of the Geneva Conference of 1861, and with the invitation of the Geneva Alliance Committee, communicated with this address, it is resolved:—

1. That a public meeting be held in Freemasons' Hall on the evening of Friday, May 27, for setting forth the great principles of the Reformation, and the blessings which have been derived from it; and to render public thanksgivings to Almighty God for raising up the illustrious men by whom it was effected, especially John Calvin.

2. That a deputation, representing the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance, be sent to Geneva, to convey the expression of British sympathy with their brethren in that city, and to take part in their proceedings.

3. And it is suggested that on Sunday, May 28, special services, with sermons appropriate to the occasion, be held in the various places of public worship throughout Great Britain and Ireland, to be conducted in such manner as may seem best to the pastors and rulers of the Churches themselves.

TO THE PRESIDENT AND COMMITTEE OF THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Dear Brethren,—Permit us to recall to your remembrance the following resolution adopted by the Conference of 1861. The time, the place, the assembly in which it was passed, give it an importance which cannot be too highly estimated. It was under the dome of St. Peter's, where Calvin preached—while every heart in that vast assembly of Christians, gathered together from so many countries, thrilled with emotion—when the blessed works of John Calvin, both in Geneva and the world at large, had just been narrated—that the following proposition was unanimously adopted:—

"Evangelical Christians of various countries, mindful of the great benefits which the Lord had vouchsafed to His Church by means of the blessed Reformation, having taken the opportunity of the anniversaries of the deaths of different Reformers, particularly of Luther, and more recently of Melancthon, to express their gratitude to God, and to those whom He had employed in the advancement of His Kingdom, the Evangelical Alliance, assembled in Geneva at a time not far distant from the Tercentenary of the death of John Calvin which took place the 27th of May, 1564, renders public thanks to the Lord for raising him up in his sixteenth century to labour for the Reformation of His Church and the re-establishment of the Gospel.

"The Conference expresses the wish that on the Lord's Day in 1864 nearest to the day of the Reformer's death, these Divine blessings may be commemorated, leaving the manner in which this shall be done entirely to the wisdom and piety of the pastors and rulers of Churches in Geneva or elsewhere.

"The members of the Conference, by show of hands, adopt this resolution, and charge the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance of Geneva with the duty of seeing it carried into effect."

You see, dear Brethren, that the duty devolves upon us to communicate to the Churches of the Reformation, and to the various Committees of the Alliance, the request that they would institute a general commemoration of the ministry and death of this eminent servant of God. We have, therefore, to express the desire that, in all places of worship to which your influence extends, you will do what lies in your power to promote such services as may be appropriate to the occasion.

We further invite those friends of the Gospel who are able to do so to rejoice our hearts by their presence with us, in the week between the 22nd and 29th of May. The churches and religious societies of Geneva are greatly moved at the thought of thus glorifying God, who, three centuries ago, honoured our ancient city by giving it a reformer whom He had made so mighty in the Scriptures. The Bible and Missionary Societies, the Evangelical Society of Geneva, the Society for the Sanctification of the Lord's-day (which sprung out of the Conference of 1861), will hold their annual meetings at the same time. The Free Evangelical Church will hold, on Friday, the 27th, a service at the Oratoire for adults, and another for the young. In the evening of the same day the Evangelical Alliance will hold a Conference on Calvin, when, after a paper on the subject, addresses will be delivered by different friends. Lastly, on Lord's-day, the 29th, a special service will be celebrated in all the churches of the Established Church of Geneva, both in the city and the country. Other meetings beside these will probably take place. Without venturing to expect so great a concourse of friends as in 1861, we shall be happy to see as many as can come, and indulge the hope that a considerable number will be with us. We can assure them, in the name of the Lord, that our hearts will be joyously open to receive them, and that we shall not neglect the duties of a cordial hospitality.

Receive, dear brethren, our brotherly greetings, and the assurance of our affection in our beloved Saviour.

In the name of the Geneva Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, CH. BARDE, Pasteur, President.

DAY OF SPECIAL PRAYER FOR THE CHILDREN OF CHRISTIAN PARENTS.

The invitation of the Evangelical Alliance to meet apart Tuesday, the 12th ult., for the above object, was very generally responded to throughout the United Kingdom, and as far as we are able to learn in foreign countries. The morning and evening meetings in Freemasons' Hall, London, were crowded each time, showing the deep interest which Christian parents felt in this movement on behalf not only of their own children, but of the children of believing parents throughout the world.

Captain Trotter presided in the morning, and read a paper of suggestions which had been prepared for the occasion as to the proper subjects for thanksgiving and intercession.

The Rev. Samuel Minton read the Scriptures, and prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. Fry, the Rev. W. Bevan, and Mr. Blackwood. The Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel read selected portions of the Scriptures, and the Rev. W. Reeve having offered prayer, the Rev. Samuel Martin gave an address, in which, having referred to the difficulty which even Christian parents felt in realising that all must believe, that our children are born saved, are all defiled by sin, he said: "Now it seems to me that in order to have more feeling we must have more thinking upon this subject, less sentimentalism, and more faith. If I go into a house where a child is deaf and dumb, and palsied, and paralytic, and epileptic, I see mourning in that house. If I go into another house over which hangs the dark, deep shadow of the angel of death, in which there is some Rachel mourning for her children because they are not, I see sorrow. If I go into another house where there are prodigal sons, sons who are vicious and criminal, I also see sorrow. But I do not as distinctly see sorrow in such cases as those which I will in a moment indicate. I do not see Christian parents, for example, as evidently mourning over an intellectual lad, a lad thoroughly refined in all his tastes and in all his sympathies, with a girl's heart and with a philosopher's mind, thoroughly devoted to the pursuit of knowledge, a perfect gentleman in all his behaviour, but, nevertheless, as far from his God as any criminal in our gaols. I do not see his parents sorrowing over him; and until I see that I can have but little hope of any very great change in the spiritual condition of the children of godly parents. We want to translate into full and self-abasing belief the truth that our children are 'born in sin and shapen in iniquity.' It is one thing for me to say that of the children of Adam generally; it is quite another thing for me to look upon my own offspring and apply that general doctrine to them."

In closing the address, parents were exhorted to be examples of salvation before their children:—

"How did the Master first show forth redemption? He showed it in himself in the first instance. Comparatively speaking, He said but little about it; He only said enough about it to get attention to himself, and He personally was the manifestation of salvation to His disciples. Now, it is useless for us in the first stages of our children's life to talk to them very much on points of doctrine. They cannot thoroughly comprehend, for example, that glorious doctrine which we all hold so firmly, of free justification by faith through the righteousness of Christ. They cannot understand that, but they can understand their father and their mother being saved from the sins and the evils which, with their quick eyes, they see in the unsaved, and this strikes me as a great thing for us to do. If we had to do it alone we should despair utterly, for who is there in this room that would presume to appear even in his own family for a single day as a thorough Christian, in his own resources, and his own strength, and his own energy? But that which I cannot do alone I can do by God; what is impossible to me as a man and as a sinner is perfectly within my reach if I be in communion with the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost. We must, I say, be patterns and examples of salvation to our children in our own dwellings, and this seems to me to supply the sort of training to which the Scriptures so distinctly point us. They speak more about training than they do about teaching. There is a great difference between teaching and training. Suppose, now, that I were to speak to a child about selfishness, and were to give that child a long lecture about selfishness, and point out all its evils; and suppose that that child saw me in my own dwelling from morning till night considering only my own ease, and comfort, and pleasure; the teaching would be in my words in my fatherly lecture, but the training would be in my conduct, and which would be victorious? Why, the training, for the training would smother and stifle my words. Now, if parents are bringing up their children to the pride of life and the love of the world, of what use is it for those parents to say to their children, as they spring into their teens, and get towards manhood and womanhood, 'You must renounce these things.' The girl is trained by the mother thoroughly to embody in her whole deportment the pride of life; all the mother's arrangements for the girl tend to that, and yet the mother in her religious moods will, perhaps, explain that text—'Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world.' I need not stay for a moment to ask which of these will gain the victory. The training will gain the victory, and not the teaching, and what we want seems to me to be this—we want to exhibit salvation in our own persons before our children, and to make that the basis of our verbal teaching. It must not be put above our verbal teaching, but it must be put beneath it, and when the superstructure of our teaching has that for its basis, there is every reason to expect upon it the crowning blessing of God."

Letters selected by a committee specially appointed for that purpose were then read from various persons asking the prayers of the meeting for their children, after which the Rev. Dr. Steane and Mr. Robert Baxter offered prayer, and the Rev. Dr. Steane pronounced the benediction.

EVENING MEETING.

Sir Morton Peto, Bart., M.P., presided.

After a hymn and reading of the Scriptures by the Rev. G. G. Harvey, the Chairman remarked that this meeting should be regarded as one of the highest privilege, for where is the Christian parent who does not above all things desire that his children may be everlastingly happy? Let us remember the Saviour's promise now, and He who never refused a parent's plea for her child when on earth would not refuse the prayer about to be offered. Mr. R. C. L. Bevan read a part of Luke xv., and prayer was offered by Captain Fishbourne, Rev. Samuel Müller and Pastor Barde, from Geneva. The Rev. C. J. Goodhart gave the address. He presumed he was addressing godly, believing parents, and he would say, in the first place, in reference to the children of such parents, that they possess two great advantages. "They come within the knowledge of the precious truth of God, and though it may appear to make no impression now, we never know when it may wake up to life within the months or years after. What encouragement, this is diligently to teach them Divine truth. Next they ought to see, every day in the parents' life, the power and life of godliness. But there are also their disadvantages, and these are very great and serious. They are liable to get accustomed to these things without at all realising their power, and the result is a hardened conscience. Another disadvantage—they witness all our inconsistencies, and how sadly these operate on them. Can we think too much of these things? I urge them to stimulate to more diligence and more prayer. We are left in no uncertainty as to our duty toward our children. The command is to bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; and if He has made it our duty, is it possible that He will withhold the necessary grace? No; that the duty is enjoined is the pledge that the grace shall be given. Let me now give you a few words of encouragement. Reflect on the character of God. He is the El-Shaddai—the all-sufficient God; He is Jehovah-Jireh—the God who will provide. What encouragement! He can and will meet all our difficulties. Oh to realise the character of God in all His love toward us! He willeth not the death of the sinner. Let those who feel that the dear ones whose salvation they long for are beyond their reach, remember that there is a hand and a love which can reach them. In conclusion, I would say, plead for the thorough, unmistakeable conversion of your children. Don't rest in their manifesting just some nice dispositions; be not satisfied till you can rejoice in being sure that they have passed from death to life."

At the conclusion prayer was offered by Lord Radstock and the Rev. S. Minton, and the Rev. Wm. Brock closed with the benediction.

Thus terminated a day of special interest and of importance, and one which had been looked forward to with devout anxiety by many Christian parents. For the first time they had been called to unite simultaneously, in all lands, in supplication for their children. May it not be ardently hoped that large and gracious results will follow these meetings, and that many families will receive the blessing so earnestly and so ardently sought?

ALLIANCE SOIREE.

The annual soirée for members and other Christian friends will be held in Freemasons' Hall, on Friday evening, May 27. Addresses will be given on the subject of the tercentenary of the death of John Calvin.

Evangelical Christendom.

THE LATE DR. CÆSAR MALAN.

THE Rev. Dr. Cæsar Malan died on the 8th of May, in his seventy-eighth year, at his small country house of Vandœuvres, three miles from Geneva. A long and remarkable career has thus come to a close, and it may be interesting for the many readers of Evangelical Christendom to survey in a brief outline the main features of his life and activity of that honoured servant of the Lord.

Dr. Malan was born in the preceding century, before the outbreak of the French revolution, and was in the prime of manhood when, simultaneously with the blessings of restored peace, the revival of Evangelical faith began on the Continent. At that time several religious agencies were at work in Geneva. It would be impossible to point out the precise means and influences used by the Lord to bring His young servant to the knowledge of the truth. Malan liked to ascribe his conversion to the direct action of the Scriptures upon his soul; and in point of fact it was between the years 1816 and 1819 that he first made a stand for the doctrines of the Gospel.

It was no trifling battle. He was master of one of the classes in the college, which had become under his tuition quite a model for his method of teaching and for the proficiency of his pupils. He was a young preacher of no small promise, well endowed with a kind of talent much prized wherever, as was then the case in Geneva, the ebb of real piety enhances the value of the appearances of life in the midst of death. He had a family, whose prospects must be all but cheering if he ceased to be a minister of the National Church. But without hesitation he gave up required advantages and expectations for the Gospel's sake. In the midst of difficulties he showed from the first an unwavering zeal for the glory of Jesus. He refused to preach any doctrine but that which he found in the Scriptures. In his class he rejected the worse than useless catechism of the Church of Geneva, and introduced the direct teaching of the Bible. The ecclesiastical authorities expressed themselves strongly against such innovations; but he persevered. Threats and molestations found him equally determined, and at last he was expelled from his post in the college, and his name was struck off the roll of ministers.

The reproach and obloquy which his fidelity drew upon him are hardly to be conceived at this day. The laws of his country secured to him his personal freedom; but they left him a butt to the unlimited hatred and reviling of those who, having failed to stifle that unwelcome assertion of Gospel principles, were still not without a hope of crushing it. By that time there were other Evangelical Christians in Geneva who had a share in the "reproach of Christ;" but I believe his was the largest. Some of that intensity of bitterness may have been called forth by certain points in his character always strongly marked and personal, and some of which Providence might have softened. But who knows whether the work he had to do would have been consistent with a more measured action? One thing is certain. At that time, the Gospel required an uncompromising testimony in Geneva. The back of God had been forsaken to such a degree, that when Malan raised his voice, his doctrines of the divinity of Christ, of the personality of the Holy Spirit, the redemption through the blood of Jesus, and the free grace of God, were considered as dangerous novelties, to be resisted and condemned with the whole power of a grossly-organised Church, backed by the whole power of the State.

Separated from the National Church, Malan gathered around him those whom his teaching had already awakened, and in 1820 he formed his independent congregation.

gation ; it grew for a time, and reached its greatest prosperity about the year 1827 when internal difficulties arose concerning the organization and government of the Church. His views were Presbyterian, those of the majority of the people incline towards Congregationalism. He was very positive. The result was a quarrel and separation, from which the congregation never fully recovered. He placed himself in connexion with the United Presbyterians of Scotland.

His pastoral labours being thus reduced to a narrow field, he was enabled to devote a larger proportion of his activity to those Evangelical journeys through which he became the spiritual benefactor of many souls, both on the Continent and in Great Britain. But his influence was greater with his foreign friends than with his own fellow-countrymen, whose republican instincts always recoiled from his somewhat domineering disposition.

It is well known that Dr. Malan held those theological views designated as strict Calvinism. Their rigidity, and his peremptory mode of enforcing them, raised much opposition on the part even of many pious persons whose ideas were not of an equally absolute complexion. This was to him a source of constant grief, and he was not always quite just in his feelings toward those who dissented from him, as his individuality made it difficult for him to admit the reality of convictions different from his own. But he remains entitled to the praise of having been throughout a long life an undaunted and indefatigable champion of the Gospel. His zeal for the conversion of souls was unbounded, and equalled only by his jealousy for what he considered the rights of free grace in the salvation of the elect of God. He always stood determinedly opposed to all kinds of Socinian and Arian teaching, to every doctrine of self-righteousness, to every opinion disparaging to the name and authority of the Eternal Head of the Church. This cause it was which separated him from the Church of his birth, where the principles upon which it was once built were no longer recognised ; this it was which kept him for a long series of years apart from the Church which he loved, but loved with an affection surpassed by his love for Zion's King, the Redeemer of his soul.

I have no doubt that Malan's character and influence will be valued hereafter more and more, in proportion as his removal from the scene of his activity will show the fruit of his work apart from his person. He will be valued chiefly with reference to the boldness and firmness of his testimony. He was decisively instrumental in raising amongst us the standard of a pure and orthodox teaching. Even those who could not agree with him in many things, were both impelled and strengthened by his presence and his voice, always ready with no uncertain sound on the side of the truth. That kind of influence may be felt even when the man has passed from this world. Notwithstanding his high views of the Gospel, he was not intended to be the founder of any permanent ecclesiastical form or scheme. The congregation over which he presided never possessed the requisite element of stability, and after some years of a declining condition, it ends with himself.

Dr. Malan has written a good deal ; but it is somewhat strange that a man who had such a definite conception of Christian truth has published no theological work of note. Excepting his "Sermons," commendable for purity of doctrine, but not for any individual quality in their author, three or four times only did his pen venture beyond the proportions of a tract. One small volume, with the title "Jesus Christ is the Eternal God," was dashed off in a week, in a fit of indignation at a momentary attack upon the divinity of our Lord. The form of a tract, the detached handling of single points of doctrine, seems to have been the kind of work he preferred. Some of his tracts are, in my opinion, the best in the French language. But he wrote many (considerably above a hundred), and a large portion of them are marked by sameness and repetition. Unless he has left some important unpublished work, he will not be entitled to go down to posterity as a theological writer. This may be ascribed to two principal causes—first, his great activity as a preacher and evangelist, and consequent most extensive correspondence; and next, a complete and voluntary estrangement from the movement of modern theological thought. Whether right or wrong, it is known that theologians will not be influenced except by those whom they consider as sharing in their studies. Malan studied his Bible as few amongst us are in the habit of doing; but he had no sympathy for theological science. His theology was the practical side of the Gospel—salvation as applied to souls. In that path, no doubt, he gathered many souls for his hire; yet, had he chosen to do it, I believe he might have widened the sphere of his usefulness with equal advantage to himself and to others. We must not give our adversaries even a colour for their assertion that we can maintain our old orthodoxy only by closing our eyes and ears to the movement of modern mind.

God had qualified our departed friend in a high degree for the service of praise. His "Hymns," of which he wrote many, words and music, and published a collection of three hundred, besides a metrical version of the Book of Psalms, were amongst the first, and are still, in part, amongst the best we have. They remain as a precious legacy. Some have been translated into other languages. While they sound in our own valleys and awaken the echoes of the mountain side, the converted Bechuanas sing their melodies on the breath of the African desert; and if I am not misinformed, they are not altogether unknown to the devotional hours of some of the Romanists.

It had been feared that in his last days the man who was so strong on the doctrine of assurance, might in himself experience some of those fears and anxieties which he used to treat in others as an absolute want of faith. I am happy to say that he was spared that trial. He enjoyed his own assurance of salvation through the merits of the Saviour alone, in the near approach of death, as fully as in the days of his health and strength. To the repeated inquiry of his son, he replied that there were "no clouds" between him and death. Beyond that point I have nothing to record concerning his last days, which were mostly silent, except when endeavouring to lead to Jesus some of those who came around his dying bed; even in death he would bring them to life! It affords me pleasure also to mention his unfailing patience in his increasing illness. After some of the common infirmities of old age, a paralysis of the lower extremities came on. But his faith shone brightly to the end, and his departure was as quiet and peaceful as his surrounding family could desire. His was not a triumphant entrance into glory, but the steady step of the traveller who reaches his Father's dwelling, after manfully performing a long and toilsome journey. He fell asleep in the Lord, like one long trained to follow the Leader, who trod before us the path of the shadow of death, that for us He might change its dark windings into hallowed and everlasting light.

GENEVA IN THE TIME OF CALVIN.

In the publication of the "Christian Institutes" and his letter to Francis I., Calvin had proclaimed himself the uncompromising antagonist of Rome, and had taken a place in the front rank of Protestant theologians; but his life-work was not yet finished to him. His heart was set upon that repose which is favourable to intellectual exertion; his one earthly object was to find a sphere in which to study, to think, to write, and to cultivate the spiritual vineyard of his own soul. But it was the battle that this man was to be called of God; conflict to the end was to be his lot. A prince in Israel, he was not to tend his flock by the still waters or on the sunny hill, but to go forth before the hosts of the Lord, and to wear a crown of thorns. It was towards the close of 1536, in passing through Geneva, on his way to Strasbourg, that he received what he believed to be the commission of God, determining his future course of activity. Farel, the impassioned and uncompromising Reformer of Picardy, met him in the way, and told him that the curse of God would be upon his studies if they led him aside into some quiet refuge while the ark of God was in danger. Calvin, though calmness and comprehensiveness were the attributes of his intellect, and though his judgment was serene and firm, possessed the susceptibility of genius to impassioned appeals, and was inspired with a vivid consciousness of the presence of God in the affairs of men. As he listened to the words of Farel he felt "as if God from on high had stretched out His hand to stop him." To the end of his life he referred to his yielding to Farel as no result of choice, but as a submission to a Divine command. God, he said, had seized him with His awful hand from heaven. In Geneva, therefore, Calvin remained, and the Reformed Church soon discerned that the city which held Calvin was the capital of the Reformation.

We might discourse at any length touching the state of affairs in Geneva when Calvin arrived there; but we confine ourselves to one or two words, and having taken some care to form a just opinion on the subject, avoid entering upon details which could not possibly be comprised within our limits. Geneva had for a protracted period been in a state of commotion; its condition might be described as one of chronic revolution; and no fact is better attested by history than that continuance of civil agitation impairs the moral stability of a people, gives vice a thousand advantages over virtue, and produces a class of fiery, unprincipled, lawless spirits, in whose eyes restraint is tyranny, law a chain, and liberty a fine name for licentiousness. In the civil and ecclesiastical broils by which Geneva had been torn, this class made itself conspicuous and powerful. Its wild force was doubtless an auxiliary element in casting off the bondage of Rome; but when the victory over Rome was won, two dangers arose from its presence. In the first place, the defeated squadrons of the Papacy, seeing the tumult in the camp of their adversaries, might return, and, with stealthy tread, regain their former positions. In the second place, the triumph over Romanism might be perverted into a triumph over truth, the day of freedom might be turned into a saturnalia of license, and the last end of Geneva might be worse than the first. The class we have described were the Libertines; the problem to be worked out by the Genevese, at the time of Calvin's arrival among them, was to preserve the doctrines of the Reformation from the assaults of Popery and purity of morals from those of libertinism. Such were the essential characteristics of the situation. On the dissolution of manners in Geneva before the time of Calvin, M. Guizot speaks with as much decision as could be desired by M. de D'Aubigné. And, let us be well assured, it was not by rose-water methods that the State could be saved in those days. Calvin saw on the one side the atrocities of the Anabaptists, on the other, the ceaseless glare of martyr fires; he had to contend against the excesses of lawlessness and immorality, and, at the same time, to prevent the re-establishment of an ecclesiastical power which would not sooner regain a footing than it would burn opposition into silence and desolation. Unless we recollect these things, we cannot do justice to Calvin in considering his rule in Geneva. We say, "do him justice," for that is all that is required; complete approval of any human system or achievement is certain to involve us in error.

The men of Geneva, speaking through Farel, virtually appealed to Calvin for a scheme of civil and ecclesiastical administration, and the response of Calvin was simple and decisive. "In Geneva," he in effect said, "we shall take the Word of God as our legislative code and our standard of manners. We pray, Thy kingdom come, and we shall attempt to realise this prayer in our city. We shall bind ourselves to serve the Lord; we shall, as a people, declare that His will is our will, that what offends Him offends us, that sin against God is sin against the Republic. The Church and the State, if not actually one, shall be associated so closely, shall understand each other so perfectly, shall co-operate so harmoniously, that their diversity will be that of function, their unity that of life. We are freemen; let ours be the freedom which is in Christ; the voice of the people is supreme in the Commonwealth; let it be a voice attuned to harmony with the Divine will, and if there is any jarring note, any discord of vice or blasphemy, let it by common consent be silenced. Let offence against morality be offence against the majesty of the State; let not only murder, theft, violence, be punished by the magistrate, but adultery, fornication, drunkenness, blasphemy, heresy, and every excess of frivolity, vanity, or luxury. Let the chief end of government among us be the chief end of the Christian religion, to purify, to exalt, to save mankind." In one word, Calvin proposed to establish a theocracy, its organ not one man, a David or a Josiah, but a republic of men, sovereigns over themselves, yet deeming it the glory of their sovereignty to be subject to Christ. "To raise up the enfeebled will, to stir the individual conscience, to incite the soul not only to reclaim its rights, but to feel its obligations; to substitute free obedience for passive submission—this," according to so unprejudiced an authority as the Westminster Review, "was the lofty aim of the simple, not to say barbarous, legislation of Calvin. The inquisitorial rigours of the Consistory encouraged, instead of humbling, independence. Government at Geneva was not police, but education; self-government mutually enforced by equals on each other."

That the idea of Calvin was sublime will be denied by no one able to comprehend it. "Had Calvin," says the Westminster reviewer just quoted, "like Plato, left only a paper sketch of a republic, in glowing language and magnificent imagery, how much more would he have been admired by the world! He did how much more than describe a virtuous society—he created one! . . . The power thus generated was too expansive to be confined to Geneva. It went forth into all countries. From every part of Protestant Europe eager hearts flocked hither to catch something of the inspiration. The reformed communions, which doctrinal discussion was fast splitting up into ever-multiplying sects, began to feel in this moral sympathy a new centre of union. This, and this alone, enabled the Reformation to make head against the terrible repressive forces brought to bear by Spain—the Inquisition and the Jesuits. Sparta against Persia was not such odds as Geneva against Spain. Calvinism saved Europe. The rugged and grotesque discipline of Calvin raised up, from St. Andrew's to Geneva, that little band, not very polished, not very refined, but free men!

That which we are, we are;
One equal temper of heroic hearts Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will,
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield."

All that was greatest and most heroic in Europe for two centuries arose from its influence, or consisted in the manifestation, of this idea. City after city, nation after nation, thrilled with the sacred aspiration to become holiness unto the Lord. A passion of self-devotion to the service and worship of the Most High throbbed in the breasts of men. If you would understand the history of Europe for two centuries, grasp the fact of this enthusiasm. When we look into the ecclesiastical ordinances of the Church of Geneva, they seem to us, at the first moment, the very annihilation of freedom. The member of the Church State—for this, rather than a State-Church, is what we find in Geneva the sixteenth century—was directed and restrained in the minutest concern of his daily life. The number of dishes which he set upon his table was fixed; his dress was conformed to certain strict regulations; when he gave his daughter in marriage he could present her with no more than a regulated number of jewels, and the wreath on her forehead was not allowed to gleam with diamonds or pearl; when he died his nearest relative was not allowed to rear a stone to his memory. We are apt to exclaim that no tyranny could be more grinding or galling than this, and that the man who, after having been generously sheltered and promoted in Geneva, subjected her citizens to such domination, was the most cruel and remorseless of usurpers. Look, again, at one of the most vigorous though remote manifestations of the spirit breathed by Calvin into the Churches, as we find it in Scotland when the Covenanted agitation was at its height. The people are placed under the vigilant surveillance of the Church; they cannot draw water on the Lord's-day without incurring ecclesiastical censure; they may be condemned to undergo discipline, before the congregation, with iron collars round their necks. Who does not cry out against what seems a despotism so searching, so inflexible, so inevitable, and conclude that the nation must have groaned under it? But the Genevese—the representative and authoritative majority in the Republic—were sensible of no restraint in the ordinances of Calvin; and the glow of passionate enthusiasm with which the Scotch accepted and insisted upon the ecclesiastical discipline of the Covenanters has not ceased to warm the blood of that nation to this day. Who was Calvin? Who was Knox, the disciple and friend of Calvin, that the one should rule in Geneva and the other in Scotland? Calvin had no fleet or army; he came into Geneva a poor man, and when he died, he was a poor man still; beyond the powers which dwelt in his heart, his mind, his spirit, his cause, he had none wherewith to act upon the Genevese. He did not force himself upon the people. He stayed with them reluctantly, wishing, like Moses and like Jonah, to escape the burden laid upon him by God. His power was rooted in the fact that in him more than in any man was embodied and intensified that ardour of spiritual aspiration which burned in ten thousand of the noblest bosoms in the State. He laid before them his plan of Church order, and they accepted it. There was the College of Pastors, styled the Venerable Company, comprehending all the pastors of the city and territory, together with the teachers of theology; its functions bore chiefly upon the education and appointment of pastors. There was also the Consistorial Court, a tribunal of discipline, composed of the five city pastors and twelve lay elders, these last selected from the Council of Sixty and the Council of Two Hundred, which constituted the Parliament of Geneva. In 1536 the Genevese adopted this administrative scheme of Calvin's, subscribing also a confession of faith in twenty-one articles. They tried it for a couple of years, but then the Libertines prevailed, and Calvin was expelled from the city. Geneva tried hard to do without him. But it found itself constrained to return to his plan. The Libertine idea of freedom—that of leaving things alone, the laissez faire of modern economists—could impart neither strength nor dignity to the State; and the better party, rallying their forces, brought the Republic to their own conception of liberty—namely, the spontaneous determination, resolutely and under penalties to be adhered to, to erect a State realising the Divine ideal of society, and submitting to the Divine injunctions. Calvin was recalled; he asked not to be brought back, but they sent for him. This was in 1541, and for twenty-three years did the Reformer exercise a virtual sovereignty in Geneva. For fourteen years the opposition of the Libertines was unceasing and virulent; but the steady support of the majority upheld Calvin, and at the end of this time the Libertines were finally cast out. The higher freedom triumphed. Geneva declared for a liberty not of license, but of law; a liberty of energetic persistence in good works; a liberty to will decisively that the city and its territory should shun the evil and choose the good. She would be free not as the tribe that roams the desert is free, but as the company of Spartans were free when, bidding the stranger go and tell their countrymen that they had died in slaying them, they advanced with willing step, but earnest mind, into the battle that must end in death. It seems a paradox, yet it is a fact, that the world-historical agitation—out of which came English Puritanism, with its British Parliament; Dutch Puritanism, with its Republic of the Netherlands; New England Puritanism, with its United States of America; in fact, all that is most liberal in the institutions of modern times—was an agitation in favour of discipline. The liberty which is a mere instinctive and irreflective desire to throw off restraint, tends to national dissolution; the liberty which is spontaneous determination towards a noble existence, the liberty which is self-constraint, the liberty which is willing accordance of supremacy to conscience and to reason, is that which sets peoples in the van of civilization. Such was the liberty of Geneva.

Nevertheless, Calvin was wrong. The reign of the saints on earth, the millennial kingdom of the Saviour, will not be attained in his way. In the intensity with which he realised the idea of the State and of the Church, he failed to realise adequately the idea of the individual, or to see what transcendent importance is attached to this idea by Christianity. The Geneva he laboured to form was a Christianised edition of the old Greek State, in which the citizen was lost in the Commonwealth; or of the old Hebrew Monarchy, in which the law of the nation regulated every usage of the household. Calvin sprang from a race on which ancient civilization had left an indelible impression. His type of mind was such as we look for among the heroes of Plutarch, the austere sages of Greece and senators of Rome, rather than among the great ones of Teutonic blood. Luther could not have conceived a Geneva on the model of Calvin. In the Christian ages the Church-State of Calvin's aspirations was an anachronism. The moral character of the individual and of the family has passed beyond regulation by the State. Opinion has been declared to be no vassal of force. The civil sword and the spiritual sword have been placed in different hands, and what God has put apart let not man join together. In regulating by law—even by Divine law—what men should eat and wherewithal they should be clothed, Calvin mistook the office and the capability of law; in vesting magistrates with authority to follow up the decisions of the Church in cases of heresy with imprisonment or death, Calvin mistook the function of Christian discipline. This was the grand mistake of Calvinism, and of its offspring, Puritanism. They would compel men and nations with whips and scourges to come in unto the marriage supper of the Lamb. They would subject peoples to a process of moral purification by force. They would make men religious by public ordinance, spiritual by act of Parliament; select in attire, temperate in diet, simple in dress, all by compulsion. The attempt proved vain. Ostentation, luxury, profligacy, could not be put down by law. Goodness itself became to many minds hateful when imposed by decree of Parliament. Virtue, morality, godliness, lost their beauty when touched by force, as the daughters of a princely house would lose the bloom of their beauty, and the delicate grace of their movements, when set to work in the manacles of the slave. It is by a subtler ministry that these are promoted—by those fine influences which affect the roots of character—by persuasion stealing into the heart, and blossoming and fruit bearing in the life. Read Calvin's opinions on luxury, frivolity, recreation, and so on, and you will find them admirable. So long as the application is left to the individual, all is well. But when the opinion is enforced by legal apparatus—when men, women, and children are brought before tribunals to answer for irreverent words or to be rebuked for dressing too ornamentally—the sublime descends to the ridiculous. We ought to recognise, with thankfulness to God, that, in these points we have advanced beyond our ancestors. We have acknowledged, in all the breadth of the proposition, that Christianity is neither to be defended nor diffused by force in bringing order and beauty into the moral chaos of the world we trust only to a ministry of light. The end at which we aim is the same as Calvin's, the perfection of men and nations in all moral duties; but the means we use are different. We owe to God that, in applying those means, we were animated by the fervour of Calvin and the earnestness of our Puritan fathers!

As in all things human, we must here once more learn to distinguish the good from the evil; to put the two entirely apart; to love the good no less ardently because of the near shadow of the evil, and to hate the evil no less thoroughly because its dark visage is half hidden by the radiant veil of the good. What was wrong in the Church-State of Geneva was profoundly wrong, unscripturally wrong. The precept of the Saviour, discriminating for all time between the civil and the spiritual, by assigning the things of Cæsar unto Cæsar, and the things of God unto God, was practically violated. In the providence of the all-wise Governor of the Universe, it was permitted that, early in the history of Protestantism, the appalling consequences of bringing reason and conscience before a human tribunal, and making heresy a civil crime, should be displayed. That Servetus died for the sake of his theological opinions—that from Geneva, striving to be the city of God, the bride of Christ, arose the glare of persecution's fires in answer to those of Rome—that Calvin, pleading though he did against death at the stake, was yet beyond question a chief agent in procuring the execution—all this constituted a warning so terrible, that its effect, sooner or later, could not but be the utter and everlasting rejection of persecuting doctrines by the Reformed Churches. To understand the sentence and doom of Servetus from the Genevan point of view is easy. In a theocracy, in a Church-State, the blasphemer is the greatest of possible offenders. To impute the execution to personal vindictiveness on the part of Calvin is mere stupidity. Never did Hebrew king or prophet administer the judgment of God with a purer sense of duty. Had he flinched on this occasion he would have deemed himself an offender against his own conscience, and a traitor to the Reformed Churches—an opinion in which all the theologians of the day, with the dubious exception of Luther, would have agreed with him. The execution of Servetus was the natural, the logical, the inevitable result of the system of affairs in Geneva, and it affords demonstration that in that system there was one grand and incurable error. This is the evil; not to be obscured, not to be palliated; to be condemned and deplored. But the good, on the other hand, was very good. That the end of national as of individual existence is the glory of God, remains eternally true. That the State should be holy, that the family should be holy, that the man should be holy, is to be proclaimed as emphatically in Britain in the nineteenth century as it was proclaimed by Calvin in Geneva in the sixteenth. Substitute the agency of persuasion for the agency of force, and all will be well. It is important likewise to remember that though, as seen from afar by the eye of history, the element of force appears to have intruded in Geneva into all concerns, domestic and personal;

though the citizen appears to have had no existence except under the constraining surveillance of the magistrate—it was in exceptional cases, not as a rule, that force was applied. The recalcitrant minority have made themselves heard for ages; but we are apt to forget that, in thousands of Genevan families, the discipline of Calvin, instead of being a galling yoke, was a willing obedience. The man whose profoundest aspiration it was to live soberly, righteously, and godly, saw in the ordinances of Calvin the realisation of his own ideal, and the Geneva of Calvin's day abounded with such men. If we confine our attention to the cases which came before the Consistory, to the severe discipline occasionally exercised upon the Libertines, to the futile riots by which the minority attempted at intervals to destroy the order of the State, we shall form as incorrect a picture of the Geneva of Calvin as we should form of the institutions and homes of England in our own day by exclusive perusal of law reports. Had we visited Geneva in the time of Calvin, particularly after his final triumph over the Libertines, in 1555, we should have seen a community peacefully, willingly, joyfully serving God; drunkenness, gambling, profane swearing, and other forms of immorality, comparatively unknown; education of the young, instruction of the old, cultivation of literature and learning, going prosperously forward; every home a Church from which praise and prayer went up to God. This it was which made Geneva a Zion to which the eyes of the devout in all Protestant countries turned. This it was which made the thought of discipline to Huguenot, to Puritan, to Covenanter, a thought of delight, an ideal of sacred felicity, to be striven after with heroic steadfastness and invincible daring. This it was which inspired Milton with that prose hymn in which he celebrates discipline as "the very shape and image of virtue, whereby she is not only seen in the regular gestures and motions of her heavenly paces as she walks, but also makes the harmony of her voice audible to mortal ears." What we think of as a rod of iron too stern for earth, Milton thought of as a golden sceptre not laid aside by Christ in heaven. "Yea," he exclaims, "the angels themselves, in whom no disorder is feared, as the apostle that saw them in his rapture describes, are distinguished and quaternioned into the celestial principdoms and satrapies, according as God himself has writ His imperial decrees through the great provinces of heaven. The state also of the blessed in Paradise, though never so perfect, is not therefore left without discipline, whose golden surveying reed marks out and measures every quarter and circuit of new Jerusalem." P. B.

CHRISTIAN PATRIOTISM.

To a large extent the present is an age of evangelistic effort; and, according to accidental circumstances, some take most interest in the home field, others in the foreign. One will give thousands of pounds for church extension in England, and will hesitate about a sovereign for India; his friend will grudge the sovereign for bricks and mortar in Britain, but would gladly send a score of missionaries to the ends of the earth. And each has his own arguments. "Charity begins at home," says the church or chapel-builder. "She has been so long at home," retorts the philanthropist, "that she would be the better of a change of air. Though it were but to save her life, she must go abroad; otherwise she will die, and leave the throne open to that imper, Selfishness." "You have curiously-constructed eyes," says Domestic Charity; "you can only see afar off; and your ears correspond, for you can hear cries from Macedonia, whilst from the mews behind your house they call in vain, 'Come over and help us.'" "And you—you walk by sense," rejoins Philanthropy; "unless you see the misery, you won't believe it; and a ragged child on your door-step is to you more important than a nation at the antipodes." "Forgive me for saying it, friend Philanthropy," by way of last word throws in the keeper at home; "but that is no quarrel with you. There is no sense in a faith like yours. It is a freak, a fancy. I were blackening my white savages, they would grow instantly romantic; and if could get the Seven Dials or the Potteries afloat and tow them away to the Pacific Ocean, you would get up a society and send the Gospel after them."

But, coming in and arbitrating between the two, says Apostolic Christianity: "For this altercation there is no need; though there is need for either form of effort. I was myself first a home missionary, then colonial, and last of all a foreign one. I began at Jerusalem, then I went to Antioch, and then I went into all the world. But even when I came to Greece and Rome, Jerusalem was not forsaken. God is merciful, and blessed us first of all, and then His way was known upon earth. He had first our Pentecost, then the world had its times of refreshing. The Lord came, His face to shine upon us, and His saving health radiated forth to all nations." In other words, true patriotism is true philanthropy, and anything which exalts our own land in righteousness is a benefaction to the world. This will be seen whether we view our country publicly and politically, as one of the several nations which dwell on the face of the earth, or as a community made up of so many millions of individual members.

It is often asked, "What's in a name?" and we might answer by simply naming certain names. We might answer by asking, Where would our world be, or what ever would it do, if it were not for some great names? What would Sweden be without the names of the two Gustavuses—the great Vasa and the yet greater Adolphus? What would Scotland be if its annals did not contain three names of renown, each of them a rallying cry, a resurrection word—any one of them, when sounded even in a nation's most lethargic mood, sufficient to make it leap to life again—Wallace, Bruce, and (the most thrilling of the three) John Knox? What would Germany be without the name of Luther? What would the Forest Canton be without the name of William Tell? By earning a noble name, each of these has done his country good through all the successive centuries; and every Switzer walks with a prouder step because the echoes of Uri still repeat the name of the valiant marksman; every German clings closer to the fatherland because the spirit of the great Reformer seems still to linger in its air. And as with the individual, so with the nation. All the world is the better for it when a nation earns a great name and a good one. By their great fight for freedom Switzerland and the Netherlands have left the world their debtor; human history will be ended before these two elements of sublimity are exhausted, "the grandeur that was Rome and the glory that was Greece." There seems something hallowing in the very name of the Holy Land; and we are lifted upwards as we sing, "O Mother dear, Jerusalem;" and, if true to our opportunity, God is now inviting our country to do in all meekness what the builders of Babel attempted in their arrogance. He is giving Britain opportunity to make itself "a name in the earth"—a name for which the world will be the better till the race has run its career and earthly existence has ended.

Even better than a great name is a great presence; and well is it for the world if at any time there is present amidst its peoples a nation strong and free, calm, wise, unselfish. Well was it for Europe when the United Provinces, freed from their successful struggle, threw their weight into the scale of national independence and religious liberty, and offered an impregnable asylum to the exiles of England, France, and Spain. And well for mankind will it be if in the forthcoming conflicts within the old world and the new, there should be at least one nation in and firm, temperate, self-possessed, magnanimous, looking not only on its own things, but on the things of others—magnanimous enough to wish the general welfare, and itself so free and happy, as to beget in each beholder the desire, “O that we were only such another!”

A result so glorious can only be attained by a very general diffusion of Christianity throughout the masses of our people. Under our representative constitution we can hope for any continuance of a generous, high-toned public policy, on the one condition only that we be a virtuous, self-denying, God-fearing community. Let the twenty millions of England and the three millions of Scotland sink into irreligion and sottishness, with all the consequent rapacity and recklessness—with all the consequent cowardice and slavishness—and no statesmanship will make our national position noble; but let the Christian Church, with God's blessing on well-directed effort, raise the community in moral worth and religious principle—let the Gospel make us a people sober, truthful, self-mastering—a people who take as their rule of conduct the will of God, and who in their calculations include the great hereafter—a people truly Christian, and amidst their distresses and perplexities—it would comfort other countries to know that there is such a nation. The city set on a hill could not be hid, and like the star from the pharos, shooting far forth through the storm, “Ye are the light of the world,” there would be news in its shining—news of a haven for peoples as well as persons in that kingdom which cannot be moved.

There is another way in which it will be seen how the efforts of a pious patriotism are, in the case of Britain more especially, a great contribution to the world's welfare. We go everywhere, and everybody comes to us. “Go ye into all the world,” said the Lord Jesus to His disciples, “and preach the Gospel to every creature.” Britain goes into all the world, and wherever a Briton goes he preaches something; but is it always the Gospel? What is it that our sailors often preach on the shores of China? What is it that our settlers have too often preached to the aborigines of Australia and America? What is it that both civilians and soldiers have preached times without number to the natives of India? Amongst the more savage races has it not been too often a gospel of gunpowder? And if races more civilised—if the Mongol and Hindoo—were to take all their visitors as living epistles of the English religion, would they not often associate it with oaths and imprecations, bad blows and heavy drinking, great mischief in our seamen when merry, great silliness in our gentlemen when sober? Doubtless there are glorious exceptions, and British commerce has often been a mighty benefit to regions where our religion has been poorly represented. But would it not be well for those regions, and more creditable for ourselves, if the exceptions were the rule? Would it not be well for the colonies, well for the Continent, well for the world, if Britain were a community pervaded with piety in all its ranks—in that rank from which our ships and armaments are replenished—in that rank from which our clerks, and traders, and merchants are recruited—in that rank from which go forth our officers and diplomats, our tourists and sightseers? You will grant that it would be well for our colonies if they abounded in such men as Thomas Pringle, whose gentle and long-suffering goodness in the eyes of fierce Caffres shed round him a lustre almost heavenly—securing through many a savage warfare protection for his people and their property. It will be allowed that it would be well for the Continent if men of wealth and leisure, spending a season anywhere, would do as Robert Haldane did, whose reading of the Romans with a few students at Geneva opened the eyes of Senner and Gonthier and Merle d'Aubigné, and lit many a lamp still shining in Belgium, France, and Switzerland. It would be well for our own army, and for the heathen among whom they sometimes sojourn, if the sight were oftener seen when some one witnessed at Rangoon, who, hearing the voice of psalmody in a Buddhist temple, entered, and found the heroic Havelock with his Bible and hymn-book before him, and surrounded by more than a hundred men, whilst in their laps the cross-legged images held the lamps for the Christian worship.

Only think of it! A nation truly Christian! An empire in the mood and spirit in which the little Moravian band once was, every man, whatsoever might, his trade or calling, professedly a Christian and practically a missionary! What a prospect for the forty colonies and dependencies of this empire, with all their populations, actual and possible—what a prospect for the 130 millions of our pagan fellow-subjects—if we dared to hope that every settler henceforward going forth would set up an altar to the God of Bethel—that every servant going out to India would be like the little Hebrew maid in Syria—that every governor at Calcutta or Hong-kong would be like Daniel in Babylon, with an excellent spirit and an open loyalty to God! And think of it, if we at home were what we ought to be, and what we profess to be—think of the effect on the stranger who comes to sojourn within our gates! For if we go into all the world, the world repays the visit; and if our social state and spiritual tone were high enough, even without a gift of tongues, the foreigner would understand the sermon. As they looked and listened, as they saw the empty prisons and crowded sanctuaries, the pure streets, the smiling homes, the hearty industry, the harmless pleasure-parties—as they saw the whole aspect of a people by whom God is loved, and trusted, and remembered—“strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes, Cretes and Arabians,” in the protracted Pentecost, would perceive a “wonderful work of God,” and to their own endless advantage might be led to ask, “What meaneth this?”

Let us remember our responsibility. In the distribution of His gifts God is Sovereign, and as to certain individuals, so to certain nations, He gives a larger share. But where much is given, there is much required. It is a serious thing to be the possessor of large property, the steward of so many thousand pounds a-year. It is a serious thing to be at the head of a large establishment, to be an extensive employer of labour, to have servants under you, or soldiers, to whom you say Go or Come, and who are so far amenable to your wishes. Perhaps it is the most serious thing of all to possess what are called great talents—a clear head, the power of vigorous or original thinking, popular manners, a persuasive style of speaking; the abilities which can invest truth with new attractions, or throw over error a momentary glamour. Now, we need not disguise it; the Most High has dealt with us as He has dealt with no other nation, and ours is a tremendous stewardship. English is now the chief vernacular of Christendom; it is the native language of more people than speak either French or German; and a book written in our mother-tongue has a wider power for good or evil than any other. And we have vast estate, great wealth, high prestige, and enormous numbers. It is enough to make a young man thoughtful to find himself a reigning prince or a wealthy peer. It should be enough to make Britain very thoughtful when from her sea-girt eminence she looks out on her vast dominions, on which the sun never sets, and where summer never ceases; as she surveys her subjects and fellow-citizens, red and dusky, fair and sable, one in eight of the human family; as she sees floating to her feet the produce of every climate and the wealth of every haven, and hears the voice of Eternal Rectitude proclaiming, “To whom much is given, of the same shall much be required.”

It is a tremendous stewardship, and as ours is a world-wielding position, it is surely right that ours should be a missionary attitude. It is right that conferences should assemble to consider the best mode of conducting evangelistic operations; it is right that mighty gatherings should convene to hear of the progress made, and that large offerings should be consecrated to the cause; and it is right that some of our noblest spirits, some of our most gallant workers and heroic adventurers, should go forth on the glorious enterprise. But the point at which we more immediately aim is this: That for effective evangelization abroad, we need a religious revival at home. We need it, in order that from a fervid community there may go forth fervid evangelists. We need it, in order that after they are gone they may be followed by affectionate remembrance and by persevering, earnest prayer. We need it, in order that our attitude and action, as a nation, may be a commendation of our Christianity; and we need it, in order that our authorised missionaries, instead of being contradicted, may be supported and seconded by the example and teaching of all their own countrymen with whom the heathen come in contact.

We subjoin but one remark: Piety goes farther than political economy. As far as the one can keep up with the other they make excellent fellow-travellers; for, on the one hand, cheap food and abundant occupation are conducive to well-doing; and, on the other, by its thrift and forethought, its sobriety and honesty, real religion prevents physical degeneracy, and pauperism, and crime, and so promotes the wealth of nations. The two are good friends, and, as long as the strength of the feeble holds out, they make delightful travelling companions; but at last a platform is reached where the air is too pure for the more mortal organization, and where the science which is of the earth earthy begins to flag, and can only say to Faith, "Go you forward." In other words, the political economist has done his part when he has made a population rich and strong and comfortable; but the true publicist—the Christian philanthropist—goes farther. He thanks the gallant warriors, be they stipendiary or volunteer, who sustain the nation's valour, and who, by keeping it strong, keep it safe and unmolested. He thanks the busy traders who bring in the wealth, who into the lap of Industry pour abundance from all seas. And he thanks that industry which, producing for all lands, provides for its own house and attracts to the cottage homes of England luxuries once unknown in the palace of the Cæsars. But he looks farther and looks higher. After all, he cannot forget, "What shall it profit if the soul be lost?" And whilst the economist, as such, is not bound to think of the life hereafter, nor of the lands around it—feeling that his country is only safe when under God's own guardianship, and only blessed when God's face shines on it, the Christian philanthropist feels that there is something better for a nation than even wealth, power, comfort. That better thing is nobleness, the ability and disposition to confer benefits on others. And in this spirit—the Psalmist's spirit—he prays—

Shine, mighty God, on Britain shine,
With beams of heavenly grace;
Reveal Thy power through all our coasts,
And show Thy smiling face.

Amidst our isle, exalted high,
Do Thou the glory stand,
And, like a wall of guardian fire,
Surround the favoured land.

So shall Thy name, from shore to shore,
Sound all the earth abroad,
And distant nations know and love
Their Saviour and their God.

DEBATES OF THE LEGISLATIVE CHAMBER UPON THE QUESTION OF THE TEMPORAL PAPACY.

There are subjects which continually recur through the very necessity of things, until they are definitely arranged. Such is the occupation of Rome by a French army. Our Government is conscious enough that this is one of the most vulnerable points in its foreign policy; it tries to prevent all discussion in regard to it in the two Houses and by the press. But silence is a remedy for nothing, and discussion recommences on the very first favourable opportunity.

Thus, M. Jules Favre, one of our most eloquent political orators, has recently unfolded this question before the Legislative Chamber. Take, in few words, the substance of his complaints:—

1. The French Government had promised to effect a reconciliation between Italy and the Papacy; but its intervention has not at all attained that end. Very far from it; animosities have increased on both sides. Pius IX. is more and more obstinate in his retrograde pretensions. The Italian nation, for its part, is every day more convinced that any agreement with the Pontifical See is impossible. Is it not time for our country to put an end to efforts which are barren and almost ridiculous?

2. The French had won a great and just popularity in the Peninsula by breaking the Austrian yoke. But the advantages of this popularity are lost. The Italians are irritated against our Government, which opposes the obstacle of its bayonets to the organization of its internal liberty.

3. The Pope himself and the cardinals have no gratitude to Napoleon III. On the contrary, they manifest, on every occasion, sentiments of mistrust and hostility against the French troops and the Cabinet of Paris.

Moreover, France is exposed to a kind of dishonour by protecting at Rome a Government which favours brigandage in the kingdom of Naples, and which holds out its hand to the vilest malefactors. This is a partnership which we ought to repudiate. If not, the civilised world will reproach us for being the accomplice of abominable crimes.

The speaker for the Government, M. Rouher, has not judged it fitting to refute these arguments. He has contented himself with saying that time and Providence would furnish the best solution of the difficulties. It must be admitted that this Minister of State has chosen the most convenient, but not the most conclusive course. Providence and time certainly effect great things, but men ought to be co-workers with God, and it is not permitted to an earnest Government to remain, like the fatalists of Mohammedanism, in complete inaction, with the vague hope that all will be arranged by a superhuman power. M. Rouher has simply evaded the problem, and this is not the way to solve it.

CONSTANT EFFORTS FOR THE INTRODUCTION OF THE ROMAN LITURGY IN FRANCE.

While the temporal power of the Papacy is the subject of conflicts in the Legislative Chamber, Pius IX. obstinately pursues his plan for introducing the Roman Liturgy into all the dioceses of France. This question is more grave than it would seem to be at first sight. The question is not only of some modifications in the liturgical prayers, it is a new system; it is the Ultramontane spirit which seeks to prevail.

The old French liturgies were, in different degrees, the expression of Gallicanism. The Roman Catholic bishops of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in particular, had removed from or added to the liturgy certain articles which had a political as well as a religious character. Now, if the Roman Breviary is everywhere adopted, it will be the triumph of the Jesuits and of pontifical absolutism. The ancient liberties of the Gallican Church will disappear.

The French Government views this movement with legitimate displeasure; for it is said, among other things, in the Roman Liturgy, that the Pope has the right to depose emperors and kings. This is the theory of Gregory VII. But when the priests are in agreement with their bishop as to this change the Minister of Worship says nothing. He would fear, if he ordained the keeping of the Gallican liturgies, a violent resistance, and consequently he shuts his eyes, meanwhile reserving to himself the right seriously to reprimand the prelates who might dare to mix themselves up in civil affairs.

At Lyons, as you know, the question has taken quite another turn, because the priests themselves have given the signal for energetic opposition to Cardinal de Bonald. Pius IX. has persisted in his design; but the Moniteur Officiel has, within these few days, published the following declaration: "The Government, using the right which the Organic Articles of the Concordat attribute to it, has not authorized the publication in France of a brief given at Rome for the introduction of the Roman liturgy into the diocese of Lyons. Any publication given to this brief would, therefore, constitute a violation of a law which the Government has the will and the duty to make respected." This is very exact and clear. The Ultramontanes are excessively mortified, because Pius IX. has been humbled before public opinion; but they dare not raise their voice against a legal act of the civil power.

GRAND FESTIVALS IN HONOUR OF THE VIRGIN MARY.

The Jesuits seek to console themselves for these checks by inflaming the popular imagination through splendid ceremonies and festivals. They hope thus to conquer among the ignorant and devotee classes an influence which will permit them to employ more lofty language towards the Government.

It would be difficult to give your readers an exact idea of what they daily contrive in honour of the Virgin. It is a rivalry of superstitious which exceeds all bounds. In the city of Puy, for example, in the centre of France, the bishop has lately inaugurated a colossal statue of the Virgin, in the presence of more 50,000 spectators. This statue is in bronze; it has been made in great part out of the cannon taken by the French soldiers in the Crimea. What a singular association of ideas and of things! The Virgin Mary, a woman so modest and ingenuous, armed—in her image—out of the most terrible instruments of war! But Romish bigotry is by no means arrested by such spectacles.

Another festival of the same kind will shortly take place at Marseilles. The Jesuit journals are already filled with details respecting the preparations for this solemnity. It appears that the French cardinals and bishops in great number will officiate, and it has been announced that perhaps 300,000 persons will take part in the ceremony. What is all this? A new species of Paganism.

We are in the month of Mary at the time I write these lines. Processions, litanies, prayers, and the exhibition of relics, are incessant. The whole of the Roman religion seems to be concentrated in the worship of the Virgin. Peasants and female devotees will, perhaps, derive from it greater fervour; but the intelligent men of the Roman Church feel disgusted at it, and the number of unbelievers increases.

ACTS OF INTOLERANCE IN RELATION TO CEMETERIES.

From time to time our political and religious journals point out facts which prove that the Papal clergy are little disposed to respect religious liberty, and carefully abide by their superannuated maxims.

I shall especially refer to what concerns the cemeteries. According to the provisions of our laws, the cemeteries belong to the municipal authority. It is the mayor, and not the curé, of every commune who exercises control over these civic possessions. But the priests do not accept this state of things, and by all possible means prevent heretics or dissidents from being interred by the side of the Roman Catholics, saying that the cemeteries would be profaned by their presence.

Generally, when the Protestants are numerous in a town or village, they possess a cemetery apart, and then all occasion of dispute is avoided. But it happens sometimes that a Protestant family is isolated in such or such a locality. In this case, when a member of the family dies, his relatives ask for him to be buried in the communal cemetery. But what is the conduct of many of the curés, supported by the power of their bishop? They obstinately refuse to yield to such a request, and pretend that the heretic must be buried in an obscure corner, intended only for infants which have died without being baptized, or for unfortunate beings who have perished by the laws. It is evident that the relatives cannot consent to this mark of dishonour. Hence arise conflicts which scandalise honourable people.

The State functionaries, we ought to say, to their honour, sustain the rights of the Protestants in circumstances of this nature. Thus several prefects and other magistrates have formally enjoined the interment of dissidents in the communal cemeteries, notwithstanding the resistance of the curés and the rebukes of the bishops.

GOOD EFFECTS OF RECENT PROTESTANT CONTROVERSIES.

I have given in my previous letters long details of the controversy about M. Coquerel, and the violent struggles which have taken place within the pale of French Protestantism. Matters have become more quiet, for the present at least, and we can better determine the effects which this great storm has produced.

Certainly everything has not been good either in this crisis or in its results. The attention of the Protestant Churches has been for several weeks almost entirely fixed upon painful and blighting disputes. The interests of piety and the spiritual life have suffered. Edification, which is the essential object of religious society, has ceded the first place to the expression of mutual resentments, and precious energies which ought to have been employed to enlighten and satisfy the faithful have been sadly absorbed by controversies.

Nevertheless, the good effects of the late discussions are visible, and ought to be mentioned.

1. The Evangelical party have shown that they were able to display a noble courage and a manly self-devotion. This energy has confirmed the confidence of pious minds in the triumph of truth.

2. The Liberals, or rather the radicals of Protestantism, have presented a singular spectacle—that of disunion under their own banner. They meet, they speak, they walk as one man, whenever they attack orthodoxy. But when they are called upon to declare what they believe themselves, the most startling discord appears. There are among these radicals earnest men, who admit still the supernatural intervention of God in the establishment of Christianity; but there are others who scarcely preserve their faith in a personal God, and in the system of future rewards and punishments. Some maintain the Apostle's Creed as their rule of doctrine and teaching; others reject it. It is a Tower of Babel: an inexpressible confusion of ideas and of words. How, then, could Protestant radicalism constitute a Church?

3. A certain number of persons who had been seduced by equivocal language are beginning to open their eyes. They see that these radicals, while continuing to use recognised formulas, have not at all the same belief in the authority of the Bible, the divinity of Christ, His expiatory work, &c. This is a revelation which is recalling to Evangelical pastors such of their parishioners as have preserved any desire for piety.

THE NAME AND MEMORY OF CALVIN IN OUR COUNTRY.

Amid these contests, the three-hundredth anniversary of the death of Calvin has not been forgotten. The Presbyterian Council of Paris has taken suitable measures for worthily celebrating the memory of our great and glorious Reformer. A number of important Churches in our provinces will follow this example.

Calvin is worthy on all accounts to receive testimonies of the gratitude and admiration of French Protestantism; for, under the blessing of Heaven, by his solid piety, his generous devotion, his powerful genius, and his prodigious activity, he accomplished a work which still endures and bears good fruits.

Our Reformer has been always maligned in France by two very different classes of writers—the Jesuits and the sceptics. Voltaire gave his hand to the most fanatical Ultramontanes in order to do violence to the character and deeds of Calvin. We ought to reinstate his memorial, and this duty will be accomplished.

MEETING OF THE SYNOD OF THE VAUDOIS CHURCH IN THE VALLEY OF PIEDMONT.

La Tour, Waldensian Valleys,
May 20, 1864.

The Annual Synod of the Waldensian Church has just closed. Like your own May meetings and the assemblies in the North, it is the great event of the year. Among these Alpine Protestants numberless arrangements of dress and household economy are made with reference to the third week of May. It is a week of festivity, hospitality, and kindly greeting and intercourse. La Tour, the capital town, is all stir and bustle for the moment.

This year the weather has been all that could be desired, the glorious sunshine giving us glimpses of the splendid scenery which grows in wild beauty as you ascend the bridge-paths which traverse the remote glens and gorges of the mountain parishes. The Synod, which moves about from parish to parish from year to year, has held its meeting this week at Coppier, the old parish church of La Tour, and about a mile higher up the valley. It is a rustic and venerable sanctuary, having been built and dedicated to God's service in 1506. It is also associated with some of the most heart-stirring events of Waldensian history, being the only church which was spared by the persecutors of this ancient people.

during their forced exile from 1686 to 1689. The first Synod of the Church after the heroic rentrée of the Waldensians under Armand—like their pastor and their general—was convened in this building, which, in 1861, was restored through the liberality of Miss Bradshaw, now the wife of General Molyneux Williams.

As usual, a large number of Christian strangers from various Churches and countries have been attracted to the spot, two of whom, Messrs. Graham and Roberts, with excellent photographic apparatus, succeeded in obtaining views of the assembled Synod and of the more historic localities of the neighbourhood. The Free Church of Scotland was represented by Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn, Rev. Mr. McDougall, of Florence, and the Rev. Mr. Ollie, of Genoa; the National Church of Geneva by Mr. Chapuis; the Church of England by Rev. Carter Hall; the London Vaudois Committee by Mr. Amedroz, of the Admiralty-office; while Mr. James Graham, of Limekilns, and Mr. Roberts, architect, London, old friends of the Waldenses, represented the wide-spread interest felt in their past preservation as a witnessing, and their present efforts as an evangelistic Church all the world over.

The opening service was on Tuesday, when Pastor Meille, of Turin, unquestionably the foremost man in the Church for intellectual gifts and preaching power, discoursed eloquently on the parable of the talents. He showed the number of talents lately put in the stewardship of the Waldenses by God, in the shape of wonderful opportunities of usefulness throughout wide Italy; and while taking note of the efforts put forth, did not fail to express a profound sense of shortcoming in quitting themselves like men and Christians, highly-favoured, of their solemn responsibilities. The evening sederunt was occupied with receiving four reports of the "Table," the governing body of the Church, during the past year, composed of five members, three clerical and two lay, whose duty is confined to the care of the Valley parishes; of the Evangelization Committee, many of the facts contained in which report I have ere now communicated to your readers, with regard to the progress of their missionary enterprise from Milan to Palermo; of the Hospital Committee; and of the Educational Board; the latter being naturally a branch to which the greatest attention is paid, and on which the greatest stress is laid.

On Wednesday morning—and the Synod opens very early, at seven o'clock daily—very interesting reports as to the spiritual life of the various parishes were given in. These bore upon the state of the Sabbath-schools, the prayer-meetings, the attendance on ordinances, the moral condition of the parishioners, in short, upon the revival of religion generally; and were in answer to questions on these subjects addressed by last Synod to the ministers and elders of the Church. The reports were, on the whole, satisfactory, evidencing a growing and higher inner life among the people, though on this head much yet remains to be accomplished, with God's blessing.

In the afternoon the case of Mr. Pendleton and the Rosario colony of Waldenses in South America was taken up. Five years ago, the Rev. Mr. Pendleton, now British chaplain at Florence, but then Foreign-office chaplain at Monte Video, after having nobly hazarded his own life on behalf of these simple emigrants from the Valleys, and secured for them a safe asylum in Spanish South America, through his persevering exertions with foreign governments and merchants, came to the Waldensian Synod, was received with all the honours due to the David Livingstone of the South American Continent, obtained a pastor and schoolmaster for the colony, and a mandat to collect funds to build a church and school-house at Rosario, as well as to support, in perpetuity, the preacher and teacher whom he and the Synod had chosen as suited for the colony. Mr. Pendleton has received generous contributions in many quarters, but has met with difficulties, which necessitated his return to the colony, where he felt called to aid the material interests of the emigrants, as well as to maintain the ordinances of religion among them. Differences have arisen between the Rosario pastor and him, the church has not been erected, nor money funded to secure a salary for the minister and schoolmaster, and some grumbling has naturally arisen on the part of the contributors, not so much that the direct object of the subscription has not been attained, but that no account of the moneys received and expended had been laid before them. At last Synod this balance-sheet was asked from Mr. Pendleton, and not being forthcoming, this Synod has expressed its deep regret, and simply withdrawn from Mr. Pendleton any "further authority to raise money on the part of the Waldensian Church for the benefit of the colony."

This step was absolutely called for. Though the object contemplated, and for which a considerable sum has been raised, and no account of it given, has not been compassed, Mr. Pendleton has intimated that after July he is not responsible for the pastor's maintenance, and the same thing with regard to the school-master after December next. You can easily conceive with what feelings of gratitude and esteem for the person and work of Mr. Pendleton, on the part of every member of the Synod, this most disagreeable step was taken. I trust it may lead Mr. Pendleton, whose honour and moral character, as an intimate friend of my own, I do not doubt for a single moment, to furnish the necessary monetary statement. A general compte rendu would have sufficed, though after the lapse of five years, and the object unaccomplished, further delay was impossible.

On Wednesday evening, in the large church of La Tour, an evangelization meeting was held, which it was worth while coming from England to be present at. A number of evangelists were to tell the public the story of their labours in the outfields of missionary enterprise. As it was, time only permitted three of the large staff to speak—namely, Messrs. Turin, of Milan; Jalla, of Turin; and Appia, of Naples. I wish all the friends of the Waldenses could have listened to these cheering details of Christian successful labour, aye, and their enemies also, for speech is so superior to a written report, especially to a Waldensian report, which eschews all that is enthusiastic, or merely promising, or in any way tinctured with exaggeration. Of this meeting, over which Mr. Geymonat presided, I hold myself bound to give you further information another time, as your space must be too crowded this month.

On Thursday morning, the important question was discussed of the nomination of pastors. Several of the Valleys parishes are in the High Alps, where for several months of the year the pastor and his people are snowed up, and cut off from all intercourse with the world. By reason of this, the law has all along obtained that the young ministers, after consecration, should go to the mountain parishes, and as vacancies occur descend in rotation, and according to seniority, to the churches of the upland districts and those of the cultivated plain. This law has, of course, its inconveniences, interfering as it does with the liberty of the people to choose their pastor, though securing a ministry among the people on the hills who might otherwise be left destitute, as is actually the case in the Felix Neff Valleys, on the French side of the Alps, and immediately adjoining the Waldensian Valleys. The inconveniences have latterly been felt in several parishes in a serious manner, and have caused a great deal of remonstrance, and even opposition. The Synod, after lengthened investigation, refused to grant full liberty to the various parishes to elect whom they would, and resolved to continue the law as at present, but appointed a commission to secure as much as possible "the right man in the right place."

In the afternoon, the most interesting meeting of the Synod was held, the one which always crowds the place of meeting—viz., the reception of the deputies of other Churches and friends of other lands. Dr. Stewart, the staunch friend and life-long benefactor of the Waldenses, whose affection for him is something inexpressibly touching and tender, among other things, urged the duty of Vaudois missionaries to instruct their people in the privilege of contributing more largely than at present for the expenses of worship and the maintenance of ordinances, so as to relieve the funds of the Evangelization Committee. Mr. McDougall gave details of the revived work in Florence and Tuscany, which had not been sufficiently enlarged upon in the Evangelization report, nor at the meeting of the previous evening. Mr. Collie spoke of having already gone hand-in-hand with the Genoese evangelist in school and missionary work. Mr. Chapuis, who many years ago had been Swiss pastor at Genoa, spoke of the love of Switzerland for the Waldenses, and its intense interest in their great work in Italy. Mr. Roberts made happy allusion to the need of better houses for the working classes, and urged the pastors to attend to this question, which had made so much progress in England and Scotland. Mr. Graham lauded the exertions of Mr. Appia, their evangelist at Naples, and very earnestly insisted on one or two more men coming to his aid, to undertake the many openings in Southern Italy; while the Rev. Carter Hall made a solemn appeal to the Waldenses to honour better the Lord's day in their Valleys, and so enjoy better the blessings which that day commemorates and secures. The reply to these brethren was one of the finest oratorical addresses of a Christian that I ever listened to, from the lips of Mr. Meille, and I can only for ever regret that no reporter was present to take down word for word.

To-day (Friday) the results of the competition by essays on the Sabbath question was announced. Mr. Henderson, of Pully, had kindly renewed his offer this year of three prizes of 30*l.*, 20*l.*, and 15*l.* respectively. The three best essays were discovered, on the of the adjudicators, to have been recent action of Dr. De Sanctis, to I have referred in recent letters, and er again, did not escape the notice of Valdenses, whose hearts have been d to the quick by the generous and words spoken in their favour by this ished man. In the circumstances, ot to compromise the independence of actis, it was finally resolved to adopt lowing resolution:—

Synod, full of solicitude for the evangoli-of Italy, and desirous to see the work ; not only in its own particular field of but wherever it is carried on with a gly Christian aim, notices with pleasure gress that is taking place on every hand.
ies particularly in the recent publications De Sanctis, in which is presented such a noble exposition of the constitutional principles of the Churches of Christ in general, as well as of the generous defence of the Waldensian Church which he has lately written in reply to an anonymous and defamatory libel. The Synod expresses likewise its earnest prayer that God may bless the Evangelical labours of Dr. De Sanctis, and that he may be able, without difficulty, to consecrate to the propagation of the Gospel in Italy, and in a sphere suited to his special acquirements, the great gifts which God has bestowed upon him.

After the re-election of the present "Table" and the appointment of next Synod to meet at St. Jean, the brethren commended one another to God, and separated to return to their various spheres of labour.

The only other intelligence of deep interest
I have to communicate, is the resignation of Dr. De Sanctis of his charge as evangelist of the Free Italian Church in Genoa, and of his official connexion with the Geneva Committee.
Dr. De Sanctis begs me to acquaint the Christian world of this fact, and to explain the motives which have induced him to resign.
I reserve the details upon the subject until next month.

PROTESTANT MISSIONS IN TURKEY—THE AMERICAN BOARD.

commencing a series of letters from Constantinople, we cannot do better than to brief sketch of the missionary opera-of the various Protestant societies whose are labouring for the evangelization of
y. We shall not speak particularly of Syria or Africa in this review, for Constantinople is not properly the centre of opes in these distant provinces.

most extended missionary operations
they are carried on under the patronage American Board of Missions, which is led chiefly by the Congregational and School Presbyterian Churches of the United States. The Armenians, Greeks, and absorbed the attention of the earlier series of this society, who were located Constantinople, Smyrna, Athens, &c., but not among the Armenians became at as interesting as to absorb the whole of the mission. The work among was given over to the Scotch, and for missionary labour for the Greeks was up, except at Athens, where the able Dr. King still labours. The Armenians is still the most important, but the Crimean war this society has sent out men to labour exclusively both for the Mohammedans and Bulgarians.

At the present time, the American war has somewhat reduced the number of labourers in the field; but there are still forty missionary families, beside female assistants, actually on the ground, aside from those in Syria. These are divided as follows: Two in Constantinople are labouring for the Mohammedans; one in Constantinople, and four occupying Philipopolis, Tophia, and Eski Zagra, are devoted to the Bulgarians. The remainder, although labouring as occasion offers for all nationalities, are more directly connected with the Armenians, occupying seventeen of the principal cities of Asiatic Turkey. In addition to these foreign missionaries, this society supports wholly or in part two hundred and eighteen native assistants.

The funds contributed in England by the Turkish Missions Aid Society are devoted wholly to the support of native labourers.
The amount expended by the American Board in Turkey last year, exclusive of Syria, was a little more than twenty thousand pounds.
Somewhat more than two thousand pounds additional were contributed by the Turkish Missions Aid Society.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Church Missionary Society, about three years after the close of the Crimean war, sent to Constantinople the Rev. Dr. Pfander, well known as a veteran missionary in India, &c. After a full survey of the field and friendly conference with the American missionaries, he established himself in Constantinople, to labour for the conversion of the Mohammedans. He has since been joined by two other missionaries, sent out by the same society—Rev. Mr. Weakly and Rev. Dr. Kölle. These three missionaries, with their families and two assistants, now constitute the mission of the Church Missionary Society to the Mohammedans of Turkey. They are all located in Constantinople, this being the only place where open effort for the conversion of Mohammedans is tolerated.

OTHER MISSIONARY SOCIETIES.

Several societies have missionaries in Turkey labouring among the Jews—the Free Church and the Established Church of Scotland, the London Jews' Society, the Nova Scotia Society, and perhaps others. Constantinople, Smyrna, and Salonica, are the principal stations which they occupy, and there are several missionaries at each of these. In Constantinople there are six, and they have succeeded in establishing flourishing schools for the Jewish children.

The Gospel Propagation Society has one faithful missionary in Constantinople, whose time is chiefly devoted to British residents, but who superintends work for other nationalities, including especially that of three Christian Turks, two of whom have received ordination, and all of whom are supported by this society.

The American Methodist Episcopal Church has one missionary in Constantinople, one at Schumla, and one at Toulcha, labouring for the Bulgarians and Molakans, and intends to occupy Eastern Bulgaria fully.

The British and Foreign Bible Society and the American Bible Society have each an agent at Constantinople, to superintend the publishing and circulation of the Scriptures in all the languages of the empire. These societies also support the Rev. Dr. Schauffler, who is translating the Bible into Turkish.

The Prussians have a most flourishing and interesting school at Smyrna, under the charge of the Kaiserwerth Sisters, besides several hospitals under the same direction. Of these institutions, so far as they have come under our eye, too much that is good cannot be said. They are worthy of the highest praise, and deserve the sympathy and the prayers of all the followers of Christ.

It is very possible that there may be of Protestant organizations represented in Turkey; but if so, they are unknown to us. The chaplains connected with the Protestant embassies, however, deserve to be mentioned here, for their influence is generally favourable to the progress of the truth.

From this brief sketch of the operations of various Protestant organizations in Turkey it will be seen that the three great Protestant nations of the world—England, America, Germany—have joined hands to publish glad tidings of peace to the people of the empire. And the representatives of almost all the various bodies meet together from time to time as members of the Constantinople branch of the Evangelical Alliance, in utmost harmony of action prevailing among them.

We do not need to pause here to speak of the general results accomplished by these missions, for these are familiar to all our readers. We wish rather to make this a history of passing events, and we shall generally class these under the head of the various nationalities, rather than under the several societies in Turkey.

BULGARIANS.

It is well known to all those familiar with Turkey that a bitter feud has grown up between the Bulgarians and the hierarchy of the Greek Church. The Catholics have several times proclaimed to the world that this feud had resulted in the conversion of the Bulgarians to Rome, and some have been so sanguine to believe that the liberally-inclined leaders of the people might induce them to accept of Protestantism. But the truth is that the great body of the people are most warmly attached to the Greek Church. They hate the Hellenic element in that Church which seeks to destroy the nationality of the Bulgarians, through the influence of Greek priests. They desire an independent Bulgarian Church, in full sympathy with the dogmas of the Greek Church. The Greeks have sufficient influence here in Constantinople to prevent this, and they are now making a grand final effort to reconcile the Bulgarians to the present state of things. A great council is now sitting at the Constantinople Patriarchate in this city, consisting of the Patriarchs of Constantinople, Jerusalem, Alexandria, &c., together with the most influential laymen of the Church. Their object is to give a fair consideration to the claims of the Bulgarians, and so far as possible to grant them. There is very little probability, however, ver, of any permanent settlement being made. The views of the two parties are truly irreconcilable.

Meanwhile the missionary work in their half goes steadily on. Dr. Riggs and Mr. [unclear] are completing the revision of the New Testament, the Old having already been [unclear]. They are now in the Gospel of [unclear]. A religious newspaper has also been commenced by Mr. Long, called the Day Star, which is received by the Bulgarians with the most favour. The sale of other religious books and tracts among them is undiminished. [unclear] of 5,000 copies are always printed, [unclear] some books have already reached a third [unclear] fourth edition. The American Board [unclear] a high school or seminary for boys at [unclear]polis, and another for girls at Eski [unclear], both of which are in a promising [unclear], and everywhere the Bulgarians are [unclear] to converse freely on personal religion. [unclear] religion and politics are so inseparably [unclear] mixed in their minds, that it is very difficult to reach their consciences and hearts.

ARMENIANS.

The accounts received from almost all the prior mission-stations in the Armenian field [unclear] more favourable than they have been for [unclear] years. In some places, where cotton [unclear] used, the whole people have become almost [unclear] with excitement on this subject, and can [unclear] talk of nothing but cotton. This [unclear] of things is very favourable for the [unclear] of a largely-increased supply of [unclear], but it acts very unfavourably upon [unclear] spiritual interests of the people. [unclear] poverty and physical suffering, resulting from short crops, oppression, taxation, [unclear] has exerted an equally unfavourable [unclear] influence in some other parts of the field, but [unclear] spite of these obstacles, there seems to be [unclear] an increased interest in the truth of [unclear] Gospel.

From Kharpoot, for example, we learn [unclear] a new interest has been awakened in all [unclear] region in the Bible. In that city, and in [unclear] number of the surrounding villages, the [unclear] have voluntarily formed Bible societies [unclear] supply all with the Word of God; and on [unclear] Sabbath the disciples go out two by two, [unclear] each Christ in the most benighted of the [unclear]. As a result, in one village, where [unclear] missionaries had long laboured in vain, [unclear] an interest was excited, that of them- [unclear] they established a school, hired a [unclear], and furnished it with Protestant [unclear]. It has now some fifty scholars. The [unclear] was so great and so unexpected, that the missionaries actually found themselves without books to meet it. And the same thing has occurred at one or two other stations. At Kharpoot, having nothing but gilt Bibles left, the missionary went into markets and sold these to rich men there, that they might give or sell their old Bibles to the poor. In one such visit twelve of these expensive Bibles were sold, and so great an interest awakened, that two Bible societies were started.

THE PROTESTANT CIVIL COMMUNITY.

The greatest obstacle to the progress of Protestantism in Turkey now is the present state of the civil community. Stepan Effendi, the head of the community, who once performed the duties of his office very well, is now taking a course which brings every Protestant in Turkey into the most trying circumstances. He absolutely refuses either to resign or to perform the duties of his office. He cannot be removed except with the consent of the Government, and Aali Pasha, who is a fanatical Moslem, and a bitter hater of Protestants, evidently rejoices at this state of things, and supports him in his place. This leaves every Protestant at the mercy of whoever chooses to oppress him, for their only means of redress are through this man, who will neither do anything for them himself or suffer any one else to. Even in Constantinople, Protestants have been imprisoned and robbed, within a few weeks, without means of redress.

THE MOHAMMEDANS.

Two Turks have been baptized in Constantinople within ten days—one by Mr. Williams (Selim Agha), the converted Turk, and one by Rev. Dr. Pfander. The latter was, I believe, the first Turk ever baptized within the limits of Constantinople proper. His name is Ismail, and there is a general confidence in his real piety among those who know him. There is some excitement in Constantinople about this baptism, and it was generally reported and believed to-day in the city that the Sultan, having been informed of the fact, had ordered Dr. Pfander's rooms to be closed up. They have not been closed as yet, at least, and the story is probably untrue, but is an indication of the feeling which has been excited.

It cannot be denied that the present policy of the Government is to revive the old spirit of the Mohammedans, and this baptism in Stamboul itself naturally excites some feeling. This well-known policy of the present Sultan has rendered it much more difficult than before to gain access to the Turks—and the Turkish congregations are now very small—altogether probably seldom exceeding thirty persons. During the last Ramazan (or fast), however, a certain class were more than usually accessible—but they were generally of that class who do not conceal the fact that, while adhering to the outward forms of Mohammedanism as far as is necessary for their safety, they are, at heart, confirmed Pantheists. Most of the officials at the Porte are probably of this class. Many of them are quite familiar with the writings of the French and German Rationalists, especially just now with Renan's "Life of Jesus."

SIR HENRY BULWER ON TURKISH REFORMS.

At a dinner given to him by the English residents, Sir H. Bulwer delivered, last week, a long speech on what he had himself accomplished in reforming the Turkish Government. The reforms which he claimed to have originated involve everything good which has been done under the present Sultan. An enumeration of these, taken from his speech, may serve to give a definite idea of what has actually been accomplished.

The revenue has been increased by a change in the commercial treaties, reducing export duties and increasing import duties. Also by new taxes. The accounts of the Government were systematised, and an annual publication of a budget made possible. The floating debt was funded. The army and navy were both renovated, while the expenditures of these departments were reduced. The paper money was withdrawn by means of a loan in England. He adds, in conclusion, what is very true, that "the real amelioration of Turkey can never be relied on until a totally new system of administration is instituted throughout her provinces." He might have added that this is not only the most important, but the most hopeless thing in Turkey.

These reforms in Constantinople, although very important as far as they go, are only on the surface. In the interior, oppression, injustice, corruption, and every form of misadministration, is not the exception, but the general rule. Whoever would reform these things must create in Turkey a new race of men to rule, and some other code of law than the Koran and Turkish precedents. He must reform not only the Turks, but also the Christian ecclesiastics and chief men, from whom the people often suffer even more than they do from the Turks.

ALGERIA.

SUCCESSFUL LABOURS OF A SPANISH EXILE.

One of the most remarkable efforts now carried on in Algeria is that among the Spaniards who live or travel in the country. A Spanish pastor reached Algiers in May, 1863. The Protestant Consistory granted him the use of its church at once, and on June 4th he preached to his countrymen for the first time. The hearers were few, but attentive and orderly. The pastor, besides preaching, received and made a good number of visits; he read the Bible, and distributed tracts, especially to the captains of vessels with whom he met. Appeals were soon addressed to him from neighbouring localities, where they had heard of his services, and wished to know and participate in them. New services were thus originated, and in eight months three Evangelical congregations of Spaniards were founded in Algeria.

Not less interesting than this work is he who conducts it. As he has often told his story, we may repeat the substance of it. M. F. Ruett was born at Barcelona, of a Catholic family, and was destined for the bar. At the age of 22 he went to Italy to finish his studies, and settled at Turin. He soon learned Italian, and, being a man of talent, he shortly became distinguished as an advocate. But one day, as he passed through a street in Turin, he was surprised to see a number of persons enter a house. Curiosity prompted him to go in, and he found a large room, which a serious assembly soon filled. Some inscriptions on the walls attracted his attention: "There is one God, and Jesus Christ, the Mediator between God and men, the Son of God," "The just shall live by faith," and so forth. A man entered a desk (it was Pastor Meille), offered a prayer, and delivered a discourse on subjects new to him. He was in the meeting in a pensive mood; but went a second time, and a third time; more and more urged by the wants of his soul, he purchased a New Testament, read it with eagerness, and at last besought the pastor to receive him into his Church. To be brief: after some months he became an evangelist in the service of the Protestant community at Turin.

Nothing indicated that he should quit his post, but the Lord had designed him for a more difficult field. A dream determined him to leave Italy. Twice he thought him-over snowy mountains, and borne by visible force to an agitated crowd, which is mother tongue. There, priests him, and threatened him with violence, braving their anger, he preached well. This reiterated dream seemed to indicate the will of God. He left and went to Barcelona, where, Bible in hand, he preached the good news of salvation. The authorities interfered; he was arrested, cited before the Tribunal, and led to keep silence. No sooner released than he began afresh. Again arrested, and with no better result. On the balcony of his house the bold preacher of the Gospel preached Christ to trymen. This could not be endured. Bound with cords like a bandit, and once again dragged before the judges, he was this time banished from the kingdom—as a heretic. Exiled from Spain, he settled at Gibraltar. There were Spaniards there, and through them the truth might, perhaps, get access to the kingdom which excluded it. He was not deceived. One of his regular hearers was Manuel Matamoros, and it was from the preaching of the exile that Matamoros received the first germs of the faith for which he too was to be exiled. In 1863, M. Ruett had to leave Gibraltar for reasons unknown to us, and went to Algiers to commence the work of which we have spoken. There are, in all, from 150 to 160 hearers in the three places where he has established regular services. Many leave, it is true, but they carry with them good seed which, we doubt not, will some day germinate in Spain.

AMERICA.

New York, May 7, 1864.

MAY MEETINGS IN NEW YORK.

May anniversaries are at hand. They have already begun, for a few early sermons have been preached in the denominational societies. But "anniversaries," which have been accustomed to gather multitudes of all denominations, will take place next week. A week after they are over would be you in time for the June issue. I therefore, reserve an account of them till next month. Anniversaries in New York, however, are not what they were. Not that good sermons have been lost interest in the causes his yearly festival is designed to stir, on the contrary, that interest has deepened and spreads continually. It is by the festival itself that loses some of its éclat. This loss is due, in some measure, to the fact that the advocates of every reform, however questionable in its merits or morality, have come to assert their right to a hearing and an anniversary in every week, so that the Bible cause, women's rights, or "free love" even, are discussed on the same morning, in a stone's throw from each other. It is very enough, indeed, to discriminate things so different; and the religious anniversaries would probably have retained their interest and influence, if an honorable incident had not helped in the way to confound them with these adventurous bids for popular attention. The destruction of the old Broadway Tabernacle, which eight or ten years ago was replaced by large warehouses, drove out our religious societies from their well-known and most commodious centre, to find such inadequate and various accommodation as churches and halls can furnish them. From that day the "anniversaries" in New York lost more than half of their interest; and the pious among us now talk of those bygone assemblages in the Tabernacle, as the Jews at Babylon must have spoken of the passovers which they had held at Jerusalem. Those were great days, when your own Dr. Duff, for example, stood in the midst of that sea of faces, and shaded or brightened them, as the sun does the waters. The building was in the form of Surrey Chapel, though it was very much larger. Behind the central desk of the speaker ascended a steep inclined plane of seats, extensive enough to accommodate 400 or 500 persons. These seats were occupied by clergymen, whose uniform dark dress and serious or venerable aspect made a most striking background to the animated form of the speaker. Pious eloquence never had a fairer field than in the midst of the earnest multitude, which, year by year, crowded that house from the first day of the anniversary week to the last. But the multitude does not assemble now. Pilgrims need to think of a place where their sacred journey is to end. The Tabernacle was well named, for "thither the tribes went up." The best substitute we have for it is a flat-floored concert-room, called Irving Hall, where the societies at length have come together as sailors meet on a beach after they have been scattered by shipwreck. The room is often crowded, and neither themes nor speakers have grown dull. But the former enthusiasm is gone. The anniversaries are no longer a religious power among it.

DENOMINATIONAL TENDENCIES.

It is not to be doubted, moreover, that all our great societies have felt the influence of a growing disposition to denominational action. Church boards, as they are called, are made to do much of the work which used to be done by the voluntary societies. Publication boards, missionary boards, Sunday-school boards, and even separate societies for printing and circulating the Sacred Scriptures, have been established within some of the leading denominations. The result has been, not that the income or the work of the central societies has suffered actual diminution, but the advance of both has been materially retarded. It is manifest, however, that the aggregate both of income and results has been greatly increased. Men give and work more freely when all their denominational convictions and preferences can be gratified; and co-operation even in religious action may require compromise. It is a most important question, and one which is rapidly approaching solution among us, what sorts of work are best done by denominational effort, and what sorts are best done in concert? Is the Church—that is, the specific body organised under its denominational name and constitution—appointed by Christ to originate and complete every form of Christian action by itself; or is the Church in its largest sense the one body of Christ, appointed to act in many things with visible unity, as well for the demonstration of that unity as for the increase of power? It is a striking and hopeful sign of the immense and undeveloped resources of our common Christianity that, after so many centuries of the Church's existence, and in this day of her renewed and increasing activity and success, this question of methods is only coming to a settlement. The providence of God is showing earnest men how to work. Theories are testing in practice; and in religious engagements, as in all others, use is giving skill and facility. The happy medium will be hit at last, and our Churches will all learn what is family work, and what is social work. And when that secret shall be discovered, the impediments in the way Christian union will all be removed.

YEARNINGS FOR CHRISTIAN UNION.

It is very manifest that there is among us a growing yearning for such union. The signs of its approach appear less promising to some than they do to others; but they are well worth noticing. A course of sermons upon this subject has been sustained in this city for several months. Many of our ablest divines have taken part in the discussion; and if their views of methods have not quite coincided, their interest in the proposed end has been clearly proclaimed. Since nearly every preacher has delivered his discourse in the pulpit of a denomination different from his own, the sermons have in some degree illustrated the charity they have undertaken to commend. A discussion of Christian union in the new Tabernacle (Congregational) Church, by a minister of Trinity (Episcopal) Church, you may be sure was a novelty even to progressive Americans. The preacher, indeed, did not carry all his hearers in his definition of the basis of such union. But it was something for such a discussion to be had.

A more remarkable spectacle by far was witnessed on Good Friday of this year, in the large Presbyterian church of Dr. Adams, on Madison-square. The preacher was the Rev. Dr. Muhlenbergh, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, whose wise and devoted Christian philanthropy has endeared him to all this community; but whose beautiful hymn, "I could not live away," has perhaps given him his widest reputation. The house was crowded to excess; and great numbers could not gain admittance. The devotional services were all performed by Presbyterian clergymen; no prayer of the "Liturgy" being used. Neither from prayers nor sermon could any stranger have inferred that any other than a Presbyterian minister took part in the service. The fraternal feeling which the day developed was very beautiful to witness. And even those who could find in the act of the venerable preacher no bearing upon any ecclesiastical question were charmed and edified by that manifest union of Christian hearts around the Cross and tomb of their common Redeemer.

There are some other much more important signs of practical union of which I have not now room to write. Moreover, the passage of a month or two will either develop or destroy them, and make them matter of history instead of conjecture.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

When the patriot Jews, returning from a long captivity, engaged in the work of restoring the fortifications of their capital, so moved by the threatenings of their enemies, that they were compelled, while with one hand they builded the wall, with the other to hold the spear, it does not at all follow that their work would make the slower progress for their distractions. Their apprehensions did quicken more than their disadvantages did impede. We are reminded of them by the condition and aspect of our Churches at the present time, and by the renewed activity which is everywhere manifest in missionary work at the very moment when the defenders of the faith are called to do battle for the elemental truths of the Gospel they seek to propagate. The attacks made upon belief have only incited to greater activity in practice. Speculative doubts have reacted on missionary effort. Our builders, like those of old, have been called to the double work of pulling and extending; and though we must say that in our case there has been much of alarm or apprehension, yet there has been as much holy indignation, and the one action has been as stimulative as the other. The attacks on the inspiration of the Bible have received a noble answer in the extraordinary increase of effort to extend its circulation. The insinuated doubts respecting its doctrines as the atonement, justification, &c., as underlying them all, God's everlasting war against sin, have acted upon the minds of Christian men powerfully indeed, but powerfully in the direction of making those doctrines more widely known, more deeply felt.

These causes have been operating all through the year in the quiet but steady extension of the funds of the various societies; and they culminated in overflowing attendance at the annual meetings. It was known beforehand that there would be no exciting novelty to attract their attention. No new discovery had been made, no tribe had been won off its superstitions, no nation "had been born in a day." There was the old story to be told of work and faith, and of hope; and the people showed, by their flocking to the meetings and by their eager attention to the addresses, that it was the story they alone cared to hear. There was, we think, discernible throughout the meetings a strong conviction that we are on the eve of great events—that the world is big with the advent of a new era. There was never, probably, a year in which so many allusions to political events were made by the speakers, none in which they were more eagerly caught up and vociferously welcomed by the audience. It was not in one meeting that these allusions occurred, but in all. Even that most decorous of all bodies—and necessarily so, as composed of all different denominations—the Religious Tract Society, burst out into enthusiastic applause at the mention of Garibaldi; and the name of the Italian hero was welcomed with equal earnestness elsewhere. It is, of course, easy to say that this only argues a derogation from the high tone of missionary feeling to the lower level of secular politics. We believe, on the contrary, it arises from the instinctive sense that God, in His providence, is at this moment lifting secular politics into the higher level of Christian effort, and that the convulsions and changes among nations are but the smoothing of the highway for the progress and spread of that kingdom which is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

The increase in the funds of the religious societies is, this year, general. Last year, it may be remembered, the principal sufferers from diminution were the Home Missions. This year we are glad to see that they have recovered their lost ground. Nor has there been any slackening of personal effort. Both among Churchmen and Dissenters, the obligation to do personal service for Christ is felt with increasing force.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

The great topic at the annual meeting of the Bible Society, at which the Earl of Shaftesbury, the president, occupied his accustomed seat as chairman, was, of course, the Bible itself, especially in connexion with the controversies of the present day that go to the root of its inspiration and authority. It was a striking and gratifying fact to find that all the late discussions and all the bold attempts to unsettle the faith of the people in this record of God's revealed will had only issued in making the people cling to it more closely and circulate it more extensively, in deepening the interest taken in the society's work, and in greatly adding to the society's funds. The report spoke of extended work. The obstructions that had been put in the way of the society's colporteurs in France, last year, were now removed, and legal authorisation was given wherever it was applied for. In the war unhappily raging between Germany and Denmark the society had, with most commendable impartiality, voted Bibles and employed agents to distribute them among the soldiers of both parties. Spain was referred to, but with great reticence, which the audience appeared to appreciate. In Italy there was an increase in the issues of the past year of 1,200, the total number being 28,000. A second edition of Diodati's New Testament had been issued from the press at Florence, and during the last year upwards of 4,000 had been expended, chiefly by the working classes, in its eager purchase. In the other parts of the world the work was referred to in a similar manner, and the extent of the society's operations may be inferred from the fact that prayer was desired on behalf of the Rev. Mr. Stern, who, while labouring for the society, had fallen under the persecution of the King of Abyssinia. The receipts from all sources amounted to 1,221*l.* more than in any former year, being the largest revenue the society has ever received.* The issues of the society for the year were, from the dépôt at home, 1,849,767; from dépôts abroad, 645,351—total, 2,495,118 copies. The total issues of the society now amount to 45,539,452 copies. An interesting feature in the day's proceedings was, that the ambassadors from Madagascar were upon the platform—a circumstance which was happily referred to by the noble chairman in the few weighty sentences with which he opened the proceedings.

The first speaker was the venerable Bishop of Winchester, who, as an old friend and member of the society, could encourage his younger brethren on the subject of the present controversies, and tell them that even in his own experience the Bible had come out of as great ordeals as it was now passing through unharmed:—

Error, like some of those disorders which affect the human body, seems to come from time to time with a kind of periodical recurrence. True it is that the errors of the present day are the errors of the past time. There is nothing new under the sun, and indeed there is nothing new in scepticism and free-thinking. The Voltaires of another country, or the Paines of our own, or the daring spirits of yet more modern days, over whom we lament, and of whom we are ashamed—

(cheers)—but of whom we are not afraid—(doubled cheers)—they have unquestionably said nothing in our own day which has never been said in times past. And the Bible Society, like the Bible itself, suffers from attacks received from time to time. Sometimes it is the constitution of the society that is impugned; sometimes it is the catholicity of its organization; sometimes it is the apocryphal question which is brought under discussion; sometimes the Trinitarian controversy divides our friends. But in all this there is nothing which need affright us. The Bible still holds its place; it holds its place in our hands, and, what is far more, it holds its place in our hearts; and if this be so, every friend of the society will rejoice to learn that at home as well as abroad, the circulation of the Word of Truth has been increased, and that now, here at home as abroad, that which began in small things, the smallest of all seeds, has become a great tree, with leaves for the healing of the nations.

Lord Charles Russell then briefly addressed the meeting. The Rev. William Arthur was the next speaker. He took up two topics—Italy and India. With regard to the first, he made an effective contrast between the circulation of the Word of God now and the profane work that was sold by that name under the Bourbon dynasty. He said:—

It is only a very few years ago, when in the streets of Naples, looking over an old bookstall, I saw a pamphlet entitled "Biblia Sacra." I said to the man, "What is that?" He said, "It is the Holy Bible." I took it up and turned to the title page, and seeing upon it, in Italian, "The Holy Bible for Children," I opened it, and found printed on such paper as our confectioners might use to sell confectionery in, with such pictures as they might put on their bags which they put the biscuits in—hardly so good. I said, "What do you call this book? You do not call it a Bible." "Certainly it is; certainly it is the Bible." Well I bought it for sixpence, and there it is, my Lord. The only advantage that this Bible has over the circulated by your society is, that it settles the points in controversy that are left undetermined by the other Bible. It settles the point that St. Paul did go to Rome; for the very last question is that both the Apostles Peter and Paul were put to death for the faith in Rome. St. Peter was crucified with his head downwards, and St. Paul was beheaded; and it settles another very important point not touched upon in our Bible—the day of the month on which it took place, the 29th June! I think the change represented between the sale of this pamphlet in Naples for the Word of God, and the fact that the whole Bible is now circulated throughout all Italy, except in the little part of it where the Pope holds some dominion, is one of the most wonderful things in modern history, and one for which we ought certainly to raise our praises to the God of the Bible.

Mr. Arthur then adverted to India, and with much eloquence and force a proposal made several years ago, that an agency should be established in India, whose mission should to go into every town or village, and there visit from house to house, and wherever they found a man able to read, to leave with him a copy of the Word of God.

The Rev. Canon Stowell, like the other speakers, dwelt on the present controversies, and gave his theory of inspiration. "Pardon me," said he—

If I venture to give a somewhat more accurate definition of inspiration than is usually pronounced, and which seems to give a certain handle and occasion to those who stand opposed to us. I conceive that whatever in the Bible is direct revelation discloses to us the thoughts of God, and these must be given to us in the words of God. We only know what God thinks by what God says; and His words must, therefore, be His thoughts, for we can only reach and understand them through the medium of language. But when we come to the historical and narrative portions of Scripture, to say that every word was given by the direct inspiration of God is not tenable, because portions of the Old Testament Scriptures were introduced into the canon, with certain allusions to uninspired books and appeals to uninspired existing chronicles. These could not have been inspired in the strict sense of the word; but the records were put there at the suggestion of the Spirit of God, and then they were throughout infallible. Thus, without holding that every word in the Old Testament was directly and immediately suggested by the Spirit of God, we hold nothing was introduced into it without the Spirit's will, and nothing excluded from it but by the Spirit's authority.

The Rev. Mr. Spurgeon handled the controversies of the day in his own racy style. The other speakers were the Bishop of Epton, the Rev. Dr. Edmond, the Rev. C. D. Marston, and a venerable member of the Society of Friends, Mr. Josiah Foster, who said he had belonged to the society for sixty years, and rose up to bear his testimony in favour of the Divine nature of the Book that had decreed him through his long pilgrimage.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

At the sixty-fifth anniversary of the Church Missionary Society, the president, the Earl of Chester, occupied his usual position as chairman. The report, read by the Rev. J. Venn, showed that though the income had exceeded that of the preceding year by upwards of 3,000*l.*, it was insufficient to meet the largely-increased outlay. The home expenditure has been reduced; but the increased prices of the necessaries of life in India, and the extension of the work in several of the missions, in consequence of the success of the work, have caused this increase of expenditure, which is now 10,000*l.* a-year beyond the ordinary income. The Islington Missionary Institute has had an average of forty-five students; the Europeans thus preparing for the work are fewer, the natives more numerous, than last year. The success of the Sierra Leone Mission was reported as being complete. The voluntary contributions of the people have supplied the stipends of nine native clergymen at a higher rate than the society had paid. In connexion with the Yoruba Mission, it was reported that the native Christian Church had been enlarged and strengthened. Several native teachers have been sent into the interior, who are supported solely by native contributions. The Niger Mission was next referred to. On the West Coast of Africa, through the labours of sixteen missionary societies, native Churches are gradually rising up, at various points along a coast line of 2,000 miles, numbering at least 80,000 converts. One-fourth of these are the fruits of Episcopal missions, in connexion with which also twenty-five native ministers have been ordained. It is considered, therefore, that the time has arrived when a bishop should be provided for these native Churches. The report also reviewed the society's operations in the Mediterranean, India, Ceylon, China, North-West America, and New Zealand. The following statistics show the present state of the missions:—

Stations.....	140
Clergymen—English	157
" Foreigners	41
" Natives and East Indians	71
European lay agents	269
European female teachers (exclusive of missionaries' wives).....	22
Native catechists	10
Communicants	1,983

These returns do not include the statistics of stations from which the society has withdrawn, and among them those of the Church in Sierra Leone, which contains 10 native clergy, 4,356 communicants, and 12,866 scholars.

The noble chairman, in the course of his opening speech, referred to the approaching elevation of the native African minister, the Rev. S. Crowther, to the episcopate. This and similar allusions by the Archbishop of York, who moved the first resolution, Lord Shaftesbury, who seconded it, and other speakers, were loudly cheered. The northern Primate, indeed, gave utterance to the suggestion, "Let them do that [make a coloured man a bishop] in America," which also elicited loud and prolonged applause. His Grace was very decided in his enunciation of scriptural truth, notwithstanding, as he remarked, opposing errors had "recently received some shadow of colour from authority." And he was justly severe upon those journalists who, an account of the comparatively scanty number of conversions from heathenism, pronounce the missionary enterprise a failure. "I am comforted," said the Archbishop, "by this reflection, that that kind of newspaper article would have been written much more appropriately in a certain place in Judea on the day of the crucifixion. There would have been a practical logic in saying, Christianity is now dead, because the Founder of it is nailed on the cross, and all its followers have run away. But Christianity lives," notwithstanding all the "slashing logic" of those who so anxiously seek to prove that nothing has been done. The Rev. John Barton (missionary from Northern India), who spoke in support of the first resolution, stated, among other facts, that three members of the Society of Friends having visited Calcutta, and held meetings for worship, the educated Bengalees of the city were remarkably interested on the subject. They might, as they learnt, become Christians without being baptized. That was the very thing they wanted, and one or two of them became members of the Society of Friends. Mr. Barton pleaded for more men for mission-work in India, and his appeal came with the greater weight as being made by one who had served as a labourer in the mission-field without cost to the society. The Rev. J. C. Ryle, who spoke next, urged, with his characteristic earnestness, fidelity to the "distinctive Evangelical principles of the Church of England," in the conduct of the society's affairs. The Rev. J. Smith, Prebendary of Derry, informed the meeting that the Irish branch of the society had just been celebrating its jubilee, at the meeting in connexion with which the Archbishop of Dublin had presided, and recalled some interesting facts connected with its early history.

The real interest of the day, however, centred in the Rev. Samuel Crowther, the Bishop-Designate of Niger. Had this been the first occasion on which an English audience had listened to him, they might have justly drawn the most favourable conclusion as to his piety, modesty, and thorough good sense. It is scarcely necessary to say that the reverend gentleman experienced a most cordial reception from the vast audience. He began by saying that he had been surprised to hear the objections of certain newspapers that the accounts produced by the missionary societies were unreadable or unread. As some persons wanted to see results, as a result he presented himself before them. He then sketched the history of missionary effort on the West Coast of Africa, as conducted by the society from its commencement to the present time, spoke of the success which had been achieved, and adverted to the future. Towards the close of his speech, he made some touching references to his personal experience in procuring some of his assertions. He observed :—

This society has been labouring only in a colony of Sierra Leone among a population of 80,000; but now in the Yoruba mission there is population of three millions open for the Christian ministry. On the banks of the Niger, among a people speaking six different languages, and to whom we have access, there are upwards of six millions ready made to our hand into whose languages the Holy Scriptures are now in course of being translated for circulation amongst them. I came to this country, Christian friends, not as a missionary to Paul, but as a real applicant to Christian England to come over to Africa and help us. You have many a time heard people say who did not desire our welfare that Africans sell their own children. No, Christian friends, Africans do not sell their own children; and if there are any present who can come forward and assert that Africans bring up their children for sale, I am ready to confront him here and challenge him to the proof. I was a slave boy myself; but my mother did not sell me, and my father perished in the attempt to save me. (Loud applause.) And when once a relative of mine was about to be cut asunder by slave-hunting marauders, my mother fell on her knees before them, and besought his captors rather to let the poor boy go and be a slave for life, than cut him in pieces and spill his blood on the ground. When I returned again, after twenty-five years' absence, to Abbeokuta, and met my mother and other relatives in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Townsend, they stood gazing in astonishment at my mother's exhibition of yearning love for her son, and can bear testimony that it could not have been she who sold me.

Mr. Crowther also denied that the introduction of cotton cultivation into Abbeokuta had occasioned an increase in the slave-trade—precisely the reverse being the fact. He strongly recommended the employment of English capital in this direction.

The Rev. Canon Stowell spoke next, and mentioned as a fact, on the authority of the Rev. Mr. French—"the Henry Martyn of the Church of England at this moment"—who has been compelled to return from the Punjab, on account of ill-health, that there are thousands of the fine, manly, noble men of the Affghans and Sikhs that are receiving with open mind and heart the Word of Truth. The Rev. C. D. Marston also addressed the meeting.

The firm tone in which the obligation was recognised and enforced of all connected with this institution to maintain a steadfast adherence to scriptural truth, whatever defections may occur elsewhere, was a marked feature, from first to last, in the proceedings.

which Government is now doing by means of its universities, its schools, and its liberal grants in aid to missionary and other societies for the regeneration of the people. The Government teaching is secular. It does not profess to overthrow Buddhism, Mohammedanism, or Hindooism; but although it does not profess to do that, it is doing it nevertheless. (Loud applause.) The scientific teaching of the Government cuts right through these systems, in order to bring its pupils to the other side, and raise them to the intellectual status to which it proposes to carry them.

Thus much for the present. As to the future, he said:—

The religions of India are doomed to extinction as inexorably as night before the dawn of day; and Government teaching, I rejoice to think, is the star that ushers in the dawn. And we older missionaries who have looked and longed for the greater and hallowing light, who have watched through the starless night of India for the first faint rays of morning, are grateful for the signs which indicate that we are nearly at the end of a watch, which some of us had almost thought would never come to an end; and although the sad habit of looking out only to be disappointed makes us sometimes doubt whether the glimmer is only the effect of phosphoric exhalation, yet if we look again we perceive a steady light in the horizon, which assures us that her light has come, and that the glory of the Lord has risen upon India.

He thus described the agency by which the evangelization of our Eastern empire is to be secured:—

Let me say, however, in regard to this work, that, like Lord Clive, we intend to conquer India by means of Indian levies. European missionaries, unaided and alone, will never be able to convert India. So we draw our young men around us. We wean them from the gross vanities of their religion, and by the teaching of God's Spirit they are enabled to cast from themselves those fictions in which they had trusted as heavenly revelations. We take them into our counsels. They know the Gospel as well as we do. They can preach it as efficiently, they can proclaim it before an assembly as eloquently, and teach it in a class as impressively as ourselves; aye, and sometimes more impressively, because the truth coming from one Hindoo has great power over another Hindoo. The sophisms which they sometimes bring out in their conversations to puzzle or distract the foreigner can never appear in the presence of a Brahmin who has been converted. Besides that, the arguments of race and of caste which they bring before us so frequently fall to the ground in the presence of a man who has been one of themselves. And when I have been preaching the Gospel in the highways of India with a converted Brahmin by my side, or a Hindoo of high caste, the people have disturbed us by noisy opposition; but he, casting his eye on the tumultuous throng, has hushed them in a moment, and has said, "Why, you know that Hindooism is all a lie, and you dare not contradict me." These are the men whom God is giving us. These are the men with whom we go forth. They are witnesses of the power of Divine truth, and in some respects such witnesses as I have never seen in any other part of the world.

which (to adopt the metaphor of the eloquent speaker), by the Useful Knowledge Education Railway, Young India is being carried forever from the domain of Hindoo superstition.

We take a little fellow into the school, say about seven years of age, when his mind may be supposed to be pliable, vacant, and impressionable. We take him up at the A B C station, and we steam on with him in a direct line to syllables, words, and truths. From the present terminus of history he looks back, not through the mazes of an Oriental romance, but over a distinct and lucid chronology. From the present terminus of science he looks back, and is not distracted or intimidated by the hypotheses of an exploded philosophy with which Superstition arms herself to make the heavens above, the earth beneath, and the waters under the earth, speak a language which God never intended them to speak. Our Eastern youth looks back over a road of iron demonstration; as when the priest threatens to bring fire upon his head, or withhold rain from his village, his chemical data come to his aid. And when he hears the old men talk gravely of this flat earth and of the oceans of milk or liquid butter, he laughs at the belief of his friends; he shows them the reasoning, too, by which astrology is proved to be false, and magic to be wicked craft. He smiles at the dotage of old wrinkled Hindooism, shrinks back even from the presence of a youth into his cave of darkness and shame, like a witch whose reign of spell and enchantment is over; a wit before whom the fathers of that youth bow down in times past. And from the midway terminus of religion our youth looks backward as forward. He looks backward, and sees that the road by which he has come to the knowledge that there is one God and one Mediator between God and man is as straitly consistent with the principles of evidence which satisfy the human mind and as clearly laid down as any line of geometrical or historical analysis. And, Sir, we travel over this grandest of all roads together the wheels of our demonstrations go crashing over the images of Bramah, Siva, Vishnu, and Kali and the inspiration that drives us along scatters to the winds the myths and the legends, impostures and the holy abominations of Brahminical lore. The young man now looks forward, and we tell him that the path of his mind is none the less bright and certain because our reason and imagination fail us; that the "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," and that eternal blessedness with God is as much the inevitable result of believing in God the Saviour as a sequence in geometry or natural science. This is the way in which we separate these young men from the faith and fiction of their fathers. I do not say that we make them all Christians; but they can never return to the A B C station at which they had set out with us.

The other speech referred to above, deserving of special mention, was by the Rev. H. J. Pigott, of Milan. The Wesleyan Methodist mission in Italy, it appears, has been carried out exactly upon the model as in the very spirit which the Rev. William Arthur described and recommended before was commenced. "I have been asked," he

Mr. Pigott, "is Methodism growing up in Italy?" He replied, "It may be, but we don't call it Methodism. . . . We don't want to talk about Methodism, but about Christ. When wants arise, we try to meet them as led, by His Holy Spirit, may suggest to us." The aim in this mission is to employ native gary. Two years ago, the Wesleyans had merely an agent in Italy. Now they have only forty agents, eleven of whom are evangelists (the others being colporteurs and school-teachers), labouring in that country; and they are occupying three of the chief cities of Italy. Mr. Pigott, while appealing to his own society for more help, invites the cooperation of all Evangelical bodies. He said:—

We want all the missionary societies to take up the Italian cause. There is work for all to do. What is needed for all. No single society can do the work in the country; and at this moment, when God has so wonderfully thrown the wide open to Evangelical effort, we want all influences that the Christianity of this country is bringing to bear to be thrown into this open field. Let the Baptists come; let the Church of England send over its agents; let the Congregationalists come; only whoever come, we hope they will preach Christ Jesus, and Him crucified; and they will not vex the troubled minds of the people with those petty differences which separate them from denomination in this land, and which the Italians know just nothing. We hope that these differences will not be brought to prominence, at least, until we can see what the sentiment the Italian mind chooses. All then we ought to be content with preaching the grand and saving doctrines of our holy faith.

The meeting was also addressed by Mr. Ireland, of Cornwall; Mr. Howard, Mayor of Bedford (who stated that after the presentation to Garibaldi in that town of a copy of May's "Pilgrim's Progress," the General had promised him to read it); Mr. William Smith, of Gledhow; the Rev. Thomas Jackson (these two last the only founders of the society present); the Rev. William West, of Africa (who gratified the meeting by showing it that no such distinctions prevail here as exist here, the very last Sunday he was in Abbeokuta he having preached in the Baptist Episcopal church in the place; and shortly after he left, Mr. Townsend, the head of the Church mission there, having occupied the mission platform in the Wesleyan Chapel); the Rev. Dr. Crook, of Dublin; the Rev. W. Butters, representative of the Australian Conference; and other gentlemen. As is customary, had a gathering in which its interests exclusively were the topic of discussion. A breakfast meeting took place at the London Tavern, at which a "Minutes' Report" was read by the Rev. William Arthur. The principal speaker was the Rev. G. Piercy, the earliest Wesleyan missionary to the Chinese empire, who went out, some dozen years ago, alone, and who has returned as "Chairman of the China District," where there are now seven actual missionaries, and applications for eleven more.

Both meetings were largely attended. "The Jubilee trumpet, blown throughout all our tribes," says the journalist already quoted, "had brought up a larger number of the people to this year's festival than can ordinarily be found at our May meetings."

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

This society had for its chairman Lord Ebury. There was nothing of an exciting nature in the proceedings; even the London Missionary Society cannot have the return of a Moffatt or a Livingstone every year; but, notwithstanding, the crowds that attended the general meeting at Exeter Hall and the supplementary meetings held afterwards, testified to the unabated interest which the supporters of the London Society take in its varied operations. The noble chairman, who has distinguished himself by his efforts in the cause of liturgical revision in his own Church, made the following happy allusion to the constitution of the society:—

He felt that in coming to this meeting he breathed the purest religious atmosphere, and that the jar and discord of controversy was left outside. No denominational differences entered there; for the only question asked, even of men seeking to be sent out by the society as its agents, was this, "Do you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and confess Him with your mouth, as the Son of God who died to save mankind?" He had been for many years engaged in discussing what were called "terms of subscription," and must profess before that large assembly that, if he could have his own way, these would be the only terms of subscription that should exist.

The report was read by the Rev. Dr. Tidman. The detail of operations embraced a wide area of the world's surface, but detailed no events of exciting interest—nothing but hard, steady, persevering work, in Polynesia, the West Indies, South Africa, China, India, and Madagascar. Reference was made to the atrocious attempt to convert the Polynesian Islands into a slave-hunting ground, in the course of which several members of Churches had been carried off into slavery; but the directors were glad to say it was promptly stopped. The arrival in this country of envoys from Madagascar was hailed as an omen for good, and it was added that the work of Christian instruction was spreading over that interesting land. It was announced that the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, M.P., had been elected treasurer, in room of the late Sir Culling Eardley.

The first resolution was moved by the Rev. T. Jones, in a speech which was all glitter and sparkle, and seconded by the new Treasurer, who, in a very sensible, earnest manner, urged upon the meeting the claims of India, stating that nothing solid could be effected there till the number of the native converts was greatly increased. The Rev. George Hall, missionary from Madras, followed him, and came forward to tell what increase of native converts had been made, especially in the southern parts of India. He said :—

Missionaries were doing a great educational work in India. There were no fewer than 96,000 young people receiving Christian instruction daily; and whenever schools were opened in the rural districts, there was no difficulty in getting them filled. Owing to the degradation of women in India, it was considered wrong to teach them to read, and consequently the females of high caste had remained almost wholly ignorant of the Gospel. They also exerted a great influence over their sons, and kept them from becoming Christians. Many of the natives were now, however, anxious to have their daughters taught. Two years ago he commenced a school in Madras, with four or five high caste girls, and at the end of last year there were seventy receiving instruction who were now able to read the Gospel in their own language. In the Madras presidency there were, in connexion with all the missionary societies, 110,000 professing Christians, 20,218 of whom were communicants or members of the Church of Christ. In the South Indian missions of their own society there were 25,849 professing Christians, of whom 1,808 were Church members. There was not a caste that had not its representatives in the native Christian Churches. There were 541 European and American missionaries in India, but what were they among 200 millions of idolaters? It did but give one missionary for every 3,000 square miles of the country and every 400,000 of inhabitants, being much the same as if there were but six preachers of the Gospel in all London.

The Rev. W. Lea, missionary from Amoy, rebutted the notions so industriously circulated in certain quarters, that our missions in China had proved a failure. The results of former labours, he said, were now beginning to appear :—

Fifty years ago, Dr. Morrison was honoured of God to clear away obstructions, and to dig broad and deep foundations on which the fine structure is built that now gladdens Christian eyes in that far distant land. Other zealous missionaries were labouring in the Indian Archipelago amidst great discouragements; so much so, those fields had to be deserted; but now the fruit of their labours had begun to appear. About five years ago a native Chinese missionary was sent to Singapore, whence the European missionaries had long departed; and now there is a church raised there with a hundred members. Moreover, there has gone forth from that church a native Chinese to Batavia, the scene of Dr. Medhurst's early labours.

The reverend gentleman then went on to tell of the state of missions at Amoy, where 850 communicants were in fellowship with the Church, and where a valuable native agency had been raised up and trained for work. Of about seventeen outlying stations, embracing a district of nearly fifty miles round Amoy, more than half had been formed, and were sustained by native preachers.

The Rev. J. B. Owen, incumbent of St. Jude's, Chelsea, adverting to the case of India, said it had often struck him that there was a parallel between India and Ireland. In both there was a twofold authority, which was always an inconvenience, and always led to divided allegiance, and divided allegiance led to dissatisfaction, and that to a chronic phase of rebellion, which in India, and sometimes also in Ireland, led to a crisis very dangerous to the public interests. Other points of importance were the persecution of converts in both countries, the Government staple of education, and the Government patronage of idolatry. If they had time to work out those four thoughts, they would see that precisely the same thing which produced the slow progress of Protestantism in Ireland, over which all Christians must mourn, also caused the comparative slow progress of Christianity in India.

The other speakers were the Rev. J. Makepeace, of Bradford; Rev. E. Mellor, of Liverpool; Rev. S. Thomson, of Manchester; Sir Frank Crossley, M.P.; and Mr. Henry Wright.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Lord Radstock, who was the chairman of the Baptist Missionary Society meeting, in his opening speech expressed the joy which it imparted to him to preside over a gathering of brethren of another communion than his own, affording as it did a proof of their essential oneness in the same faith and in obedience to the same Lord. The report which was read by Dr. E. B. Underhill referred at some length to the financial crisis through which the society had lately passed. In consequence of the continued falling off in the receipts up to July last, there was a prospect of a debt, at the end of the financial year, of 8,000*l.* (about twenty-five per cent upon the entire income). With one heart and voice, however, the committee declined to discuss the expediency of reducing the expenditure by recalling some of the missionaries. They forthwith placed the facts fully before their constituents, and the result was that by great exertions and self-denial (the "poor churches" were the first to make response to the appeal), the gross the year 1863-4 proved the largest been received since the jubilee of not only was the old debt paid off expected deficit fully met, but there a balance in the hands of the

After sketching the of missionaries, the report went in detail of the progress of the slating and printing the Scriptures oks. The Rev. T. Evans, of Delhi, having delivered a long and able speech, illustrative of the great difficulties attending missionary work in India, was followed by the Rev. S. Coley (Wesleyan), in a happy and interesting address on Christian Union. Dr. Angus (President of Regent's-park College) next addressed the meeting. In the course of his speech he said: "I am aware that there has been for years among us, and probably there is still, a feeling of doubt about our societies, a preference for individual action, and for Church action; and among the grounds for this preference is the conviction or fear that societies for the most part have no conscience and no heart; they excite no sympathy, because they themselves feel none." ("Hear, hear," from Mr. Spurgeon.) Dr. Angus, however, expressed his belief that, though a society, the institution whose claims he advocated was by no means adverse to either "individual action" or "Church action;" and that, notwithstanding the absence of any express provision as to the personal piety of its members, it was yet "practically an association of God-fearing men."

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, who followed Dr. Angus, remarked that, when the gage of battle was thrown down, as he considered it had been by that gentleman, he was not the man to refuse to take it up. He pleaded for what was right and scriptural, and "to say a thing is right and scriptural, but does not signify, would be to cut the rock from under our feet and stand upon the sands." He could not submit to that. He was not less a friend to the Baptist Missionary Society than any man living, but he fondly cherished the hope that he might see an association formed on thoroughly scriptural principles:—

We have not believed in an association composed of ten-and-sixpences; we have always said piety is an essential, and the profession of that piety before men. We have always thought that any connexion with the world, merely on account of ten-and-sixpences, or even thousands of pounds, was almost as great an evil as uniting the Church with the State, which contains so many worldly elements. And therefore we have not spoken about words and phraseologies, but about what is to us a very solemn principle. We are prepared, as Christian men, to maintain in its fullest strength this society, but we are not prepared to work with any society which either ignores the Churches or does not distinctly make itself a Christian society, by having no members but those who profess to be Christians. We don't believe we could expect to have God's blessing unless we purge out the old leaven. We think that just as in the human body, if there is a piece of bone that is dead, there will be an ulcer and a swelling till the bone is cut out, so the admission, even in phraseology, of anything like a dead world, and the unrenewed nature of man into the working society of Christ, would only be to breed an ulcer in it, which would mar the whole body in its beauty and strength. But, leaving this question, let me touch upon another point. What I want to say is this: I want to see everywhere a widespread satisfaction with the Baptist Society, and a widespread dissatisfaction with what it is. I want to see a widespread dissatisfaction with all the results that have ever come out of the missionary enterprise—a dissatisfaction which shall make us fall upon our faces before our God, and groan and weep, saying, "Lord, how is it that Thou dost not bless Thy Churches more?" We want to get Christian people to say we must have something more; for God will never give us greater things till we want them, and pant after them even as the hart panteth after the water-brooks. To a great extent our prayers and expectations are prophetic. They show what God is going to do, and if we are content with what we have—(grateful I know we must be)—if we do not pant after wider and larger things, we shall not have them. But when the groan has gone up, "O God, we cannot endure this any longer; Lord, Thou who didst work so mighty a work at Pentecost, is Thine arm shortened that it cannot save;" were not whole continents covered with the truth in a short space of time, and may we not expect the like wonders now?

He also wanted to see a deeper sense entertained of personal responsibility. This would be promoted by every individual who could afford it supporting his own missionary, paying the money for his support to the society, and coming into direct communication with him. Knots of churches, too, might combine to support a missionary. He concluded by advocating greater denominational unity.

The propriety of making certain important changes in the constitution of the Baptist Missionary Society had been previously brought under the notice of the "members' meeting" of that institution which invariably precedes the Exeter Hall gathering. It was resolved that the question should be further discussed at the next annual members' meeting. The Freeman (the denominational organ) describes the anniversary as having proved in many respects the most interesting that has been held for many years past. The attendance at several of the Baptist meetings was larger than the writer in that journal ever remembers to have witnessed.

COLONIAL, CONTINENTAL, AND OTHER MISSIONS.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel held their annual meeting at St. James's Hall, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury. It appeared from the report that, notwithstanding the gross receipts were less, the income of the society, from subscriptions and donations during the past year, had largely increased, as compared with the year before, and the committee state that the society is steadily proceeding in the course upon which it entered several years ago, of reducing its grants in those dioceses and colonies which, through increasing wealth and population, are yearly becoming more equal to the support of their own Churches and clergy. The speakers included the Duke of Marlborough, the Earl of Harrowby, who especially eulogised the sending out of bishops, who might be called the seed of clergymen, and who he wished might be multiplied in this country also; the Right Hon. E. Cardwell, M.P., and W. E. Gladstone M.P., both of whom spoke eloquently of the value of voluntary missionary enterprise, in contradistinction to the system of relying on the public purse; while the latter specially warned the meeting to beware of Chancellors of the Exchequer. Mr. Gladstone went on to say:—

Your grace will no doubt recollect, at all events I well remember, that Dr. Burton was Professor of Divinity at Oxford in the year 1833, when a parliamentary vote was withdrawn. It amounted to 16,000*l.* a-year, which at that time was equal to four-fifths of the entire income of the society [The society's income now approaches 88,000*l.*]. A meeting was held at Oxford on the occasion, and great was the dismay that overspread, and blanched the visages of those who attended it, and on being suggested to Dr. Burton, who was not only an eminent scholar, but an excellent and enlightened man, that as the vote of Parliament had been withdrawn, the best thing would be to see if it was possible to supply its place by voluntary assistance, he replied, "If the sum were less, it might be done, but being so enormous, it is impossible." That was not his error; so far as it was an error, it was the error of the age. Our age, perhaps, has its errors too, and if we are as hearty as to the objects we have in view, there may come when those who follow us may look back to our faint-heartedness and reproach us for our despondency and despair.

In conclusion, Mr. Gladstone remarked on the appointment of colonial bishops wiped off a reproach against the Church which had existed for 300 years—namely, that it could not exist except where upheld by the authority of the State; whereas it was effectually proved that she could stand forth, alone and unsupported, into the wilderness, and flourish by her own independent spring of permanent life, the orthodox faith, and the pious and devoted life of her clergy, being her only credentials. The Bishop of British Columbia gave an interesting account of the work of the Church in his diocese, and Mr. Gathorne Hardy, M.P., in a subsequent speech, insisted on the duty of a at home planting herself on the f every land on whose waters waved fish flag. The concluding vote of to the Primate was adopted, on the of the Archbishop of Armagh, secretary the Bishop of Chichester.

Their object was not merely to keep for dominions already won, but to go into the portions of the world, where the power of Satan still reigned. Their desire was to he Gospel to every land, till there should a wind that blew, nor a language under , which would not be associated with a l of their blessed Master, and with the nations of their holy religion. Many an y battle had been lost because, while one of the army was victorious, the other had l defeat. but on the other hand, let them take care lest Christians should become heathen.

An eloquent speech was delivered by the Bishop of Cork, who somewhat humorously protested against the "Church of England" being spoken of (there being, his lordship said, no such Church), instead of the United Church of England and Ireland. The Rev. C. E. Oakley, the Dean of Graham's Town, and the Rev. W. Cadman also addressed the meeting.

The meeting of the Turkish Missions-Aid Society was presided over by the Earl of Shaftesbury. The report commenced with a reference to the loss sustained by the society in the death of the deeply-lamented secretary, the Rev. G. R. Birch. It went on to say that the pecuniary aid rendered by the society to the missions in the Turkish empire since its formation amounted to £21,000. During the past year 110 native agents had been supported by the association, and efforts were still being made to enlarge the sphere of its usefulness. The adoption of the report was moved by the Rev. Dr. Blackwood, who stated the circumstances under which the society had been founded, and gave the result of his own observation in the East, as to the importance of the work. He also adverted, at some length, to the importance of missionary effort among the Bulgarians. Lord Dufferin, who seconded the resolution, observed that, during his residence in Syria, after the massacres, he was brought into official relations with a great number of American missionaries, and he had then opportunities of appreciating the wonderful energy, self-devotion, and zeal with which they fulfilled the trust committed to them, and said he was glad to have that opportunity of expressing publicly his deep sense of the obligation of all those who were interested in the cause of humanity to the American missionaries in Syria. The Revs. Messrs. Titcomb, Arthur, and Elliott, of Brighton, also addressed the meeting. In his concluding speech from the chair, the Earl of Shaftesbury remarked, with reference to the American missionaries, that he would say to the meeting, once for all, that they might depend upon it, that if that excellent body of men were removed they would never be able to replace them in this generation. The meeting audibly expressed their concurrence in the noble lord's opinion.

The Foreign-Aid Society had as its chairman (in the involuntary absence of the Marquis of Cholmondeley) Mr. J. C. Colquhoun.

The deputations who attended from France were M.M. Pastors Fisch and C. L. Frossard ; from Geneva, M. Pastor Pronier ; and from Belgium, M. Pastor De Fay—all of whom represented associations for evangelization in their respective countries which had been aided by the society. These gentlemen severally addressed the meeting, giving interesting and encouraging accounts of the success of their labours in the districts under their superintendence. The Hon. Arthur Kinnaid, M.P., Mr. A. Haldane, and Canon McNeil also spoke. Italy was not represented, but it obtained a large share of notice in the report, which was read, as usual, by the Rev. R. Burgess. "Many of the agencies" in Italy, we are told, "are unmanageable, or act prejudicially; and the Foreign-Aid Society hitherto has not been able to go into union with more than three for all Italy—the Vaudois Commission of Synod for Evangelization, the Evangelization-Aid Committee at Naples, and the Italian Committee at Geneva." All these, however, are spoken of in terms of commendation, and it is stated that "the Neapolitan Committee has accomplished wonders in Naples." The grants in aid of evangelization upon the Continent generally amounted to 200*l.* more than the previous year.

The Evangelical Continental Society was presided over by Mr. J. R. Mills. Its object is similar to that of the Foreign-Aid Society, which is supported by Churchmen, while this association is composed of Dissenters. The meeting was addressed by the deputations already mentioned, the English speakers being the Rev. Edward Prust and the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel ; the latter of whom gave a resumé of M. Pronier's speech, which was delivered in French.

HOME MISSIONS.

The meeting of the Church Pastoral Aid Society, held in St. James's Hall—the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair—was highly encouraging, in respect not only to the attendance, which was most numerous, but to the society's funds and operations, and to the general tenor of the proceedings. Wherever there may be doubt or hesitancy in the enunciation of the great truths of the Gospel, there is none upon the part of the conductors of this great institution. The committee, in their report, expressed their "wish explicitly to state, that they regard it, if possible, more than at any former period, as a point of primary consideration, to take special care that none be supported by the society but men sound in doctrine, who will know nothing among their people but Jesus Christ and Him crucified;" and the sentiment thus expressed seemed to strike a chord in the hearts of the various speakers which was heard, in a subdued or a louder key, throughout the subsequent proceedings. So, too, the employment of lay agency was again and again insisted upon. It appeared from the report that the society's funds had increased, as compared with the previous year, by nearly 3,000*l.* The number of grants was twenty-seven grants more than had been at the previous anniversary. The aid of the society is now afforded to 460 incumbents, in charge of an aggregate population which gives about 8,000 souls to each. By means of the grants now made additional and more systematic pastoral visitation is provided for a population amounting to nearly three millions and three-quarters.

Canon Champneys, in a thoroughly practical speech, such as only could be delivered by one who had acquired wide experience, a hard-working clergyman in a densely populated parish, moved the adoption of the report. Speaking of the employment of lay agency, he adverted to the time when lay assistance was promised to the society, if would throw that agency overboard ; "and now," he added, "it has won its way, there is no need of speaking or arguing about it, further than to thank God that we more and more see that the clergy are not the Church, that we cannot possibly do without the laity, as the laity could not possibly do as well without us." Canon Boyd followed in the same strain ; but expressed his wish for co-operation [unpaid assistance] as well as lay agency. The reverend gentleman said :—

I join heartily in the sentiment that the Church is not the clergy. I believe the operation of contrary opinion has done more to hinder exertions of the Church of England than anything else that can be named. It leads to the belief that we have adopted the principles enunciated by the Church of Rome in past times, in the attempts to isolate ourselves we have conveyed to the world the impression that the Church of England is not the laity and the clergy, the laity alone. The consequence is what we just have been expecting, that the laity have actually said to us, "Have it your own way ; let the Church if you like, but don't expect at the time to have our co-operation." It is a strange thing to look back and see how early in Christian Church things changed their relation by the process of absorption. The laity were swallowed up by the deacons. If you look at the deacons, you will find that they were swallowed up by the presbyters. If afterwards you look at the presbyters, you will find that they were swallowed up by the bishops ; and perhaps, in retribution, the bishops were swallowed up by the chief bishop, the Pope of Rome. There is a gradual moving from lower to higher stations.

end gentleman went on to recom-bishops to refuse ordination to every 1 who could not produce a certifying spent at least six months in rochial work, under the superin- of an experienced clergyman.

Stowell, who was the next speaker, the noble chairman that two years kindred occasion, he had reported ful and calm manner in which the peratives in the North of England rgoing the fearful distress arising otton famine. He went on to say:— my privilege to report that the con- these worthy classes, so beautiful in durance, is, if possible, more beautiful at sunshine of prosperity that is now to dispel the clouds that overshadowed that hope and employment are begin- to illumine their path. I will give it which occurred a fortnight ago in the ood of Manchester. There was an extory which formerly employed some hands—employed and supported the g population of a vast village. That d stood unemployed for nearly two s. No smoke issued from the chimney a bales were carried into the warehouse of a spindle was heard. The people t wearied out, when, only a fortnight ad tidings circulated all around that coming in, that the mill was to be d the people summoned to their work. did the people hear that the wain laden was coming, than the glad tidings of a wildfire around. Fathers, mothers, g men, children, flocked around to erious scene, and keep their ovation. the wain came in view, the standard d, the evergreens strewed the way, the men unyoked the horses from the wain, and attached themselves to it, and dragged it triumphantly into the factory yard, attended with bands of music. They rent the air with their shouts. But, best of all, when once it was fairly landed in the mill-yard, they struck up, as with one voice—

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
Praise Him all creatures here below,
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host,
Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

The effect was electrical on the crowd, and especially on the mothers and children. They could not sing, they were so choked with tears of thanksgiving and gratitude.

Mr. Stowell spoke like a veteran of the importance of the younger clergy, who are taking the places and laying hold of the standard which is loosening from the grasp of those by whom it has been long borne, carrying it triumphantly to victory. He particularly insisted on the necessity of sound views upon inspiration. The Rev. John Richardson, of Bury St. Edmunds, and the Rev. W. Cadman also spoke in support of the institution. The noble chairman followed up all that had been said by enforcing the duty of earnest effort for the good of those living in sin and ignorance, and the propriety, in the pursuit of practical objects, of disregarding questions of merely speculative interest.

The London City Mission has entered on the thirtieth year of its existence under promising circumstances. Last year, as we then stated, in consequence of a falling off in the funds, it was necessary to dismiss twenty missionaries, and the prospect was imminent of a still further reduction in the number. In answer to a special appeal, however, there was subsequently received, within one month, the sum of 4,300*l.*, and this year's income shows an increase of between 5,000*l.* and 6,000*l.*—the largest annual increase with which the society has ever been favoured. The chair, at the anniversary, which was so often filled by the late Mr. J. P. Plumptre, was occupied, this year, by Mr. Joseph Hoare, who said that the system of lay agency has so spread throughout England, that every town of any size has now lay agents at work. Those very men who, under different circumstances, might have been expected to come to London, now remain as evangelists in their own places and neighbourhoods. The result is, that at this time there are nine or ten districts vacant; the money has been paid in for them, and the committee are only waiting for suitable men to fill those districts. The report, which was read by the Rev. J. Garwood, thankfully acknowledged the Divine hand in the improved pecuniary position of the society. The returns of the mission show a larger number of adults visited in their sickness and until their death than in any former year of the society's existence. The sick visits of the missionaries considerably exceeded a quarter of a million, and were at the rate of 715 daily. In perusing the 390 annual reports which have been sent in by the missionaries, the feature which most immediately strikes the reader as peculiar to this past year, is the very general reference to the inconveniences and injury experienced in the districts by the displacing of the poor by railways and new thoroughfares. At such a time as the present, that the Bible should be more generally in the abodes of the poor than probably has ever yet been the case, is an especial cause of thankfulness. The society's circulation of tracts was larger last year than in any previous year, and exceeded 3,100,000. "It is to the invaluable publications of the Religious Tract Society," continued the report, "that the mission is mainly indebted, and it is through the very liberal terms on which the committee of that society supply the mission with its publications, at a considerable loss to themselves, that the mission has been enabled so very largely to purchase of them during the past year." The indoor meetings of the mission, 45,436 in number, were last year both more numerous and also better attended than in any previous year. They averaged 127 meetings daily. A large number of these meetings are held in rooms granted freely by the poor, the society in no case paying rent. More than 4,000 open-air services were held by them last year, and often with the happiest results. The missionaries report 1,182 drunkards reclaimed during the year, which is, with one exception, the largest number yet returned in a single year, averaging more than three every day. The visitation of the foreigners of London embraces persons of almost every nation.

The Rev. Dr. Edmond, in moving the adoption of the report, showed how beautifully the three principal features of our Lord's personal ministry were reproduced in the ministrations of the society. Lord Charles Russell seconded the resolution. The Rev. J. C. Ryle, who was the next speaker, adverted to the Bishop of London's Fund. He said he was heartily glad to find that the Bishop of London was looking the matter in the face, and was endeavouring to find some remedy for the spiritual destitution of his diocese. But in the country—weasel asleep, and they were not such simpletons as to give their money in a cause until they had confidence in the cause. If the money raised & that fund was to be given to pay persons to preach in the spirit of "Essays and Reviews," the Fund would not go forward very fast, and a great many people in the country would hold their hands before they gave their money to it. They were in suspense in the country about it. If it went to the Gospel, the whole Gospel, and nothing but the Gospel, then they would help it; but if there was anything short of the Gospel, or anything added to the Gospel, not one farthing would come to it from many quarters he knew.

The Revs. Francis Sharr and S. Manning were the next speakers, and were followed by the Rev. W. Cadman, who testified from his own experience, during twenty years' ministry in London, to the utility of City missionaries in all departments of Christian work. Mr. W. J. Maxwell and Colonel Tudor Lovie also addressed the meeting.

The anniversary of the Irish Church Missions to the Roman Catholics commenced with a public breakfast at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, at which the Bishop of Ripon presided. After breakfast Sir Hugh Cairns, M.P., addressed the meeting, taking for his topic the identity in the interests of the two branches of the United Church of England and Ireland; Sir H. Cairns was followed by the Rev. T. R. Birks, who spoke of the present danger of the Church from foes within and without; after which the Rev. Canon M'Neile delivered an address on the duty and safeguard of the Church in the impending crisis. At ten o'clock the usual business of the annual meeting commenced, the chair being taken by Mr. J. C. Colquhoun. The report, extracts from which were read by the Rev. Alexander Dallas, secretary, stated the encouraging fact that, in consequence of an increase in the society's receipts, the committee had been enabled to devote the sum of 1,500*l.* for the extension of missions during the current year. The report set forth the successful efforts which had been made by the society to co-operate with the parochial clergy who might be desirous of carrying out missionary operations among their Roman Catholic parishioners. The Earl of Bessborough, in moving the adoption of the report, bore testimony to the incalculable benefits which the society had conferred upon Ireland. The Archbishop of Armagh said he had good evidence that the society was doing for Ireland the work of God honestly and effectively, and he rejoiced at its success. Canon M'Neile expressed his admiration of the practical character of the Irish Protestant clergy; he valued the integrity of the Word of God, as account of the mission work in Ireland. A very powerful address was delivered by Rev. Canon Stowell, in which he called his brethren in Ireland to concentrate efforts to bring about the work of redemption in that country.

The Archbishop of York presided at the meeting of the Army Scripture Readers and their Friend Society, and speeches were made by his Grace, the Bishop of Cork, the Dean of Dealtry, of Madras, Colonel Hart, and Major-General Lawrence. This society owes its existence to the interest created in soldiers by the Crimean war. The necessity it is well put by a sergeant whom the Archbishop quoted: "A Scripture-reader is as essential as a doctor. You will allow that going to church once a-week is not sufficient to keep a soul alive; whereas if we had only a reader to walk to and fro among us it would keep us in mind of what we had done, and it would be an easier matter for a chaplain to secure our attention." A retired chaplain had stated that he had been able to do more for the soldiers under his charge during the last two years with the aid of a Scripture-reader than during the whole of the previous eight without one.

The Church Home Mission has been organized expressly for the benefit of country churches throughout the provinces. The service at the anniversary was filled by Canon Gile, who told his audience that the Church Home Mission operates on this wise:—

A letter from the honorary secretary, or one of the coadjutors, to the clergyman of the parish, by post, says: "Watchman, what of the

We regret that the receipts of this meritorious society are considerably less than last year.

The Systematic Benevolence Society met in Exeter Hall—its first appearance, if we recollect aright, in that spacious building. Dr. Cather read a statement explanatory of the objects of the society, which are familiar to our readers. The meeting was then addressed by the Rev. James Bardsley, of Manchester, and the Rev. John Hall, of Dublin. The cause of the society was also advocated by Mr. Mason Jones and the Rev. W. Morley Punshon. In the course of his speech, Mr. Jones remarked that he was sorry to hear that the Earl of Shaftesbury (who occupied the chair) was himself not a member of that society. He ended with a reference to the recent visit of Garibaldi and the expression of a hope that the General would soon have obtained possession of Rome and Venice. The noble earl, in his concluding speech, remarked that the income possessed by private individuals in this country considerably exceeded 400,000,000*l.* per annum, and he thought the amount contributed to religious and charitable objects not at all in proportion to this enormous increase in wealth. He did not wonder, therefore, that a number of religious men should have joined together to consider how they could best make an appeal to the consciences of the public in reference to the duty of giving. His lordship went on to say:—

Whether you have chosen the right way of proceeding, by assuming the form of a society, I do not know. Perhaps there was no other course that you could take. But of this I am persuaded, that if you clearly explain your object, if you show his own house and his own field. In conclusion, let me say it is perfectly true, as Mr. Mason Jones has observed, that I am not at present a member of this society, but I am not an unwilling disciple; and this I will say, that if systematic beneficence will without any hazard take Garibaldi into Rome and Venice, I will become a member to-morrow. (Cheers and laughter.)

The Young Men's Christian Association had their annual public breakfast, as usual, at the early hour of six, at their institution in Aldersgate-street. After breakfast, Mr. J. Gurney Hoare took the chair in the Lecture Hall, and introduced the series of addresses by a few exhortations to firm, open Christian profession. The Rev. H. J. Cummins dealt with the inquiry, "How should young men approach questions arising out of the progress of science?" The Rev. S. Coley, Rev. W. Arnot (Edinburgh), Rev. T. Aveling, and Mr. Robert Hanbury, M.P., also addressed the company. The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon spoke to the subject, "Have faith in God"—in His Word, His guidance, and His help. He took incidental occasion to deprecate what he thought the undue prominence of the Colenso controversy.

At the Protestant Alliance meeting—Lord Calthorpe in the chair—a marked feature of the proceedings was the firm and decided tone of the speeches, as opposed not only to Popery, but to latitudinarianism, and the resolute determination evinced to maintain the standard of Protestantism amid whatever defections may occur in Church or State. Mr. John Macgregor read the report, one of the most interesting items in which was the expenditure of between 400*l.* and 500*l.* in a competitive examination of young men for prizes on the Romish controversy, and for which there were 187 candidates. The speakers were the Rev. W. McCall, the Rev. C. Prest, Colonel Walker, and Mr. T. Chambers (Common Serjeant). The latter made a speech which deserves notice. He had no faith, he said, in parliamentary action with reference to Romanism, at the present time, and he gave his reasons why. But he had faith in the people, and upon them the influence of the people should be brought to bear. He said:—

We were living in a state of things not unlike the state of things which existed in ancient Rome as described by Gibbon, with regard to the national system of belief. The systems of religious belief were considered by the people to be all equally true, by the philosophers to be equally false, and by the State to be equally safe. The general indifference to the claims of truth, the overwhelming peremptory indispensable claims of truth, was such as to induce our statesmen to say, when the population is divided into so many classes, each must have its share, and all must be placed on the same footing. Nothing would shake Parliament out of that belief until the people were shaken out of it.

The sixty-ninth anniversary of the Religious Tract Society was celebrated under the presidency of Lord Benholme, one of Her Majesty's Judges in the Scottish Court of Session. The report, read by Dr. G. I. Davis, presented a striking array of statistics as to the extensive scale of the society's operations. We give the salient points:—

During the year the society issued 83 publications of the tract and hand-bill class. It published 13 books for adults, 14 for the young besides a large number of miscellaneous works and its weekly and monthly periodicals, the circulation of all of which is steadily advancing. The number of publications issued from the deposit during the year amounted to 43,281,000. If these be added the number of probable issues in foreign countries, the amount will be about 48,000,000, and the proximate circulation for the formation of the society, 1,054,000,000. The total grants for the year for Great Britain and Ireland amounted to 6,774*l.* The foreign operations were varied and extensive, embracing France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark (where very large quantities of tracts were given to the opposing armies, and received with avidity), Sweden, Russia, Germany, Switzerland, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Turkey, India, China, British North America, the West Indies, the Australian Colonies, and Africa. [The mention, in the report, of Italy, and a personal reference, by Lord Benholme, to Garibaldi, elicited the loud applause of the meeting.]

Mr. Thomas Chambers, the Common Serjeant, moved the adoption of the report, and gave his personal experience in proof of the fact that a better-attended committee than the committee of the Religious Tract Society is not to be found in London. The Rev. Charles Clayton, of Cambridge, seconded the motion, and told several interesting anecdotes showing the beneficial results of tract distribution. The Rev. J. H. Titcomb followed with some useful hints to tract distributors. The Rev. S. Manning addressed himself to the objections urged against the constitution of the society and its plan of operations with considerable ability, and the Rev. James Leighton, Vicar of Bispham, gave some special information on the circulation of tracts and books in India, derived from his personal residence there. Mr. Leighton remarked that just as the influence of the writings of our Reformers and the great Puritan divines have given a sound tone to English religious thought and English religious literature, which in the main, thank God, continues to the present time, it is an omen of the happiest promise that the Church are of the infant churches of India : pure, peaceful, scriptural, catholic be Religious Tract Society, and is r its auspices.

iversary of the Sunday-school Union led by a conference of delegates ry and town Sunday-school Unions biles Buildings, Old Bailey. The eting at Exeter Hall was densely The Earl of Shaftesbury took the s meeting being the fourth on hough indisposed, he presided that s Earl made a warm-hearted appeal t, especially ladies, to support the Sunday-schools, some of his advice on the choice of husbands being naturally provocative of some little laughter. Mr. W. H. Watson read the report, which stated the great increase which had taken place within the last twelve years in the number of schools, teachers, and scholars. In 1852 the number of schools in town and country was 1,990; of teachers, 46,847; and of scholars, 346,971; while in 1864 the number of schools was 3,284; of teachers, 73,134; and of scholars, 635,654. The business in the depository during the year had also considerably increased. There were 600,000 children in London between the ages of five and fifteen, but the gross total on the books of the Sunday-schools did not exceed 200,000, so that there were still many hundred thousands of children destitute of the moral and religious instruction afforded by the Sunday-school. This was a fact calling for the serious attention of the committee. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. F. G. Rogers, the Rev. Mr. Charlesworth, Dr. Hugh Allen, the Rev. Francis Tucker, and the Dean of Dromore. Mr. Tucker, who was for some time a minister in Manchester, told an anecdote of James Kershaw, Esq., the recently-deceased member for Stockport, which deserves to be reproduced. Mr. Tucker said :—

Everything, under God, did James Kershaw owe to Sunday-schools. When he was a lad of ten years of age he was in a class in a Sunday-school in Manchester. The name of the president, or superintendent, of that school was Steele, a name very fragrant in the history of that great town. James was a very troublesome boy. The teacher came up with his name to the superintendent, and again and again said, "I cannot do anything with him." "But," said Mr. Steele, "I am sure there is something in James, if one knew how to develop it." Again and again came the complaint, and again and again did this kind-hearted superintendent set it aside. At last this little boy broke through a rule which involved exclusion; and when the next Sunday came the inquiry was, I believe, somewhat in this form, "Who of you has been to the races during the past week?" None in this class, none in the next, none in the other, none anywhere but James. "Well," said the teacher, "you see the boy must go, Mr. Steele; a diseased sheep will infect the flock." "But," said the superintendent, "I cannot part with that boy; let us have him up in the presence of the whole school." Up he came, a fine, daring, defiant, handsome little fellow, of ten years of age. All the school looked on, and the superintendent said, "Now, James, I am sure, when you come to think of it, you are sorry that you went to the races." The little fellow shrugged his shoulders; he was not at all sorry. Then, just as one of you ladies would touch the keys of a piano, did the superintendent in his address try to touch the keys of that boy's heart, till at length he had produced some effect. Turning to the hundreds of boys in his presence, he said, "My lads, if we turn James out of the school he will go to the bad and become worse. Shall he go?" "No, no, no," shouted 300 voices, and James burst into tears, fairly conquered by affection, fairly won by love. What he became afterwards there are Manchester gentlemen on this platform who can tell you better than I. He became a member of Parliament; he became a deacon of a Christian Church. His 100/- a-year was always carefully paid into the London Missionary Society, and sixty guineas, as I know, to the Manchester City Mission; and I may also say, as I happened to have some pleasant acquaintance with him, that there were many things which his right hand did which his left hand was not allowed to know. Now, he has gone; one of the brightest trophies of Sunday-school instruction.

There was a crowded meeting at the anniversary of the Ragged-school Union, the Earl of Shaftesbury occupying the chair, as he has done on each of the twenty annual gatherings since the foundation of the society. The report, which was read by Mr. Locke, showed that there were in connexion with the Union 600 schools, with 51,247 scholars, being an increase of about 1,500 upon last year. The Shoeblack branch goes on successfully, having eight societies, numbering 335 lads, whose total earnings during last year was no less than 6,423/. The results of the Rag-collecting Brigade are upon the whole satisfactory. It has attached to it eight trucks and forty boys, and the weight of goods collected during the year was 3,554 cwt., value 1,677/. The refuges continue to be conducted with the efficiency of former years. The noble chairman expressed the pleasure he felt in presiding, but regretted that notwithstanding the progress of ragged-schools, the necessity for them was not only so great, but even greater than when, twenty years ago, they were first established. His lordship made an earnest appeal for more teachers. The adoption of the report was moved by the Rev. C. Oakley, Rector of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, who read several interesting letters which he had received from boys in various situations, who had been educated in Streatham-street Ragged-schools. The other speakers were the Rev. J. G. Rogers, the Rev. Dr. Edmond, the Rev. C. Campe, John Glover, Esq., Joseph Payne, Esq. (who announced that as his last appearance), and the Rev. Mr. Wilson.

At the anniversary of the Reformatory and Refuge Union, 600 children belonging to the different refuges were present, and formed a choir, singing several popular melodies. Mr. Hanbury, M.P., Dr. Lankester, and the Rev. W. Brock (of Bloomsbury) were among the speakers. The Earl of Shaftesbury (who presided), in referring to the remarks of the latter gentleman, spoke of "the sterling common sense, the deep piety, the manly eloquence of, let me say, that jolly old Saxon fellow-worker, William Brock, whom I never hear without hearing something good." In the course of the speech which elicited this deserved compliment, the reverend gentleman remarked that from the very first God had put His imprimatur upon the movement:—

There were now valuable colonists, reputable tradesmen, aye, creditable ministers of the Gospel; he had men working with him at St. Giles's, in the Domestic Missions, who, but for that institution, might have been hung by that time. A burglar once entered his place of worship, and received such impressions, that he came again and again, and at last gave him (Mr. Brock) the life preserver with which many evil deeds had been done in days past. [Mr. Brock pulled the instrument out of his pocket.] That man was an evidence that they were not labouring in vain. &c. (Mr. Brock) had many such trophies.

At the meeting of the Church of England Metropolitan Training Institution, the Earl of Shaftesbury, who presided, adverting to some remarks which had been made by the Rev. F. Bayley, expressed his belief that the course pursued by the Council of Education has resulted in a death-warrant having gone forth against Training Colleges. But whatever might happen with regard to the Metropolitan College, its friends had reason to thank God that it had sent out some good and true men who were producing a good work wherever they went.

The Duke of Argyll was in the chair at the meeting of the Christian Vernacular Education Society for India. The report, read by the Rev. J. H. Titcomb, stated that twelve schools had been opened in British Burma, Bengal, and Orissa, and that a plan had been adopted for improving heathen schools. The number of publications printed during the year was 115,400. The Archbishop of York, Mr. J. C. Colquhoun, the Rev. Wm. Arthur, the Rev. C. Fenn, Mr. Macfie, and Dr. Davy addressed the meeting.

* * We have reserved the financial statistics of the various societies for inspection at one view, as they appear on the opposite page. Two or three particulars should be borne in mind in glancing over the statement. In the case of the Wesleyan Missionary Society the amount reported is exclusive of £2 contributions promised to the Jubilee Fund, which already exceed 170,000/. Receipts from sales are included in the income of the following societies, which received from these sources the sums not mentioned: British and Foreign Bible Society, 79,007/. (besides 771/. for the Chinese New Testament Fund); Religious Tract Society, 96,934/.; Sunday-school Union, 18,077/.; Religious Book Society, 2,000/. Church of England Sunday-school Institute, 1,720/. In the case of the Wesleyan Education Committee the amount reported is on account of new schools, while the increase is on the committee's general fund.

ECCLESIASTICAL EVENTS.

THE ARCHBISHOPS AND THE JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL.

The Archbishop of York has followed the example of his brother Archbishop, and has published a pastoral address to the clergy and people of his province on the subject of the late judgment in the case of the "Essays and Reviews." There is nothing perhaps original in his Grace's views; he concurs with those who think, and, indeed, he proves, that the Queen's judgment in the case is by no means identical with the reasons assigned by the Lords of the Council for the advice tendered to Her Majesty. He also shows that the Court was shut out from the consideration of everything but the extracts taken from the obnoxious "Essays," and that these were, in many cases, so framed as to make it impossible to extract an intelligible meaning out of them. Yet, after all these deductions, he cannot, or, at all events, he does not, disguise from himself that even these extracts, so garbled, do deny the inspiration of the Scriptures and the eternity of future punishment, and that these denials the Court refused to condemn.

A more important circumstance—indeed, an historical event—took place in the course of the month at Lambeth Palace, where a large deputation of the clergy presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury the now famous Oxford "Declaration," signed by more than 11,000 ordained clergymen of the United Church of England and Ireland. We have on a former occasion given the text of the "Declaration;" we now do the same by the Archbishop's reply, which it will seen is extremely cautious and guarded:—

Rev. and dear Brethren,—We accept this Declaration as a renewed expression of your belief in those doctrines of the Church to which it refers. It is satisfactory to receive your assurance that there are some thousands of the clergy who, agreeing with you in the substance of the Declaration, hesitated to sign it only by reason of its form or circumstances. This assurance strengthens our convictions that the clergy of our Church will never be disposed to propagate opinions which tend to subvert the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. We shall ever feel it to be our duty to maintain the authoritative teaching of the Church, humbly trusting that we may receive guidance from above, and be endued with strength and wisdom to promote the glory of God and the welfare of His Church. Through Jesus Christ our Lord.

THE NEW BISHOP AND THE NEW DEAN.

Dr. Jeune, who only a few months ago was appointed to the Deanery of Lincoln, is now promoted to the See of Peterborough, vacant by the death of the Very Rev. Dr. Davys. His post in the deanery will be filled by the Rev. Dr. Jeremie, Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. Both of these appointments have had the rare merit of pleasing all parties in the Church. We believe we may state that the sentiments of both these dignitaries are decidedly Evangelical. Indeed, there has been no more masterly defence of the doctrine of the atonement published than in the sermon on that subject preached, not long since, by Dr. Jeune. The new bishop is a native of Jersey, and speaks and preaches in French as well as a native-born Parisian, of which his sermons to the French visitors at the time of the Great Exhibition were universally admitted to be conclusive evidence. Dr. Jeremie is also a scholar and divine of high standing, and has for some time acted as Vice-Chancellor of his University. When the Convocation was reinstated, now several years ago, and the eyes of all England were fixed upon the strange movement in the long dormant body, Dr. Jeremie was selected to preach the Latin sermon to the members of Convocation in St. Paul's Cathedral, and a crowded audience was assembled on the occasion. It is matter of great thankfulness that the precedent set in the case of Dr. Stanley, of appointing men to dignities in the Church who do not speak out the thought that is in them, has not been followed in either of these later instances.

THE UNION OF THE FREE AND UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES IN SCOTLAND.

Our readers are aware that at the meeting last year of the two Churches named above, the propriety of a union between them was seriously taken into consideration, and both Churches appointed committees to meet together, to ascertain their points of difference, and the practicability of so overcoming them as to allow of a permanent fusion into one. In the course of the year that has closed these committees have held several meetings. Their deliberations were confined to the one knot, and between them most important point of the relations of the Church to the State. The voluntarism of the one body, and the theoretical maintenance of an Establishment in the other, is the great difficulty. Yet even here the agreement was stronger than might have been foreseen. The Free Church only argues for the lawfulness of an Establishment "as a question to be judged of according to times and circumstances, and always when the al independence is preserved entire." On the other hand, the United Presbyterians, they will not admit of an Establishment consent to the abstract principle that ment ought to be regulated according Word of God, that the magistrate is to further Christianity by means in accordance with its spirit, and particularly ought to make his marriage law conform to the doctrines of Scripture, that for the good of society he is bound to legislate outward observance of the Lord's-day, that it is within the scope of his function to invite all subjects of the realm to fasts and thanksgiving days on important occasions, provided that he prescribe the forms or modes of worship to be observed. These points came on for discussion first before the United Presbyterian meeting is held before the Free Church. There were some members of the assembly whom the Rev. Henry Renton, of Kelso, Rev. Dr. Davidson, of Edinburgh, were present, who thought that their committee conceded too much of the voluntary principle of their eagerness for a union; but the action of the committee was vigorously debated by the Rev. Dr. King, of London, who was the moderator for this year; by Dr. Cairns, of Glasgow; Mr. Marshall, of Coupar Angus, and others. Ultimately the following motion was unanimously adopted:—

The Synod expresses its great satisfaction at the Christian courtesy and kindly feeling which distinguished the conferences of the joint assembly, and the unabated sense of the importance of the object; and without giving any opinion on the articles submitted in the report appoints the committee, and re-commits to them, with instructions to continue the work in terms of the original appointment.

CONGREGATIONAL UNION.

Congregational Union of England and Wales held its usual Spring session on two evenings last month. In the absence of the Rev. J. C. Harrison, of London, who had been originally elected chairman for the year, the Rev. H. Morley had consented to occupy his place, and read the usual address from the chair. The subject was the current controversies on Christ, the Book, and the Church. The first topic Mr. Allon dismissed with the utmost brevity. Upon the first his address was some truly beautiful and eloquent, and he enunciated, with the utmost plainness, the Evangelical view of our nature and work. Of the doctrine of the death of the cross into self-sacrifice and the atonement into mere moral influence," he spoke as an "insidious heresy," adding: "Our Churches hold to the conception of Christ's death as a proper expiatory atonement, having a legal aspect Godwards, as well as a moral aspect manwards." In speaking of "the Book," he strongly insisted that "some of the most damaging assaults upon the Divine authorship of the Bible have really been assaults upon only untenable theories of inspiration, which a more justifiable position utterly disables." In seeking to make good this point and to demolish these "untenable theories," he devoted so much time and attention in showing the reality of the human element in Scripture, that in the judgment of some in the assembly he somewhat lowered its Divine authority. Such at least was the opinion of Mr. Samuel Morley, though the majority dissented from his view of the matter; but other brethren thought there had been a want of caution in some of Mr. Allon's phraseology, and it was suggested that the address should undergo revision. Mr. Morley entreated the brethren not to enter into controversy upon the inspiration of Scripture, but "to do the work of the Bible, to make it tell its own tale among the people of this country, where it is grievously wanted." The Rev. J. G. Rogers said that on the previous Sunday he had listened to "one of the most clear, calm, and logical discourses he had ever heard." The preacher was the Archbishop of York, and he could almost fancy that the most reverend prelate and Mr. Allon had been conferring together, so fully did they agree. The great point laid down was this, that a theory on such a question as the mode of inspiration was an impossibility with our present knowledge of the relation of the finite to the infinite. "That," said Mr. Rogers, "appears to me to be the position of our chairman." The other discussions were, for the most part, upon questions of denominational interest.

BAPTIST UNION.

It will be seen, from our abstract of the proceedings of the Baptist Missionary Society, that the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon exhorted his brethren to greater denominational unity. There would seem to be indications that the advice entirely accords with the present temper of the Baptist body generally. One of these is the improved position of the Baptist Union. This association has never possessed, among those whom it is supposed virtually to represent, the same importance which is acknowledged to belong to the Congregational Union among the Independents holding Pædobaptist sentiments. This year, however, the Baptist Union made a considerable stride towards attaining a higher position than it has ever hitherto done. The much larger attendance, the character of the proceedings, and the spirit of union manifested, are all regarded as affording ground for congratulation. The chair was occupied by the Rev. J. P. Mursell, of Leicester, and his opening address is spoken of in terms of high commendation. After he had treated of the controversies of the day and the position of parties in the Established Church, he warned his brethren against "a too indiscriminating sympathy with the æsthetic spirit of the times," and put amongst their foremost duties that of nourishing in the youth of their congregations "a profound reverence for the Word of God." He declared his denomination to be very "slightly, if at all affected with any tendency "to substitute earnest godliness a kind of gaseous inflation. As a denomination," he continued, "our dominion and strength lie in resisting it, in countering it by the faithful, plain, penetrating, affectionate preaching of the great doctrines of the Cross." The only other address which we need mention was that delivered by the Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel, on "the state of Churches" of the denomination. He recommended, in ministers, the cultivation of personal piety and earnestness, individual converse with their hearers, and the preaching of the simple Gospel. This address, which was delivered with touching simplicity and almost apostolic fervour, was listened to by a crowded audience with a solemnity that befitted the weighty subject.

Miscellaneous.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

INDIA.

The Rev. John Robson, a United Presbyterian missionary, gives an account of a preaching tour which he has made in Ajmere. Hindooism here remains in all its old form, unbroken by the inroads of a foreign religion or new developments of the native religion. He had large and usually attentive audiences in the bazaars.

When there was any discussion, it was generally on the favourite argument of the Hindoos, that the powerful can do no wrong. They eliminate the idea of holiness from their ideas of God, and are willing to bow before a strong demon as much as before a strong benefactor. . . . I found very frequent evidences in their discussions of an idea which, I have often heard, is current in Hindustan, that we English are the tenth incarnation of Vishnu. This struck me most prominently at Kekri, a place of about 7,000 inhabitants, with a good bazaar and several fine buildings. In the course of my remarks I spoke on the folly of imagining that a being guilty of such dishonest and immoral deeds as Krishn could be God. On this one of the crowd exclaimed very vehemently, "Why, these were just the pranks of Krishn. You English have your pranks too. You have railways, and steamboats, and electric telegraphs. If you amuse yourselves in that way, I do not see why Krishn might not amuse himself as he chose by theft or adultery, or any other way he thought fit." This was almost too much for my gravity; but I showed the man as well as I could that we English were not gods, and that our pranks were useful and beneficial.

The Rev. Mr. Cooper, of the Nagpore Free Church mission, reports the baptism of six adults—two at that station, and four at Kamptee. All had been under instruction & considerable time, having previously renounced idolatry.

The Free Church Mission at Indapore is conducted entirely by native agency. The Rev. Narayan Sheshadri, the head of the mission, states that for children belonging to the lower classes there is in that town no provision made of any kind whatever. He adds:—

About a year ago I was permitted to set up two ragged schools for the lowest of the low. For a number of months I myself instructed these literally ragged children (and even a number of them without any rags at all) out of the Word of God. Not a few have become by this time quite familiar with the grand facts of revelation. They all sing a number of Christian hymns to some well-known Marathi tunes. These tunes hitherto were sung by the lips of the "twice born" alone. One of our female schools is supported by a rich Hindoo merchant, who is not as yet a Christian, but who believes, with hundreds of his countrymen, that Christianity is the best and purest of religions, and has been the greatest power in the civilization of the world.

We regret to record the murder of the Rev. Mr. Janviers, of the Lodiana Mission. The object of the murderer was revenge on some Englishmen; yet his assassin stroke fell on an American. Mr. Janviers is very highly spoken of by the Church missionaries who knew him.

them, to tell them of the doctrine of Christ." On the other hand, the people who have been touched, directly or indirectly, by the Gospel, detest foreigners. "At Pechuia," "I rarely show face without more or less contemptuous epithets being applied to me, sometimes ribald abuse." Dr. Maxwell is preparing to break new ground in Formosa. At Swatow (Tie-Chew) the English Presbyterian missionaries communicate the cheerfulness of another large and important village, named Tung-ow, being opened to the Gospel, of the baptism of two converts, and of the commencement of the mission, consisting of chapel, dispensary, and private dwelling-house at Swatow.

BORNEO.

Bishop of Labuan reports that during last year there were 141 heathen baptized in stations of the Propagation Society in Borneo. The Sarebus Dyaks—who are the most energetic and powerful people in the country, and were long noted pirates—desirous of missionaries to reside among them, the Bishop is about to send them one of their old chief has been baptized, and now his whole energies are given to prepare himself to be a teacher to his own people.

WEST AFRICA.

King of Dahomey has sustained a severe defeat in his attack upon the great town of Abbeokuta :—

The expedition had been very long in preparation, and, in spite of the urgent protest of the authorities at Lagos, he had determined to carry it out. On the 15th of March the King of Abbeokuta with 10,000 men and women—the women being of course those redoubtable Amazons who form the royal body-guard. The Dahomians made a furious assault upon the town, using three brass field-pieces to bear upon the gates, while many of the Amazons clambered to the wall, which was fifteen feet high, and fought with desperation. One Amazon, who had her hands cut off in her efforts to clamber over the wall, discharged her musket with the same accuracy, and shot an Egba. She received a severe blow from a sabre, and fell backwards into the town, however, was well defended by its inhabitants, the Egbas, under the direction of the King, or "principal chief," and the Dahomians were repulsed with the loss of 1,000 in killed and 2,000 prisoners.

Rev. G. F. Buhler writes that the battle only lasted an hour :—

The Egbas and heathens could hardly believe that such a formidable enemy should be defeated in so little time. But it was the hand of God, and this is acknowledged by thousands of heathens of Dahomey, the terror of so many thousands—the man who, according to the statement of the King, cleared a piece of land where he would execute the missionaries whom he should catch in the future—that man suffered such a defeat as has no parallel in the history of Western Africa. of Dahomey's flight can only be compared with Napoleon's retreat from Moscow in 1812.

The following, dated ten days earlier than the above, is addressed to us by another of the missionaries :—

Abbeokuta, March 5, 1864.

Work of missions here is beset with peculiar trials just now—that of the want of an united front and war with surrounding tribes. These circumstances occupy the minds of the people circumstances. There is the influx of wealth—changes in costume, and the common use of things formerly forbidden—the increased pride and independence of the people, which wealth brings—the increase of needy, and also dishonest, debtors, which stimulated commerce has brought about—and then, added to these, the demoralization of war. Our efforts to make peace are rendered powerless by those who wish to escape the payment of their debts, and, of course, as long as the roads for commerce are shut, no one can compel them to pay.

We have many things to be thankful for. We enjoy the protection and confidence of the chiefs and the great mass of the people, when not acted on by unprincipled persons. We enjoy full religious toleration: no one interferes with us in the exercise of our religion or in teaching it. One of their superstitions, which would, if used on our Sabbath, hinder our meeting together, the chiefs always manage to appoint for some other day, out of respect to our religion. The English language is eagerly learnt in our schools, and the general population try to address a white person in English—but one word is known, that word is used. "Good morning" is sounded in our ears on every side as we pass the streets, without regard to the time of day. Some of them go so far as to add "Sir" to it. It is a small matter in itself, showing the tendency of the native mind.

Among our converts, a very large number are converts from heathenism to outward Christianity only. There are others who give us good hope of a real work of grace on their hearts, and they are, we believe, not a few. There is, without doubt, a great and good work going on in the country; it is the Lord's work, and it will go on, however many difficulties beset it. We have not heard from our friends shut up in Ibadan; but we hear of them, and that they are in health. We assemble together weekly to pour out our prayers and supplications for peace. A prayer-hearing God will answer us in good time.

On the first Sabbath of the present year a little church was formed and the Lord's Supper was dispensed for the first time at Ikorofiong, Old Calabar (more than 100 miles from the coast), by a United Presbyterian missionary.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The United Presbyterian Church has entered on the occupation of another missionary station in British Kaffraria, situated on the Upper Thomas River. The ground was granted by the Government, and the Gaika commissioner, Mr. Brownlee, introduced the Rev. Mr. Chalmers, the missionary, to the chiefs and people, with all the formality required by Kaffr etiquette, in an assembly specially summoned for the purpose. Mr. Chalmers was very cordially received.

The mission-stations in British Kaffraria were about to be visited by Dr. Duff, who, early in February last, was at Cape Town.

The Wesleyan missionary at Palmerton (Natal) has lately admitted nine natives into the Christian Church by baptism.

MAURITIUS.

Twenty-one Telugu immigrants, who, while in India, had been receiving instruction, as catechumens, from one of the Church Missionary Society's agents, and had just been prepared for baptism, became anxious, on their arrival at Mauritius, to be admitted into the Christian Church. They first went to a Roman Catholic church near which they were located, but found it was "not the right place." Subsequently they came in contact with the Rev. S. Hobbs, of the Church Missionary Society, by whom they were baptized, and who has imparted the pleasing intelligence to the missionary who has been the means of their conversion from heathenism, that the sower and the reaper may rejoice together.

NEW ZEALAND.

Letters from the agents of the Church Missionary Society show that there can be no greater mistake than to suppose that the whole of the native race are either engaged in the present war or even sympathise with the insurgent portion of their fellow-countrymen. Among several testimonies to the fact that the locality of the rebellion and the tribes engaged in it are circumscribed, we quote but one—that of the corresponding secretary of the society in Auckland. This gentleman writes:—

The natives to the north of Auckland are all quiet. The Bishop of Waiapu reports the same of those of the east coast and Turanga. Indeed, it would appear that, from Turanga southwards, all along the coast, which is the most thickly populated part of New Zealand, the natives, as a body, are neutral.

The proceedings of the second Synod of the diocese of Waiapu (a report of which has lately reached this country) were conducted entirely in the Maori language. In his opening address the bishop (Dr. Williams) states that "strenuous efforts have been made in some parts of the diocese to collect funds for the support of native clergymen." The amount obtained for that purpose had reached 1,155*l.* Among the resolutions of the Synod is one urging upon "all the members of the Church the obligation of using their best endeavours to raise the funds for the purpose of sending the Gospel to the heathen."

Monthly Retrospect.

mours of wars." If ever there was a time in the world's history when these special application, surely that time is the present. On all sides we hear either clash of arms or the more ominous mutterings of preparation. The fires of war are kindling up and spread from country to country, no one can tell how, and they are making strenuous efforts made to check their progress. The madness seems to be in the air; men are infected at the same time; nations rush to war with nations, or kindle the torch of civil war, and no one is able to explain the reason. In America one state on now for upwards of three years; in that time the Confederates have been active in the field; but there is one thing in which they have never yet been able to communicate to impartial Europe any one intelligible reason why they chose to secede, and thus to commence the war. Then we have the war in Europe, in which nineteen-twentieths of Englishmen, and we believe we may say too, see only the unscrupulous and violent aggression of the strong against the weak; they cannot fail to be struck with this remarkable fact, that the Germans themselves have no idea of unscrupulousness or of violence; they are sincerely, passionately right and truth are on their side, and they are lost in wonder and amazement that they cannot recognise the right which seems so clear to them. Their best writers, their ablest thinkers, their most moderate men, have undertaken to state their case, and to show the justice of their claims clear and palpable to all men's vision. Yet they are unable to explain the causes of the war, which the other Powers of Europe have with difficulty been suspending for a month, with little prospect of accomplishing more, still they are engaged in a war of aggression, as hopelessly obscure as ever. We shall not dwell here on the waste, but wasting and wearing wars which have broken out almost simultaneously in Algeria, in Western Africa, and in our own colony of New Zealand; but who could have expected at this time a new war on the borders of the Turkish Empire? It is almost as if we were all rejoicing in the settlement of the Eastern question. We had good reason to think, that the pacification then established would inaugurate a new era of peace and civilization that framed it. Alas! it is tumbling to pieces; already the old Austria and Wallachia, once so familiar to us, but of which we have heard little, are again in confusion, and armies from Russia, from Austria, and from Prussia are entering on their borders, and still no one knows why. It used to be said that England and France united could secure the peace of the world; but now we have not only no understanding on the most cordial understanding with each other, yet agreed to the impossibility of maintaining peace; and in spite of all their efforts war breaks out, and they attempt to stifle it, the more it spreads. In these singular circumstances it is impossible not to see that some higher than human power is intermingling itself with the world's destiny, and that we have arrived at one of those epochs seldom occurring in the march of time; but when they do, never do they bend to the course of human progress. It is a time when men's hearts are filled with fear, when the only safe refuge is in the reflection that the Lord is with us, and that we have nothing to praise Him, and the remainder of that wrath He doth above was written, the intelligence from our brethren across the Atlantic is more alarming than ever. The war is unabated; the carnage is sickening to read of. In the annals of the human race do we read of four great battles being fought in the same armies in six days, with a loss estimated to amount, on one side, to 100,000 men killed, wounded, and missing? It is hardly possible that the war has suffered less, for they were as often the assailants as the defenders. The slaughter without any definite result. When the steamer left the American coast, the armies still stood facing each other, with every probability of another battle being fought perhaps as indecisive as the others being fought within a few hours. This is reported in the American newspapers that in the midst of it all, luxury and pleasure run their course in the great towns. We are glad to be able to report that a interest in mission work runs its course also. Our correspondent tells us that the anniversaries were about to begin there, and while he anticipated diminution of interest, he assigns reasons for this, all of which would be valid; and when we add to them the absorbing interest of the war, there is enough, we think, to feel surprise, not that the cause of mission in America should decline, but that the Churches can, in the circumstances in which they live, find leisure to attend to them at all.

The grave has closed over the mortal remains of Dr. Malan, of Geneva. For more than half a century he has been known as an earnest preacher, a devotional poet, and a successful writer of tracts, many of which last were translated into English, and still hold their place as among the most popular in that department of sacred literature. When César Malan first awoke to the powers of the world to come, the National Church of Geneva, of which he was a minister, had sunk into the lowest condition of spiritual death and doctrinal heresy, and he saw no alternative but to come out and be separate. He lived to see light spreading around him, and if he was less willing to recognise it than others, who had dared and suffered less for the truth than he did, allowance ought to be made for that noble courage which in none but the highest minds could have made the stand he did, without prejudice to some other parts of nature. Whatever his powers, they were all given freely to the service of the Master whom he loved.

In the letter of our Italian correspondent for this month will be found an interesting outline of the proceedings at the annual Synod of the Church of the Vaudois at their principal town of La Tour. Deputations from various other Churches were present on the occasion, and successively addressed the people, in some cases upon their moral and social habits—lecturing them in a manner which it argues a large fund of patience and good nature that they took in such good part. We doubt whether an English audience would as composedly bear to be told of their faults by a succession of friends from foreign countries. No doubt they felt that it was all intended for their good; and we are very sure that if they show as much energy in doing as they showed patience in listening, the character of the Vaudois will be greatly elevated.

We have adverted on more than one occasion to the dispute that has occurred, between the Pope and the Cardinal-Archbishop of Lyons on the one hand, and the clergy and laity of the diocese on the other, arising out of an attempt on the part of the two dignitaries to remove the old Lyons service of prayer, to which the people have been accustomed for centuries, and to substitute for it that in general, though not in universal, use over the Romish Church. That dispute has now entered a new phase, and instead of remaining a dispute between the bishop and the diocese, it has become inflamed into a quarrel between the Pope and the Emperor. It seems that his Holiness was unwise enough so far to take part with the Archbishop as to issue a Bull commanding the diocese to adopt the new liturgy. But by the Concordat now in force, no Papal Bull can be published in France till it has first received the Imperial sanction; and as the present Bull has not done so, we even been submitted to the Emperor for his consideration, Louis Napoleon stands upon his rights, and prohibits the publication of the Bull in his dominions. He is entitled to do so, as we have said, whatever his sentiments on the merits of the controversy may be; but there is little doubt that his principal ground for interference is his sympathy with the diocese in the dispute, and his objection that such an element of religious strife should be introduced into the country. But however this may be, we have now an open conflict between the civil and ecclesiastical power in France. In the present dependent position of the sea upon French bayonets, this quarrel may yet lead to important results.

A very remarkable circumstance was reported a few days ago from the West Coast of Africa. The King of Dahomey made his long-threatened attack on the town of Abbeokuta, at the head of his army of Amazons, and was repulsed, routed, and so decisively driven back, that it is not likely he will attempt to renew the invasion. The Abbeokutans are exulting with joy and thankfulness, and people in England, struck with the tale, are beginning to inquire who and what the Abbeokutans are. The Times newspaper undertook to supply the information, and performed the task in such a way as to show how much it lacked information itself. The Christian element was left entirely out of sight in telling of the origin of the Christian-founded city. Even the advances made in civilization were but imperfectly understood, else, among other circumstances in which passed ancient Rome within the thirty-fifth year of their respective founding newspaper would surely not have forgotten to tell that Abbeokuta had its own, and that from its columns some of its English contemporaries information of the fight. We heartily agree with the Times, however, in Abbeokuta, thus preserved from devastation, may become a centre of civilisation light for the whole of the West African Coast.

erty—the extent of which, it is to be feared, few of us realise—that while all is the din of strife and discord, we, as a nation, are preserved from the joy internal unity as well as international peace, so that there is nothing to mention from those annual gatherings of our great religious and charitable which have taken place, as usual, in the past month. We have in other pages of the proceedings at most of those anniversaries, so that our readers will get a glance the progress which each of them has made in the course of the year of confidence they enjoy at the hands of the Christian public, and the more persons that were brought under review by the different speakers. It is worth mention with the missionary anniversaries, that the cause of missions has outso, the objections which were first raised against them. We are no longer in an absurd and hopeless task to preach the Gospel to the heathen. Modern thought together a different ground, and complain not that the Gospel is preached, which has no more success. Far from holding that pagans cannot understand, they maintain that the reason why more of them have not before this understood and embraced it, must be traced, not to Christianity, but to the want of teaching it. We do not concur in the one objection more than the change of ground is a hopeful sign. Once we come to the conclusion that we are to regard the Gospel as the power of God unto salvation, there will always be discussion as to the best means of its propagation; and the friends of the present system may, and probably will, be glad to pick up a useful hint here and there from opponents.

The see of Peterborough has been filled up in the course of last month by the Rev. Mr. Jeune, who only a month or two before was made Dean of Lincoln. That has been conferred on Dr. Jeremie; and both nominations have given general satisfaction; may be now taken for granted that the appointment of Dr. Stanley was an error arising from the peculiar relations in which he had long stood towards the Church and not from any settled design to inundate the Church with a series of friends of the "Essays and Reviews." The presentation of the Oxford declaration to the Archbishop of York, signed by more than 11,000 clergymen, and the pastoral letter to the Archbishop of York, are all historical events that will have a marked influence on the future history of the Church. According to the northern Archbishop, by the decision of the Judicial Committee ought to be regarded not as a judgment on the merits of a miscarriage of justice, as gross and palpable as that which occurred in the case of the Confederate ship, the Alexandra. In the Court of Chancery struck out of the charges those passages in the incriminated essays which were charges intelligible. Had the prosecutors appealed against these decisions, the Court would have felt itself at liberty to go over the whole Essays, and to pronounce what was heretical and what was not. Unfortunately, this was not done, and when the cases came before them, they, the judges, were unable to make any meaning out of all. At the same time, they felt themselves prohibited from looking into a case in the context that might have made the passages clear, and so the passages that had been condemned as heresy escaped censure as nonsense, just as a murderer is acquitted in a criminal court on the plea of madness. But even on the narrow ground that took for its decision, he, in common with the Archbishop of Canterbury, was enough to condemn the authors on the two grounds that the Scriptures are not the Word of God, and that the Church does not teach eternity of remembered that the University of Oxford has for several years past refused to give an endowment for the Regius Professorship of Greek, on the ground of the unsound theological opinions charged against the present holder of the office, the Rev. J. Jowett. Last year a compromise was attempted, by which the endowment was to be granted on the express condition that the University did not thereby commit itself to any opinion of the Professor's writings. But that, too, was defeated by a considerable majority of the members. Thereupon the Lord Chancellor took up the question, and introduced a bill into the House of Lords, the object of which was to endow the chair by attaching a canonry to it. The measure was received with general favour so far as the object of the bill was concerned; but doubts were expressed how far it would be wise to take the endowment from the source provided, which would have the double effect of diminishing the number of prizes to working clergymen and narrowing for the future the chance of a Greek professor to ordained clergymen. The weight of these objections grew as they were considered; and at last so far prevailed, that the House of Lords, though with some reluctance, threw out the bill. So Mr. Jowett's emoluments are once more thrown back on the University.

Cardinal Wiseman has addressed a pastoral to his flock; it is difficult to say for what purpose, unless it be to enjoy the luxury of abusing the Church of England. The reception which the aristocracy and some of our Church dignitaries gave to Garibaldi has proved too much for him. It is with shame and pain he sees the bishops of even a heretical Church fraternising with an infidel; an atheist who, if we are to believe the Cardinal, worships goddesses of reason. Unfortunately for his Eminence, the accuracy of his quotations from Garibaldi's address, on which he founds this charge, is questioned; and it will be for him to vindicate his honesty. It is also, he thinks, a great proof of weakness in the Church of England that she has not silenced rationalist clergymen and sceptical philosophers; and he undoubtedly we admit the Cardinal's Church would have dealt in quite other methods with the impugnors of her doctrines.

Evangelical Alliance.

EIGHTEENTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE will this year be held in Edinburgh. The meetings will commence on Tuesday, July 5, and extend to the following Friday. The Council will assemble, probably to breakfast, on the morning of Tuesday for the transaction of business and in the evening of the same day there will be a meeting for the general reception of the members of the Conference. During the meetings papers will be read and addresses be delivered by the Rev. Dr. M'Cosh on the Present Phases of Infidelity, by the Rev. Dr. Blackwood, the Hon. and Rev. B. Noel, the Rev. W. Arthur, and others, from different parts of Great Britain and Ireland. The Rev. Dr. Duff is expected to speak on the Mission Field of India. Foreign brethren will also be present. Professor St. Hilaire, of the University of Paris, will read a paper on the State of Religion in France. The Rev. Dr. Beet, and probably also Dr. Capadose, will speak on the religious condition of Holland. Italy will be represented by the Rev. Mr. Meille, of Turin, Rev. Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn, and probably by others. And the Rev. Professor Messner, of Berlin, will present a written statement on Germany. Other arrangements are in progress, and in our next number we hope to give the completed programme of the proceedings. In the meantime the Committee express their belief that the approaching Conference will be one of great interest, both from the city in which it will be held and from the subjects which will be discussed, and the parties by whom it will be attended.

It is hoped that a numerous attendance of the members and friends of the Alliance will be secured. The friends in Edinburgh have undertaken the arrangements devolving upon them with great cordiality and earnestness, and are preparing to receive with Christian hospitality as many as may be able to visit them. Members proposing to be present are requested to communicate with Charles Philip Gibson, Esq., 54, Northumberland-street, Edinburgh, who is acting as Secretary to the Committee in that city, or with the Secretaries of the Alliance in London.

JAMES DAVIS, Secretary.

HERMANN SCHMETTAU, Foreign Secretary.

FINALITY AND PROGRESS.

CREATION is so far complete. Confining our view to this earthly ball, we know pretty well the materials and the forces to which we are restricted; and to these no ingenuity can make the smallest addition. You may safely offer as a prize a million of money to the man who shall invent a new element, or who shall add a new kind of force to the powers already working in nature.

Yet, limited as are the materials and agencies with which the Creator has furnished our globe, the state of things is not stereotyped. On the one hand, we are continually making new discoveries. "Replenish the earth and subdue it," is the Maker's behest: search it and sift it and turn it all to account: and it is not by waiting windfalls from the sky, but by exploring the objects under foot, that you expect to enrich others and yourself. You do not set out a dish overnight, and then look in the morning to see if there has dropped in from the clouds a new gem or new metal; but you search the surface, or dig beneath it, if haply you may find what others have overlooked; or you take the substances ready to your hand and mix them into new combinations; by means of those scientific stratagems called experiments you try to extort the whole secret of their power and capability. And just as he was a clever man who took up a lump of clay and turned it into silvery-looking cups and lamps and statues—just as he was a lucky man who first set fire to a black rock and taught our northern hemisphere to warm itself by letting out the heat locked up in the stony strata under foot—so we shall be still more indebted to the coming man who turns the ocean into fuel, and who, catching the lightning which has already superseded the courier and the carrier pigeon, makes it a domestic in our houses and an apprentice in our factories—superseding toil and drudgery, and giving to daily life a little more of Sabbath. In other words, although as regards its constituent elements and combining forces the world is limited, although to the matter of the globe we cannot add a single atom nor to its moving power a single impulse,* there is no perceptible limit to man's material progress—no limit to the new colours with which the loom may learn to glow—to the new contrivances by which labour may be saved, and the tear and wear of the worker diminished—no limit to the comforts by which human welfare may be increased, and the peasant of one generation find himself in advance of the position vacated by the peer or the prince of an age preceding.

Just as the world is limited, so is the Word of God. The volume of the Book is finished, and we expect no addition to its sayings. No more psalms of David, no new proverbs of Solomon, no additional visions of Isaiah, need be looked for; and even of the words which the Lord Jesus spake we must accept as sufficient, and with all thankfulness, the precious fragments which evangelists have preserved. For the present the oracle is final, and whosoever cries, "Lo here" or "Lo there," pretending to some new revelation, we go not after him.

But although Revelation is complete, we trust that religion will advance. In other words, as the years move on, under the guidance of God's providence and the leading of His Spirit, we trust that the Bible will be better and still better understood, and that practical piety will become a presence in our world more lovely, more majestic, and more potential, than it ever yet has been.

To the Bible we cannot add a new text any more than we can add to the globe a new ounce of matter ; but just as it is said to the mineralogist, Search the soil—search the surface, and search the rocks beneath—so it is said to the student, Search the Scriptures ; search the original so as to get the very words, and search the words so as to get their very sense. And in this way it is wonderful how much has of late been done ; and just as the galvanic pile gave Davy a new instrument of analysis—just as the prismatic spectrum put a new power for the same purpose into the hand of Bunsen, so the doctrine of the Greek article and other generalizations have given the grammarian a new security in rendering the New Testament, and for subsequent versions promise a symmetry and precision which will place the Englishman almost abreast of the Hellenistic inhabitant of Palestine. And every sentence restored to its right significance, every obscurity cleared up, every controverted meaning vindicated and henceforward placed above discussion, is so much pure gain. It is not a new text, but it answers the same purpose. It is not a new text, any more than rubidium is a new metal ; for people had been treading on it, and handling it, and even swallowing it, all unconscious, till the other day, when the chemist put his finger on it and held it up to view.

The interpretation of the sacred text is progressive ; so also is the growth of theological truth or Christian doctrine. A truth may be so acknowledged that it might as well be ignored ; and therefore a great service is rendered when the man is raised up who gives to it due force and emphasis. "By grace are ye saved : not of yourselves ; it is the gift of God." Such had always been the teaching of Christ, and such had always been the acknowledgment of the Church ; but it was often uttered in undertones, or thrown in as a mere parenthesis or saving clause : till the Bishop of Hippo put it into the forefront of his system, and when asked, "What is the topstone of the Christian system?" as they read the inscription, men shouted "Grace, grace" unto it. "The just by faith shall live," had been the testimony from the times of Abraham and Micah and Paul ; but touched very lightly or omitted altogether in the teaching of friars, it was only the ear sharpened by spiritual anguish which caught its faint cadence ; but taken up and realised, it proved life from the dead, and in trumpet tones which brought down a third part of the mystical cloud was shouted back again, "The just shall live by faith"—the truth which the builders despised made the keystone of the arch—the central prop of the building—the "article of a standing or falling Church." And what trumpets are yet to sound—what neglected truths are yet to be taken up and made each the key-note of a glorious reformation—in other words, what Augustines and Anselms, what Luthers and Calvins, are yet to evolve in the Church of the future, it were idle to speculate ; but even if there should at last arise the speaker of that word which shall conciliate all truths—the singer of that strain which shall bring into harmony all schools—we do not that the potent word shall be one which ourselves have often uttered, the tune one which we ourselves have often hummed, but in the absence of God's quickening spirit that word has hitherto wrought no great wonder—with no archangel to sound it rightly, that trump has wrought no resurrection.

As the ages advance the sacred text and the Christian system are better understood ; and we think we may add, practical religion or actual piety improved. Human nature is the same as it has ever been, and to make devout and holy a heart desperately wicked needs grace as omnipotent as ever. But as a result of Christianity better understood and more honestly applied, you would expect the individual Christian nowadays to be a completer character than at periods more remote, and you would expect that the Christian influence would be on the surrounding mass more salutary. We think they are. We believe that the least within the Christian pension is not only better off than John the Baptist, but is actually in some respect or other a fairer, a finer character. You may possibly exclaim, "What is all modern piety but a poor mediocrity? and will the tame and respectable religion of the present day for a moment compare with the faith of Abraham, the rapture of David, the courage of Daniel, the abnegation of the Baptist?" But that is hardly the question. You will scarcely affirm that David is an ordinary type of Old Testament devotion, or Abraham a fair average of Old Testament faith: whilst on the other hand, we do affirm that in a comparison of outstanding virtues and conspicuous characters the Christian martyrology far exceeds the Hebrew cloud of witnesses. And we add this more, that if, with the lessons which Christ has taught you, and at the level to which Christ has raised you, could you by any means find alongside of you, and brought down as your actual contemporaries, some of those ancient worthies, notwithstanding all their excellence, you would find it hard to bear their faults. With a Christian standard before you, and a Christian atmosphere around, it would need every redeeming quality to reconcile you to Abraham with his slaves and Solomon with his numerous wives, to Jacob with his sharp practice and David with his blood-stained hands: even as they in their turn would wonder at the catholicity which calls no man common or unclean, at the beneficence which prompts persons not professional to instruct the ignorant and preach the Gospel to the poor.

And no doubt personal religion is destined still farther to improve. Reverting to our original comparison, although the globe has grown no larger through all these thousand years; and although within the historic period no new ingredient has been added to its composition, no new creature to its inhabitants—it is now a far wealthier world than it ever was, and each of its denizens is a richer and a mightier man; for its hidden resources have been brought to light, and its far-sundered products have been brought together. So with actual religion. During these eighteen centuries the Bible has grown no bulkier, no addition has been made to the records of Revelation; and yet it would be tantamount to saying that the Church has slumbered all this interval, or that the Holy Spirit has never come, if we hinted that there are no advantages now for living godly and righteous in the world which have not existed all along—no elements of Christian excellence which ought not now to be more attainable and commonplace than in days gone by. And if, as Sismondi says, "Religion be the repository of all the most precious things which the human race possesses, and if there be no element in human progress which ought not there to find a place," we may hope that a Christianity shall yet evolve so lovely and so stately, so upright and so genial, in such sweet fellowship with heaven, and so frank and friendly towards its brother men, that, in view of its manifold acquirements and vigorous maturity, the former days shall not be mentioned, nor come into mind; or, if mentioned at all, shall be leniently mentioned, and with a fond sort of forgiveness, as the days when we "spake as a child, when we thought as a child."

There is a certain analogy between the Word of God and His works. Each in its own province is a true expression of himself. "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." The world is God's utterance. He said it, and it was. He has never since unsaid it, and therefore it still exists. Nay more; the truest charm, the chiefest interest of the world, is the life divine which still lingers in it—those dynamic movements and all forces which, as in vegetation and animal existence, proclaim the present God; so unlovely as a dead, lumpy world would be, we all rejoice when His quickening spirit comes forth and renews the face of the earth; and amid the balm and sunshine, the glad music and active motion, we find no difficulty in recognising the present

But in a sense peculiar and pre-eminent the Scriptures contain the Word of God—His deepest thought to us ward—His fullest manifestation. But fixed and final as that Word, we need have no feeling as if it were too strait for us, too narrow. Ours a little world, but a large Bible. "I have seen an end of all perfection, but thy commandment is exceeding broad." We may be glad to try new worlds, and transfer the experiment of existence to other spheres, but we neither hope nor desire to meet elsewhere any friend more attractive than that Saviour to whom this blessed Book has introduced us, nor do we expect through eternity to have any occupation for our thoughts more delightful than the contemplation of those perfections of which we have here received prelusive glimpses.

Besides, it has the boundlessness of life, and life is ever new. The living God is here. Of this tree, whose varying fruit is new every month, and whose leaf is for medicine—of this tree of life God's Spirit is the vital sap: its leaf never fades, its branches are never bare. It is our minds that wither; there is no autumn or winter to the tree. It is our minds that wither: if they were always fresh, here is a landscape which would never look desolate, a Bible which would be always in blossom, a chosen resort where the voice of the Comforter should be heard all the year.

THE MAN CALVIN.

IN this, the last of these articles, we must try to get a little nearer Calvin than we have hitherto done—to look into his face—to see him among his friends—to realise the image and personality of the man. We have been casting side-glances on him from various points of view, surveying him as Reformer and as theologian, but the conception formed by readers of the living Calvin has probably been vague. We shall do our best, therefore, in concluding our task, to bring together a few of those traits, incidents, recorded facts, relating to Calvin, which may be deemed specially characteristic, in the hope that something like a portrait will arrange itself on the canvas.

The first question which occurs to us in this connexion is whether there is any pictorial representation extant of Calvin. The reply to be rendered is not satisfactory. There is no statue, bust, or adequate portrait of him in existence. No French or Swiss artist has done for him what Kranach did for Luther, and many a student of the history of the time, as he looks on Kranach's Luther—on that "rude, plebeian face, with its huge, craglike brows and bones, the emblem of rugged energy," with its eyes full of earnestness and faith and valour, and its "unnamed melancholy, the element of all gentle and fine affections"—will wish that the same hand had traced the features of John Calvin. The common portraits of him, which one finds in ideal groups of Reformers and the like, are entirely worthless. The long, formal, conventional face they present to us, like that of a well-trained Academy model doing the sublime, cannot be associated for a moment with the man. Calvin was nothing like that, and if we want to have any notion how he looked, we must begin by clearing all such rubbish out of our heads. Nor are we absolutely without materials of a pictorial kind for realising his features and expression. Bungener prefixes to his book on Calvin the facsimile of a woodcut which is known to have been produced during his lifetime, and which bears its own evidence of being authentic. It is no flattering likeness. On the contrary, there is in it not a little which suggests caricature, and we can fancy it struck off in Geneva, at the time when Calvin's unpopularity was at its height, by some Libert, Hogarth, Gilray, or Cruikshank, who intended the glaring intensity of eye and exaggerated eagerness of open mouth and long, hanging upper lip, to raise a laugh at the expense of the Reformer. But a successful caricature has always enough truth in it to be a telling likeness, and this face is too remarkable not to have been taken from a living original. The expression corresponds, also, in essential respects, with what we know of Calvin from his works and from the narrative of his life. It is the face of a man of immense intellectual power, for the forehead is high and advanced, the head round, full, and packed close with brain, the eye radiant with genius; but it is the face, also, and perhaps still more, of a man of action, for there is in it little of the reflective or meditative element, and the lines and bones of brow, nose, and mouth indicate iron strength of character, while the glow, or rather the flash, of intense energy in the eye is such as we find in those of great generals, a Caesar, a Cromwell, a Napoleon, rather than in those of thinkers. It is a curious fact that the expression of eye found in the best portraits of Cromwell, as in that miniature by Cooper prefixed to Mr. Carlyle's edition of his Letters and Speeches, has a close resemblance to Calvin's, only that the latter is the more intense and wonderful of the two. On the whole, this face conveys the idea of an impetuous, inscible, vivid nature—of a creature all soul, all ethereal fiery principle—of thought instinct with passionate emotion—of intense conviction, piercing insight, dauntless, deathless courage. It is the portrait of a spirit.

Calvin, as we have seen, was one of those men who turn by natural bias from the delights and allurements of sense. We saw him as a student in Paris, hanging pallid over the classic page or the sacred oracle, while the night-watches stole on, and the ray of morning fell upon his waning lamp. Already the keen mental flame was beginning to burn too vehemently for the tabernacle of clay, and on the slender form and marble cheek of the student were inscribed the tokens of incipient disease. Constitutionally timid and retiring, the force of his will overcame these feelings, and when he passed from the state of the natural man into the state of the spiritual man, and from the ranks of Rome into those of the Reformation, the studious recluse had become a man of heroic daring. Henceforward he feared nothing but Almighty God.

From that time the theory of his life was simple yet very sublime. The Christian, he tells us in his books, is to offer himself up a living sacrifice to God in Christ; and what made his own life original and wonderful was, that it was a veritable translation of this theory into fact. We desire to speak not with the looseness of rhetoric, but with the strictness of science. Of all men since the Apostle Paul, Calvin realises to our mind most accurately the idea of one offering himself up, his life long, unto God—a man whose energies, mental and physical, were burnt away in work for God—a man who made no reservation, who asked no terms, who deliberately laid intellect, emotion, will, everything, on the altar, that they might be consumed of altar flame. The martyr takes his place at the stake, and is burnt to ashes in an hour. Extend the process through thirty years; let the fire be ardour of pauseless zeal; let the life-energies be worn away in that slow, intense, unintermittent flame—shall we pronounce the sacrifice less real? Such a sacrifice was the life of Calvin. It took a quarter of a century to consume the oblation, but the sacrifice was offered up as really as if the sacred fire had done its work in an hour. Reflect for one moment on the kind of sacrifice which the lives of many men are—on the multitudes whose energies are wasted, whose lives are shortened, in the service of Belial or of Mammon—and then say whether this life of Calvin's was not glorious.

When we inquire into the manner of this life—when we ask how Calvin conducted himself from day to day in Geneva—we are struck with astonishment by the spectacle of his activity. It seems incredible; we know not how to reconcile it with ordinary conceptions of humanity. To produce the "Institutes of the Christian Religion" would have been a magnificent achievement for a life; but for how little does it stand in the life of Calvin! He wrote commentaries upon every book of Scripture with the exception—what a wise, what an instructive exception!—of the Apocalypse. And such commentaries! The exegetical writings of that age which are still of supreme value, acknowledged friend and foe to be broad in their grasp of scriptural meaning, candid in interpretation, masterly in arrangement. Calvin engaged in every important controversy of his time, composed a multitude of treatises and tracts, attended several world-famous conferences of divines, delivered lectures in divinity or sermons, to the number of eight every week, was assiduous in pastoral visiting, and dispensed hospitality to a constant succession of visitors attracted by his fame to Geneva. He was consulted by the authorities of the town in every political affair of importance; he assisted in the improvement of the legal code; he patronised letters, established printing presses, secured the opening of shops for the sale of books, and made Geneva "the literary metropolis, the great book mart of Europe." He conducted a correspondence in which well-weighed and most influential advice was given touching the affairs of all Reformed Churches, from Zurich to Edinburgh, from London to Warsaw—a correspondence which instructed kings and ministers in their duty, which moulded creeds and ecclesiastical constitutions, and affected the whole course of European civilisation. This is what the life of a man can be, when he offers himself up a living sacrifice to God. If anything could add to the impressiveness of the spectacle, it would be the humility with which Calvin regarded his own efforts. He did not, indeed, affect to be ignorant that God had endowed him with extraordinary powers, or that he deserved well of his generation. Towards man, when attacked and reviled, he used the language of just self-assertion, language similar to that of the Apostle Paul. But before God he was ever lowly, and he rebuked himself for his meagre achievements. As his life drew towards its close, he constantly spoke of his idleness—his idleness; he could not work as he wished, he could not maintain his activity as he felt he ought. He who, as Beza tells us, "lived almost without sleep," who subdued his body by frugality and fasting that his soul might be always at work, who was the very hermit of action! Is it not touching? That "idleness" was the utter failure of the physical energies, the instinctive cry of flesh and blood for rest, the relaxing of the arm that could no longer bear the sword, though the soul was still keen for conflict. "Not a May game," we may well exclaim in the words of an eloquent writer, "was this man's life; but a battle and a march, a warfare with principalities and powers. No idle promenade through fragrant orange-groves and green flowery spaces, waited on by the choral Muses and the rosy Hours;" but a "stern pilgrimage through burning sandy solitudes, through regions of thick-ribbed ice. He walks among men; loves men, with inexpressible soft pity—as they cannot love him; but his soul dwells in solitude, in the uttermost parts of creation. In green oases by the palm-tree wells he rests a space; but anon he has to journey forward, escorted by the Terrors and the Splendours, the Archdemons and Archangels. All heaven, all pandemonium, are his escort. The stars keen glancing from the Immensities, send tidings to him; the graves with their dead from the Eternities. Deep calls for him unto deep."

Green oases by the palm-tree wells: these there were even in the life of Calvin. His marriage with Idelette de Bures was a source to him of real happiness so long as his wife lived. There was, indeed, little of romance either in the commencement or continuance of their affections—too little we are constrained to say. A thoroughly genial, absorbing, heart-shaking affection for a woman worthy of such devotion might have had a warming and softening effect upon Calvin, and would not have taken him away from heaven while bringing him nearer to earth. The language of Calvin, however, on the subject of marriage, though not such as finds favour with modern novelists, does not fail in good sense or in masculine truth of feeling. "I am none of those name lovers," he wrote, "who embrace also the vices of those they are in love with, when they are smitten at first sight with a fine figure. The beauty that lures me in a wife is that she is chaste, not too nice or fastidious, economical, silent, and that there is hope she will be interested about my health." He would wed for worth, not for interest. A damsel of rank and fortune was proposed to him, but he sent for Idelette de Bures, "who," he says, "if she answers her repute, will bring a dowry large enough without any money at all." His marriage took place in 1540, and for nine years he found in his wife all he had hoped for. They had one child, a son, who died in infancy. "The Lord," wrote Calvin, "has indeed inflicted a grievous and a bitter wound in the death of our little son," words which have a deep pathos when coming from a man who spoke so seldom of his own trials or sufferings. His letters to Viret and Farel on the occasion of his wife's death are touching from the sincerity of his grief and the truehearted emphasis with which he bears testimony to her character. "Truly," he says, "mine is no common source of grief. I have been bereaved of the best companion of my life—one who, had it been so ordered, would not only have been the willing sharer of my indigence, but even of my death." The closing scene is thus described by the same pen: "I, having spoken a few words about the love of Christ, the peace of eternal life, concerning our married life, and her departure, engaged in prayer. In full possession of her mind, she both heard the prayer, and attended to

Before eight she expired, so calmly, that those present could scarcely distinguish between her life and her death. . . . May the Lord Jesus support me under this every affliction, which would certainly have overcome me, had not He, who raises up the prostrate, strengthens the weak, and refreshes the weary, stretched forth His hand from heaven to me." Calvin did not wear his heart upon his sleeve; he was not in the way of seeking relief in lyrical outpourings; but we see not how any one could fail to recognise in these words the accents of true affection. If not a demonstrative lover, he was a just and considerate husband, which a majority of householders would probably think better. A touching instance of his considerateness occurred in the death-chamber of Idelette. She had one or two children by her first husband, and, when she felt herself dying, was unable to make any provision for them. "As she had made no allusion to her children," says Calvin, "I, fearing that, trained by modesty, she might be feeling an anxiety concerning them, which would cause her greater suffering than the disease itself, declared in the presence of her brethren that I should henceforth care for them as if they were my own. She replied, 'I have already committed them to the Lord.' When I replied, that that was not to hinder me from doing my duty, she immediately answered, 'If the Lord will all care for them, I know they will be commended to you.' Consolations of a spiritual kind were good; faith in a heavenly guardianship was excellent; but Calvin knew that the fond heart, in that sad hour, would find comfort in the definite fact of promise and engagement on his part. There is a thoughtful delicacy in such kindness, together with a penetrating accuracy of insight into what is right, which attest a very noble character.

In no relation of life does Calvin appear more favourably than in his relations with his friends. Amid the press of his occupations he never falls out of connexion or sympathy with a troop of godly men, who honour, love, and trust him. He has a word of kind sympathy for all their joys and all their sorrows. He negotiates about a wife for Viret, interesting himself, heart and soul, in the business ; he recommend maid-servant to Farel ; he tells M. de Fallais, whom he congratulates on the birth of a son, that he would like to come to him "for at least a half of a day, to laugh with you, while we wait for a smile from the little infant ;" his "heart is like to break when he thinks of the death of Bucer. It is absurd to talk of one who writes thus as if he had been morose, hard, or unsympathetic. Beza expressly declares that "the intercourse of social life no one showed more suavely ;" a statement which settles the question, for Beza wrote for men who had known Calvin for a quarter of a century, and known him in the close and constant intercourse of a small town in Geneva. Calvin was not austere and cold ; his feelings, though lying deep, were strong. The characteristic of his emotional nature was constancy. And if, as he went on, as he bore up in the fearful conflict against Rome on the one hand and licentiousness on the other, his heart by many blows was brought into a somewhat steely temper, is it not fair to remember that the softer graces of character spring under the sunlight of felicity and the dew of peace, not on the trampled battle field.

If more evidence were required to refute the notion that Calvin was harsh and narrow, it would be found in the way he comported himself to Luther on the one hand, and Melancthon on the other. His character was beyond question of a markedly different type from that of either of these men ; he had not the animal spirits or large capacities of physical enjoyment of Luther, while the yielding nature of Melancthon was to his what the poplar, bending in every breeze, is to the gnarled and knotted oak. Yet his feeling towards Luther was that of reverent admiration and profound sympathy. He addressed the German Reformer as the "most renowned minister of Christ" and his own "ever-venerated father." On hearing that Luther while expressing the hope that he (Calvin) would some day render him justice, added that something might meanwhile well be borne "from so excellent a capacity," he exclaimed, "If such moderation does not break us, verily we are rocks ; as for me I own that I am broken." No cold-hearted or self-centred man could have said this. "Consider," he once remarked, "what kind of man Luther is ; even if he were to call me a devil, I would not cease to honour him." But it seems still more astonishing, and is still more opposed to ordinary conceptions of Calvin, that he should have found his dearest friend in Melancthon. It is Philip Melancthon whom he "loves and esteems beyond all others." Their friendship, he declares, "ought to remain for ever sacred and inviolable." He is amazed that differences should arise between them. "Surely," he writes, "it is indicative of a marvellous and monstrous insensibility, that we so readily set at naught that sacred unanimity, in which we ought to be bringing back into the world the angels of heaven." Were there no tones of poetry in the nature of the man who said that ? In 1560, when one of the friends was taken to his rest and the other longed inexpressibly to follow him, Calvin, the survivor, wrote thus : "O, Philip Melancthon, for I appeal to thee who art now living in the bosom of God, where thou waitest for us till we be gathered together with thee to a holy rest ! A hundred times hast thou said, when, wearied with labour and oppressed with sadness, thou didst lay thyself familiarly on my breast, 'Would that I could die on this breast !'" Melancthon, the gentlest of all the Reformers, loved to pillow his head on the breast of Calvin. Let that be remembered and we ask no more.

That there are harsh words in the letters of Calvin, that harsh deeds are recorded of him in his life, no one can deny. But who shall convict him of having been fierce in his own quarrel ? Who can impute to him a scorching expression—and ever words could be said to burn, they are the words of Calvin—used in avenging private wrongs ? He was vehement for the truth ; he was unmeasured his fury against those who set themselves against the Lord. In this vehemence he was to blame—like the disciples, he would call down fire from heaven to smite the gainsayers. Such was not Christ's method. But let us not go with the throng of superficial persons who confound between personal vindictiveness and misdirected zeal. As well say that David, the friend of Jonathan, had no tenderness in his nature because he knew not how to spare the Philistines.

It was not his work as a pastor—in that he doubtless found relief—nor his work as a commentator—that was congenial to him and afforded play to his noblest faculties—which bore hardest on Calvin. It was his incessant life and death struggle to maintain the discipline of the Church against the Libertines. Of his other labours he hardly breathes a complaint; but when he refers to the Libertines we hear of "cares which torture" him, of contests by which he is "not so much occupied as quite wasted." This man, whose writings exhibit throughout an intellectual elevation and comprehensiveness unsurpassed, and whose letters to kings, ministers, and Churches are calm, cosmopolitan, statesmanlike, might have been seen in the midst of an infuriated mob, the swords flashing round him, as he told the people, stayed and quelled by his eye, "if they designed to shed blood, to begin with him." They might banish him; they might slay him; they might keep him in a state of perpetual torture by their persecutions: but they would never extort from him his consent that the Church of God in Geneva should go down in a flood of licentiousness. A man who could thus look death in the face, and who held himself "truly rich," because "abundantly satisfied" without a foot of land or money enough in the world to buy an acre, and who could call neither the table at which he ate, nor the bed on which he slept, his own, was not to be conquered.

The lesson of Calvin's life may be comprised in a single word—a word which, in its teeming significance, excludes comment, but which indicates the great want of these last times—godliness. Than John Calvin we know not any man more godly who has appeared in Europe since the Apostolic age.

P. B.

GERMAN SWITZERLAND.

BY AN EYE-WITNESS.

THE religious state of German Switzerland is instructive alike to a German and an Englishman. The one may see what Germany was, the other what England will be, if Rationalism should unhappily be taken up into our system and poison the springs of our spiritual life. In Germany, the disease may be said to have run its course; and though the patient is hardly yet convalescent, the crisis is nevertheless past, the reaction has already begun, and the result of a conflict between the school of faith and the school of unbelief, which has lasted now exactly a century, is no longer doubtful. In England, on the other hand, the disease is in its first stage: it has already affected our seats of learning. In the case of Dr. Davidson, among the Independents, and Bishop Colenso and the authors of the "Essays and Reviews" among the Episcopalians, it has shown itself in a most unmistakeable way. But the great majority of the ministers of all denominations are as yet untainted. Neology is still a new thing with us. May it never invade our pulpits, and become naturalised by our English firesides! As yet it has been only spoken in the closet. May it never be proclaimed on the housetop! Switzerland, on the other hand, is feeling now the full effect of that Rationalism which has done its worst in Germany, and not yet begun to spread in England. Beside the sickbed of the eldest of the Reformed Churches, the Church of Zurich, England and Germany may rejoice with trembling—the one may tremble for what she may have to endure, and the other rejoice for what she has lived through.

There is another reason why the study of Rationalism in German Switzerland is particularly interesting to us at home. It teaches us that the best institution will not keep out error, when the spirit of those who founded them is no longer there. In no Church is the original machinery more elaborate and the precautions more complete for maintaining the Church in its purity. If oaths at ordination, or courts of appeal after; if the voice of the congregation on the one hand, or of the State on the other—could keep pastors true to their obligations, and maintain succession of faithful men, the Churches of German Switzerland would not be lying as they now are, in the pit of Rationalism, as in a Slough of Despond. It is a mistake to suppose that want of organization has led to this state of anarchy and indifference. It is true that when there was no king in Israel every man did that which was right in his own eyes, and so the Republican and Democratic constitution of the State Churches of Switzerland may be reproached as the cause of their present helpless condition, lapped in error and steeped in the deep slumber of unbelief. If the evil lies deeper than any mere difference between the constitution of the National Churches of England and Switzerland, or even of Germany and Switzerland. In a National Church, whether Episcopal or Presbyterian, constituted as the Swiss Churches were, in alliance with a democratic State, must have fallen into the same state. We know no greater safeguard to purity of doctrine enjoyed by our National Churches at home than those provided by the fathers of the Swiss Reformation. Let any one who is in doubt on this matter read either of the two Helvetic Confessions, or the body of ecclesiastical laws and regulations which are still, in a great measure, binding on the Church of Zurich, and he will see that there was no want of provision against perilous times on the part of such men as Bullinger, Bucer, and others, but that the error has crept in through the failure of the very bulwark which they had erected against it. The Church of Zurich is distinctively a National Church. For better or worse, therefore, it must reflect the opinions of the community out of which it springs. Its charter and constitution are described in the following words which we quote from the Code of Ecclesiastical Laws, corresponding to our Book of Canons:—

The National Church of Zurich, as recognised by the State, is the community of all the inhabitants of the canton who profess the Christian religion according to the form of the Evangelical Reformed Faith. All the members of this Church enjoy the same religious rights from the time of their confirmation, under the limitations provided by law. Whoever shall formally declare his dissent from the same shall forfeit his right to sit or take part in Church assemblies, or to record his vote for any Church order or office, without any prejudice, however, to his other civil rights. The Church is, as to its inner being and work, independent of the State, but in all its external relations it is dependent upon and under the protection of the State. The Church provides for the well-being of the State, according to the means at its disposal. The State, on the other hand, assures to her and to her ministers protection and maintenance. Under the superintendence of the State, the Church makes provision for a supply of fit and able ministers, who shall diligently apply themselves to the furtherance of Christian doctrine and the maintaining of Church discipline. The State shall further provide suitable places for education and worship, and for an adequate salary to all who have to discharge spiritual functions.

That the Church of Zurich has shared the fortunes of the State of Zurich is no more than might be expected. In this it would not differ from any other National Church. But it laboured under this additional disadvantage, that as in a democracy everything is done by the people, as well as for the people, the direction of Church affairs fell into the hands of those who are the least qualified to perceive the evil, or to provide against it. When a National Church under a monarchy becomes worldly and subservient to the powers that be, the people have the remedy in their own hands. Dissent offers itself as the readiest outlet for the expression of popular discontent. But in a canton like Zurich no man will declare himself a dissenter from the National Church, however corrupt he may feel it to be, if he can possibly avoid doing so. He will make any compromise with his conscience rather than disfranchise himself from some of his most cherished political rights—the right of a voice in the election of his parish minister—the right of electing the deputies for the Church Synod and other Church rights which, as a citizen, he is entitled to. Hence it is that among a most irreligious community the rite of confirmation is carefully observed and insisted on by all young people. In Zurich it is a civil almost as much as a religious ceremony. It admits the youth into the rights and privileges of full citizenship—it corresponds to the putting on of the toga virilis by a young Roman before the prætor in the Forum. In Zurich there is a shrinking among the best Christians from the very thought of Dissent, which at first seems unintelligible to an Englishman fresh from the traditions of his own country. It takes him some time to learn that this arises, not from any feeling about rending the seamless robe of Christ, or other such scruples that once grieved the heart of Dissenters, when Dissent was young among ourselves. With a true-born Zuricher, Dissent is a kind of political disfranchisement, which no one submits to willingly who can escape it. The result is that a Church which is, in the full sense of the word, the Church of the people runs the danger not only of becoming unspiritual and unorthodox with the people, but also of becoming so to such an extent as to lose all power of recovering itself.

That this is the case with the Church of Zurich, and to a greater or less extent with the other Churches of German Switzerland, we are most reluctantly obliged to testify. Since the last revolution in 1830, when the power passed into the hands of the people, and Zurich became a democracy, on the purest principles of Manhood Suffrage, the Church has not only been democratised, but it has become, which is worse, the mere creature of the State. Instead of a union of Church and State, the State (i.e., the people by their deputies in Great Council) has become all in all, and the Church has sunk into a mere department of the State, like the educational or the army department, whose functionaries are the nominees of the people, and paid, like any other functionaries, out of the public chest. In such a state of things, the godly, who are naturally the minority in all communities, are outvoted in the election of pastors, and those who never even go to church carry their Rationalist nominee, in the teeth of the protests and laments of those faithful but irresolute few who neither care to conform nor yet dare to dissent from the established order of things.

Into a Church so constituted German infidelity has entered and worked greater demoralisation than was possible either in England or in Germany. In an aristocratical or a monarchical community the rulers and the people act as a check upon each other. At one time, as in Germany at present, rulers are as a bridle to a people mad with visions of a Pantheistic democracy. At another time, as with us during last century, the people, by falling into Dissent, rebuke the irreligion of their rulers, who degrade the Church into a mere engine of State. But in Switzerland, for want of some check in the descent to evil, coming either from above or from beneath, the whole power of the State is thrown into the scale of the prevailing error of the day. Things have got into this vicious circle in Zurich and many other cantons of German Switzerland, that the pastors preach negative theology, if not positive error, and the people, who now love to have it so, elect only pastors of this school; and so the evil appears likely to perpetuate itself, if it does not end, as it is more likely to do, in the utter abnegation of all religion and the rejection with it of empty and unreal forms.

But some one will say, Are there not tests and confessions which these Rationalist preachers are compelled to subscribe, and may not their apostasy from the faith of the Reformers thus be brought to the light and exposed? Would that it were so. It was so once, but now the tests are disused and the confession laid with Zwinglius's Greek Testament, as antiquities, on an upper shelf of the pul library. Ever since the Revolution of 1798, the Helvetic Confession has been disused as a test of orthodoxy in the Zurich Church. As a document binding on the conscience of preachers and pastors, it was dying all last century; at last, it was taken down from the shelf, and a shorter and more general test adopted in its stead. Even this was too precise for the encroaching latitudinarianism of this century, and the declaration now in use is of the vaguest and most elastic kind, which almost any man may sign who is not too far gone to believe that there is such a book as the Bible and such a being as God. The candidate for orders is required to profess his faith "in the Word of God, the Law as well as the Gospel, according to the principles of the Evangelical Reformed Church, and in conformity with the Scriptures of the Old and especially of the New Testament." Formerly the ordination oath was much more stringent and searching. The candidate for orders was asked, "You desire to proclaim, as a minister of the Word of God, the Gospel of Christ—Do you promise and vow that you will truly preach Jesus Christ as the Son of God and Redeemer of Mankind, and as the Author and Finisher of our Faith, according to the teaching of the Holy Scriptures, and in conformity with the doctrine of the Evangelical Reformed Church? You desire to feed the flock of God which He has purchased with His own blood—Do you promise and vow that in patience and self-denial you will feed the flock of Christ, and tender the salvation of souls, which He has purchased with His own blood? You desire to be able to present before the Lord a congregation that shall be holy and without blame before Him in love—Do you promise and vow that with watchfulness and prayer you will so follow holiness in your own conduct, that no one may reproach the name of Christ on account of your sins; but that rather the congregation of Christ may be edified by your irreproachable walk?" Instead of this searching and spiritual test, all that is now required of the candidate is a general declaration that he will order his life according to the Word of Truth, and bear witness to the doctrine of salvation in all places and at all seasons, by a walk and conversation without reproach.

So little is now required of the candidate for orders, that Mr. Wilson may set his theory of a National Church carried out in all its consequences by comparison of the actual state of the Church of Zurich with his ideal of the Church of England. According to Mr. Wilson—

It cannot concern a State to develop as part of its own machinery a system of relations founded on speculative truth. Speculative doctrines should be left to philosophical schools. A National Church must be concerned with the ethical development of its members, and the wrong of supposing it otherwise is participated by those of the clericalty who consider the Church of Christ to be founded as a society in the possession of an abstractedly true and supernaturally-communicated speculation concerning God rather than upon the manifestation of a Divine life in man.

This theory of a National Church, happily still only a theory with us at home, has been translated into fact, and carried out in the very letter in Zurich. There the clergy of the four principal Churches, with one striking exception, discuss theology as they would philosophy, in the style of a professor balancing the merits of the Stoic or Epicurean systems. This is their esoteric teaching, which only appears in the form of lectures in the Town-hall, or in disquisition in the class-rooms of the university. In the pulpit they confine themselves to the ethical development of the members of the National Church, with what success those will best say who have listened to the cold and thinly-attended discourses. The people take these preachers at their word and pay them generally the compliment of a very scanty attendance at their sermons. They know already what these preachers have to speak about, and as to that upon which these semi-Pantheists and anti-Supernaturalists do not dare to say out all the mind, it is either so unintelligible or so uninteresting, as to be practically innocuous to the uninitiated. The dry bones of Baur and Strauss are seldom dressed up with the flesh and blood hues of a romancer like Renan, and even when the poetical faculty is combined with the critical, the result is such as seldom attracts the common people.

Thus, partly through the unhappy supremacy of German Rationalism in the pulpits and chairs of Swiss theology, and partly from the unhappy subserviency of the Church to the State, ever since the influx of French ideas in 1798, the Churches of German Switzerland have sunk so low, and the hope of a return to orthodoxy appears so remote, that the minds of many are turned to the thought of a Free Church after the model of that of Geneva. It is certainly disappointing to contrast French with German Switzerland. In French Switzerland the way of recovery has been so far entered on, that not only has the Free Church established itself in the affections of a large body of the people, and overcome that prejudice against Dissent which is peculiar to Switzerland, but it has even put life into the dry bones of the old National Church. Contact with the truth and comparison between the results of the two schools of faith and unbelief have stirred up the dormant embers of life in the old National Church of Geneva. The Geneva of our days is no more the Geneva of the days of Haldane than the Scotland of our day is the Scotland of the earlier Moderates. But in Zurich the comparison between 1814 and 1864 suggests rather a declining than a reviving Church. Rationalism was then younger and more circumspect in its pulpit utterances. No one had then dared (as is unhappily not now an uncommon case) to say out from the pulpit that the Gospels were legendary narratives, the resurrection of Christ an idea projected into fact through the excitement of certain credulous women, and the conversion of St. Paul on the way to Damascus the effect of a sunstroke, like that which happened to Mahomet on one of his Syrian journeys. Or even had such impieties been uttered under the mask of a free handling of received truths, there was yet sufficient discipline remaining to present such a preacher before the Synod as one who was privily bringing in damnable heresies, and judgment would have gone against him, in spite of a lay element in the Synod, as lenient in theological matters as the law lords in the recent judgment of the Privy Council.

But with the lapse of fifty years, as the Churches of French Switzerland have revived, those of German Switzerland have declined. In 1839 the Great Council went so far as to appoint the notorious David Strauss to a chair of divinity in the university which had been then lately constituted. This led to a storm of resistance on the part of all who had any remains of respect for religion. The Conservative party rallied round the friends of religion, a strong effort was made, and the Government was turned out which, by making such a scandalous appointment, had offered a studied insult to the religion professed by the State. But as the appointment had been made officially, it could not be recalled without offering some compensation to the professor who was deprived of his chair almost as soon as he was installed in it, and so to this day Dr. Strauss draws a small pension from the Canton of Zurich, as an acknowledgment that he would have taught divinity in the school of Zwinglius and Bullinger, if the Radical and Rationalist party had their way, and as a standing memorial of the disgraceful pass to which a Church with a fallen faith could allow itself to be brought. Well does Dr. Held remark in his lectures* addressed to the little community of believing Christians in Zurich that—

While the Churches of Germany have long since expelled the Deistic and Pantheistic forms of unbelief which they had cherished in their bosom, and a revival of Christian faith and practice is felt throughout the land, in Switzerland alone the old Rationalism holds its sway undisturbed, and it is as much as we can dare to say that Christianity exists even in name. When a German, and especially one from the North of Germany, finds himself in Switzerland, he feels as if he were thrown back into the controversies of the year 1840. When men make bold to treat the Evangelical history as a myth, and reduce the whole scheme of Christian doctrine to phase of Pantheistic philosophy, thus forsooth to live on crumbs which fall from German tables and to deck oneself up in clothes which have long since gone out of fashion in Germany, must seem to the eyes of any unprejudiced person to be a mistake, if not an absurdity.

Against such a state of things as this some strong protest should be raised; and if the example of Geneva can teach us anything, it would appear that the establishment of a Free Church is the only effectual remedy against the almost avowed apostasy of the National Church. In Zurich there is no want of witnesses against the infidelity of the principal clergy. Moravians and Methodists, Plymouth Brethren, Baptists, and others, have their representatives; and the labours of two zealous American brethren, the one in connexion with the Methodist Church, the other with the Evangelical Society of Basle, have been much owned and blessed of God. But the labours of these excellent men have been principally confined to gathering out and instructing the godly remnant who still sigh in secret over the decline of faith in Zurich. As yet they have not affected the great mass of the people, nor done much to leaven the inert lump of practical heathenism. A stronger and more decided protest is wanted—one that shall cut the infidel party to the quick, and provoke, if possible, the more rightminded among the laity to jealousy, by the example of a Free Church rallying round the standard of the old Helvetic Confessions.

ROMISH PROCESSIONS IN THE PUBLIC STREETS.

You are aware that it is customary for the Romish Church, at certain periods of the year, to have grand processions. When these festivals come round, the priests exert themselves to make an imposing display, in theatrical style, and are always inventing new methods of striking the popular imagination. The old mediæval colours are unfurled; statues and relics of every kind, decked with jewels and other costly ornaments, are triumphantly exhibited; young girls array themselves in their best attire; children are dressed up as angels; and certain devotees, of both sexes, personate certain Scripture characters, such as John the Baptist, the Shepherds of Bethlehem, and Mary Magdalene. It is a veritable scenic representation.

If these processions were confined by the clergy to the interior of their own churches, no objection could be taken to them. Provided the law of the land and morality are respected, every communion is free to celebrate its worship as it thinks proper. But the prelates and priests of Romanism are not content to do these things within their religious edifices; they usurp the public squares—streets—entire cities—so that the thoroughfares are blocked up, and there is no moving about.

Many inconveniences result from this encroachment. The citizens are stopped at every step, and prevented from attending properly to their business. Besides, as the Popish fanatics require marks of respect and even adoration for their holy sacrament, and certain individuals, from conscientious motives, refuse to submit to these unjustifiable pretensions, it often happens that brutal violence is committed upon inoffensive persons. Thus, at Coges, in the department of the Charente-Inférieure, some Protestants have been maltreated by the populace, and afterwards taken into custody by the police, under the pretext of not showing sufficient respect for these clerical mummeries.

A long, keen controversy has taken place on the subject among the political journals of Paris. The liberal organs say that it is a great abuse on the part of the priests to encroach upon the public highway and subject the citizens to extreme inconvenience. The Jesuitical papers, in their replies, invoke the principle of religious liberty, alleging that Romanists would be oppressed in the exercise of their worship, if they had not the right to go beyond their sanctuaries. This is mere sophistry. The squares and streets of cities belong to all, and cannot be usurped by one particular communion. What disorder, in fact, there would be, if Protestants, Jews, Freethinkers, Freemasons, radicals, Socialists—religious and political societies of every kind—should encumber, in turn, the public highway, by processions or other exhibitions of the same kind. The priests claim for themselves what they refuse to others; they demand a privilege. But the time of privileges is past, and we hope that the Government will at length have the courage to establish religious equality, under the sanction of the laws, to which all are subject in common.

GREAT FESTIVAL AT MARSEILLES, IN HONOUR OF THE VIRGIN MARY.

As I am upon the subject of Popish festivals, I may say a few words upon what has recently occurred at Marseilles. For some centuries, a statue of the Virgin, called Notre Dame de la Garde, has been installed upon a hill of that city, and has been regarded with the deepest reverence, especially by the sailors, who count upon its protection to save them when threatened by storm and shipwreck.

The image of Notre Dame required to be restored. This was an admirable opportunity for the members of the sacerdotal body to get up the most splendid and magnificent festival that had ever been presented to the view of the people. The inhabitants of our southern provinces are of an ardent temperament, their imagination is easily excited, and they are passionately fond of grand spectacles, whether worldly or religious. So the priests and monks spared no pains to gratify the popular taste.

The festival was announced in all the journals several months beforehand, and everybody prophesied that it would be a wonderful sight. The Pope granted special indulgences to all who should take part in the ceremony, so that thousands of pilgrims came from various parts of France, and even from Italy, Spain, and elsewhere. It was calculated that at least 200,000 persons met to take part in the solemnity.

Four cardinals, or princes of the Papal Church, eight or ten archbishops, and forty or fifty bishops, with their most striking insignia, headed the procession. Abbés, vicars-general, and priests, followed in large numbers. They carried the new statue of the Virgin, singing litanies as they went. Then came the relics of St. Victor, St. Serenus, St. Cannat, St. Mary Magdalene, St. Martha, and other saints of every name. Young girls, and nuns, dressed in varied colours, with ribbons streaming and emblematic devices, came next; they were succeeded by monks—white, blue, and black—their different costumes giving a most pictorial effect to their appearance; so that quite a fairy scene was produced. The splendour of the ceremony was further augmented by detachments of soldiers and military music, and the presence of the higher civil functionaries of the departments.

Several addresses were delivered. I was particularly struck with that of Cardinal Donnet, Archbishop of Bordeaux. He extolled the merits of the Virgin Mary, and related the so-called miracles effected by her intercession. "Just as breathing is in man a sign of life," said the cardinal, "so the worship of the Virgin Mary is, in families and nations, a sign of orthodoxy, and, in some sort, of a Divine predestination." Thus the adoration of Mary is, in the eyes of this eminent prelate, the highest attainment and the most evident proof of piety. The service of Jesus Christ, even the worship of God, are relegated to a lower place.

It were superfluous to add, that the clerical press has given long accounts of this festival, loudly asserting that the French people have retained their faith in Roman Catholicism, and that they would be willing, should occasion require, to make the greatest sacrifices for it.

I believe that the journals of the Jesuit party are under a complete mistake. The multitude that filled the streets of Marseilles, at the time of the famous festival, proves nothing. The occasion was an object of curiosity, perhaps a source of fleeting emotion, and that is all. If Popery hopes to re-conquer its dominion over men's minds by these semi-pagan demonstrations, it is deceived. Scepticism daily gains a wider sway in the higher ranks of society, and a grosser materialism reigns among the humbler classes.

COUNT DE MONTALEMBERT'S PAMPHLET ON THE POPE AND POLAND.

The name of Count de Montalembert has often appeared in our correspondence, and the reason is easily explained. M. de Monta-lombert is an eloquent orator and a distinguished writer; he has figured with honour in our political assemblies. His activity is unparalleled, and he has long been regarded as the head of the Roman Catholic laity of France. His opinions and actions, however, are remarkably inconsistent.

Sometimes he seems to adopt very liberal views. Then he pronounces the highest eulogies upon the English nation, and declares that its civil and religious institutions are a model worthy of imitation. But in other circumstances, the same Count de Montalembert becomes the most vehement champion of Ultramontaniam, and attacks, with the fiercest acrimony, all who refuse to bow before the idol of the Vatican.

These perpetual contradictions have reappeared in his last pamphlet on the Pope and Poland. M. de Montalembert excited dissatisfaction at Rome by maintaining, in the Congress of Mechlin, the principles of modern civilization. Now, he has been endeavouring, apparently, to become reconciled to the Holy See by pronouncing a panegyric upon Pius IX., at the expense of all the other sovereigns of Europe.

You may have seen, in the political journals, some months since, that the Pope had uttered anathemas against the Czar Alexander II., and had represented the Poles as heroic martyrs for religion and liberty. The old Pontiff delivered his speech without preparation; he yielded to the impulse of the moment, and what he said was neither prudent nor accurate. The Roman journals have not dared to reproduce them precisely as they were spoken, lest they should occasion a complete rupture with the Muscovite Emperor.

Be that as it may, M. de Montalembert has published a long commentary on this Papal allocution, in which he accuses the Governments of France, England, Germany, and other countries, with having acted in an immoral, shameful, and cowardly manner, in abandoning the Poles to the violence of Russia. He says that it is the greatest crime of our age, and that Europe will expiate, by terrible sufferings, this forgetfulness of the most sacred duties.

The ardent pamphleteer does not see the point of the discussion. Certainly unhappy Poland deserves our warmest sympathy; but the Jesuits and the Court of Rome have compromised her interests by representing the resurrection of Polish nationality as a means of attacking the Greek Church in Russia and the Protestant Church in Prussia.

They have converted a political affair into a religious quarrel, and the feeling in of the Poles has naturally lost some of its warmth. Count de Montalembert have done better to suppress his attacks against the kings and peoples of Europe to reproach, as he might justly have done, the Jesuitical party, who ruin the best of us by exorbitant pretensions.

DISMISSAL OF M. RENAN.

M. Renan's name has again occupied attention and furnished the text for a discussion. Your readers will not have forgotten that M. Renan was professor of the Hebrew, Syriac, and Chaldean languages in the École de France, the highest of our academic institutions. But after the first lecture he ceased to exercise his functions, on account of his opinions having created serious dissatisfaction. He was in an anomalous position. He received a salary from the treasury of the State, but could not fulfil the duty which was assigned to him.

The Minister of Public Instruction, M. Duruy, desiring to put an end to this irregular state of things, appointed M. Renan to other functions, in the Imperial Library. This new post was equally honourable to the former, and it might have furnished him the opportunity of contributing to the progress of knowledge. But M. Renan haughtily declined the change of office; he even published a pamphlet in which he addressed the Minister of Instruction in unseemly language. Ever since this writer has been intoxicated by the prodigious success of his antichristian book, he persuades himself that he is so important a personage, that he has a right to abuse the Government.

What is the result? M. Duruy requested the Emperor to sign a decree by which M. Renan is removed and deposed (révoqué et destitué). The measure was perhaps; but the Minister of Public Instruction was reduced to the sad necessity of acting in this manner. M. Renan thus becomes a simple writer, without any official title, and may continue to attack the Christian religion; but the Government will cease to be responsible for the ideas of this writer. The position is clearer and more intelligible.

ADDRESS OF THE PASTORAL CONFERENCE AT NISMES.

French Protestantism is always agitated by warm controversies. It need to remind you that, in the Pastoral Conferences of Paris, orthodoxy obtained a decided victory. The great majority of the members present adopted a declaration of principles which affirmed the Divine inspiration of Scripture, the personal divinity of Christ, redemption by the sacrifice of the cross, &c., as positive and permanent doctrines of the French Reformed Church.

But the members of the Rationalist or negative school set their hearts upon letting our Churches see a counter demonstration. Accordingly, a great meeting, at which the heterodox pastors were in the majority, was held at Nismes, the metropolis of Protestantism in our southern provinces. Here was adopted an Address to the Faithful of the Reformed Churches of France. This piece is especially remarkable for the things which it does not contain. The entire supernatural element in Christianity is passed over in silence. The authors of this address abstain from characterising the person or work of Jesus Christ. They have recourse to a vague and nebulous phraseology, which would allow philosophical unbelievers and Deists to sign such a document. They confine themselves to declaring that the Gospel must be interpreted by the individual conscience, and that the right of private judgment confers the further right to make perpetual changes in doctrine. What does the Church or religious society thus become? The negative pastors, who met at Nismes, leave this question unanswered, as if it were not worth being investigated.

PROFESSION OF FAITH OF M. COQUEREL, JUN.

I may offer somewhat similar remarks upon the Profession of Faith recently published by M. Athanase Coquerel, jun. This minister of the Gospel has stated upon the title of his publication, that it is a profession of Christian faith. He is at liberty, certainly, to employ such terms as appear to him suitable; but his readers are also at liberty to deny that he uses them in their legitimate sense.

How can this document possess a Christian character, when all the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, from original sin to the expiatory sacrifice of Christ, are interpreted in such a way as to deprive them of meaning, or to reduce them to a mere rationalistic notion? M. Coquerel, jun., is very clever; he has attained no small skill in the art of evading embarrassing questions. But intelligent and pious men cannot grant to the author the designation which he claims. His profession of faith is a profession of Rationalism, and not of Christian truth.

THE CALVIN COMMEMORATION IN PARIS.

"O God, we thank Thee for having so loved the world as to give thine only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life!" Such were the first words that fell upon the ear of the vast multitude which filled the Oratoire overflowing on the 27th of May; and such the life-giving truth which, like a golden thread, ran through the two noble "Conferences," or lectures, on Calvin. The speaker was the Rev. Dr. de Félice, Professor of Sacred Eloquence in the Protestant Theological College at Montauban, whose presence was due to a special invitation from the Consistory of the Reformed Church of Paris, to address all the Protestants in the capital, on the occasion of the Tercentenary commemoration, of the life, character, and labours of the great Reformer. Much thought and prayer preceded the event both here and at Montauban; judgment, sobriety, truth, and love were asked for and expected for the lecturer, and earnest interest for the hearers. The Lord was both. Never did a speaker more understand his mission, and never did he more thoroughly respond to the orator. More than 1,500 persons of all ranks and opinions pressed into the building, the largest devoted to Protestant worship in Paris, and many were unable to gain admittance. There were every denomination of Christians and every shade of Protestantism present, and representatives of all classes of society and of every religious or irreligious system in vogue; and all who heard, however they might differ as to conclusions, were unanimous as to the well-nigh perfect form of the "Conferences." Interest never flagged, perspicuity was never clouded, logic was never at fault, appeals rang clear upon the heart, every idea was given in its exact proportions, and full, weighty significance. The orations were worthy of their subject, and it has been well said that the speaker had lived so much with Calvin, that he had, for the time, imbibed the Reformer's spirit. The Reformer as a Christian steadfastly fixed on God's Word, and the Reformer as the firm organiser of believing masses, are grand points reverted to with anxious thought by Christians in these days of failing faith and dissolving ties; and these two divisions of the subject formed the text of Professor de Félice's orations.

Calvin, the Christian sitting at the feet of Jesus, was brought before us in all the simplicity of the austere youthful student, poring over this newly-found Bible, not in search of critical niceties, but of an answer to the question of questions, his soul's salvation; the question of all others set aside to-day, even in theological discussions. What shall I do to be pardoned by God, justified by God, saved by God?—a question without which Christianity exists not. The burdened soul of Calvin, seeking rest in strict observances—for all our Reformers were the best of Catholics; good Protestants must be framed out of downright believers—caught the sound of jubilee from Germany, Grace! we are justified freely by God's grace! and he was free! Then came the heart-rending struggle, to separate from the Church of forty generations, to wring the heart of his father, to dare exile, persecution, and death in the most cruel forms. On one side ease, prosperity, success in the world; on the other, God. Calvin's deliberate choice was made; he chose God, the will, the love, the Word, the grace of God, and chose wholly and for ever. What he believed at the age of twenty he retained and professed on his deathbed. The oneness of his Christianity is greatly to be noticed; his strength was in this oneness; in his faithfulness to duty—and self-renunciation was the first of duties to him—in his activity, prodigious activity, with a weak bodily frame; his inner man stronger than his outward, and over the ruins of the body the soul attesting its sovereignty and immortality—in his austerity, in food, in dwelling, in expense; in his disinterestedness. The orator carried his spell-bound hearers from Nyon to Paris, from Paris to Bourges, from Bourges to Poitiers, showing the timid student pressed on and forced to lift the burden of his life for God, pleasing not himself, from Geneva to Strasbourg, and back again to Geneva, until they had before them the spare and worn-out man of fifty-five, working to the last, and holding fast his simple trust in Christ while he laid the burden down.

He concluded: "We are not of Calvin nor of Luther; we are neither of St. Paul nor of St. Peter; we are of Christ, their Master, their Model, their God, and ours. Were Calvin to return among us, he would not now combat all he combated, he would not believe all he believed, nor say all he once said, nor do all he once did. Jesus Christ alone is above all these conditions of mankind, and in this, as in all else, He showed himself not as a simple man. But if in Christianity there are variable elements, there are also truths which remain ever one, immutable, universal, and in the degree in which Calvin understood and practised them, we can no longer ought to ask ourselves, are we of Calvin's religion? . . . Waiving all else, let us, as in the presence of an all-seeing God, say, What is my religion? and what place in my religion is held by God's forgiveness and my everlasting salvation? If the first place, we may take Calvin's hand, even as he took Augustine's, and Augustine took St. Paul's. But if eternity, instead of being first, comes last—if the Gospel is not for us the glad tidings of salvation, grace, and pardon—if Christianity is a mere religion of emotion or of public order and domestic comfort—then we are no longer of Calvin's religion, nor of that of the apostles, nor of that of Jesus Christ. The question of salvation is the first, for it penetrates into the very depths of eternity." An earnest exhortation to Christians to be faithful in order to be strong, useful, blessed, and happy, concluded the first conference.

Calvin the Reformer, at the head of the Reformed Church, was the subject of the second conference, generally preferred to the first for its originality, its power, and its downright French spirit. The audience also, delighted with the first, had come full of zest for the second, and carried the orator far beyond his MS. notes, but not for an instant beyond accuracy, good taste, and sobriety. He brought out with remarkable tact the correspondence between Calvin and our national genius. Firmness in doctrine and language, clear conviction of the importance of his work, assurance, confidence in his cause, practical good sense, knowledge, spirit of discipline and intrepidity. Time was when France seemed ready to be led by him. Had France been Protestant, what a glorious nation!—what a different history! The true cause of the Reformation, as of the Reformer's conversion, is the question, What must I do to be saved? There is none other to be found but the anxiety for salvation, which our age has so much reluctance to believe possible. Without having given the first impulse to our Reformation, Calvin organised it. It commenced by placing the individual in direct communication with God; no priestly mediators in his system; each man to have his own personal faith, receiving pardon, grace, hope of heaven, direct from above. This spiritual independence breathed the wonderful breath of liberty which has made the disciples of Calvin the greatest and truest all the world over. The need of believers uniting together occasioned the formation of his strong, wise, and clerical system; for Calvin, the company of faithful men who doctrine, and the expression of this agreement is the common bond of all who form part of the Church. He would leave it, but while within its must bow to its discipline and its faith. The strength of his discipline and organization stood the test, until it fell under the most prolonged persecution, and even in the desert, its broken fragments were preserved until now. The life gave to learning was immense. The work of the Reformer may, then, be put as, Salvation, the prominent and important; the Bible the basis of all; the principle of Christian individuality; the mission of the Church in the agreement of fundamental points; a code of discipline and learning greatly promoted.

"Heavenly country," was the watchword of our fathers, for it they lived and it must be our watchword, would our worthy descendants and attain

our appeal to be one with the saints of all ages, by placing salvation in its pre-eminent place, by direct union with God through the atonement of Jesus, closed these remarkable orations, which, we regret to say, are not yet published, but which are shortly expected.

Other meetings took place in Paris on the Sunday following, in which the Reformer's memory was recalled, especially one at Taitbout Chapel, at which Professor Rosseau, St. Hilaire, Pastor Fisch, and M. Peter spoke.

An important step towards a revival in the Churches has been taken in connexion with this important anniversary. At the request of Dr. Grandpierre, the Presbyterian Council has placed its hall at his disposal for union prayer-meetings, in which brethren of all denominations take part. The first meeting took place on the day previous to the conferences, for which special prayer was made. The weekly return of the hour of prayer is evidently blessed. Confessions are made of sterility in the Lord's work, simple exhortations are given, and prayer offered in increasing simplicity and solemnity. Were this the only result of the conferences, we might indeed rejoice, for when the Lord gives His people the desire to seek His face in union with their brethren, reviving grace is nigh! But many other results in a widening circle may be expected.

SWITZERLAND.

THE CALVIN COMMEMORATION AT GENEVA.

Geneva, June 16, 1864.

Sitting down to give you an account of the centenary commemoration of Calvin's our city, I cannot but fear that for your readers it will have lost the charm of novelty, but it will be new to all at all events, I trust those impressions can bear to be twice told. As the reawakening of the spirit of nation, after a space of 300 years, such common occurrence nor of such interest that a mere passing notice exhaust it. Whether we consider it in connection with the past, the present, or its importance is equally great; it is a subject of interest to the historian, the Christian philosopher, the working pioneer of the Gospel.

WEEK"—THE FOREIGN DEPUTATIONS.

Evangelical Society being the most active of our religious societies, a customary for other bodies to fix their meetings in the same week.

This year the Evangelical Society had selected the last week in May, being the 300th anniversary of the great Reformer's death, which occurred on 27th of May, 1564. The several days were thus appropriated, and the whole week was one of religious business, the more serious hours being daily allied to that friendly exercise of hospitality for which the beautiful villas, bordering on the Lake and surrounded by magnificent mountain scenery, offer such matchless resources.

The number of visitors and deputations from many lands, churches, and societies making it quite impossible for them all to be heard in one meeting, or even in one day, the several meetings must be considered as substantially one, so far as Calvin's Tercentenary is concerned, as there was the same prominent place given to that great subject in all of them, and the same cordial welcome to all the deputations who were heard on the several days of that week.

Great Britain and Ireland, Germany, Belgium, Holland, France, and Italy, as well as Switzerland itself, sent their deputations, and brethren from other countries, such as Sweden, Denmark, and Spain, were present as private individuals. I could fill a page with a long list of names; but I shall limit myself to mentioning in your columns those only most interesting to your readers, as being the deputations from the United Kingdom. From England we had the Rev. Carr Glyn, the Rev. Dr. Steane, the Rev. Hermann Schmettau, and R. Fowler, Esq.; from Scotland, the Rev. Dr. Harper and the Rev. Hamilton M'Gill; from Ireland, the Rev. Professor Gibson and Thomas Hardy, Esq. In addition to these deputies, letters from various societies, who could not conveniently send representatives, were read at several stages of the proceedings.

PUBLICATIONS ON CALVIN.

The approaching commemoration had been introduced by a number of publications intended to serve as a preparation or as a souvenir of the occasion. Amongst them the most interesting is "Calvin d'après Calvin," or "Calvin his own Expositor," published under the patronage of the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, by Messrs. C. O. Viguet and D. Tissot. The volume, adorned with a facsimile of Calvin's handwriting, consists entirely of judiciously-selected portions of that Reformer's works, offering, under five successive heads, his autobiography, so far as it can be collected, and specimens of his exegesis, of his doctrinal writings, of his preaching, and a selection of striking thoughts out of other portions of his numerous writings. I omit the mention of minor publications, whose common aim was to make that great servant of God better known in our day, and more highly valued for his power and fidelity.

But there were also other publications, intended to calumniate his memory. They, of course, are of no value, and beneath criticism. But it is a sign of the times in which we live. After the brilliant period of the Reformation came here, as elsewhere, a long period of indifference and spiritual death—again "darkness was upon the face of the deep." A certain Church, hostile to our liberty, and a certain school, hostile to our faith, irreconcilable as mutual foes, agreed, however, in this, that they rejoiced at the decline and decay of true Protestantism, the most fatal obstacle, in their eyes, to the triumphs of their several views. Hence their unanimous wrath at the revival of our faith, hence their anger to find that the Gospel is still in our day a living truth, as it was in the days of our fathers, who, as you know, liked to represent it as an anvil, surrounded with the fragments of hammers, broken by striking upon it. Romanists and infidels both attempted to interfere with the celebration of our Tercentenary; but both have had the satisfaction of breaking their hammers upon the anvil. Their threatened interference has come to nothing, their publications have only shown their helplessness, and I only mention them to show the conviction on the part of their authors that they are losing ground by the revival of that portion of Calvinism which alone is susceptible of being revived, because it belongs to neither time nor place, but is a beam of the eternal truth. That there has been such a revival is undeniable; the commemoration just held would have been as impossible forty years ago as in 1764. At this day, the elements of such a commemoration are in existence, not, indeed, to the degree we could wish in the present, or can hope for in the future, but yet sufficiently to have made it both possible and effectual.

While bitterness and even calumny are heaped with no sparing hand upon the memory of Calvin, his friends have been distinguished by the sobriety and spirituality of their appreciations. As was quaintly remarked on this occasion, fanaticism is all on the negative side. Our speakers, our preachers, our writers, have generally shown a remarkable harmony of views with your contributor "P. B.'s" judgments in his articles in Evangelical Christendom for May and June, and I can consider my task fulfilled in this respect by a simple reference to his able pen. Of the meetings generally which occupied "Calvin's week" we shall take but a cursory glance. The principal alone will be named or analysed, according to their relative importance. From the very commencement it was manifest that every opportunity was seized for introducing the name of Calvin, manifesting, in spirit at least, if not in actual execution, how entirely the great heart of the Reformer had swelled with anticipated sympathy for the works now carried on around us.

BIBLE AND OTHER SOCIETY MEETINGS.

On the evening of Monday, the 23rd of May, was held the annual meeting of the Genevese Bible Society, under the presidency of Professor Gautier, and on Tuesday afternoon that of the Missionary Society, the Rev. Pastor Barde in the chair. The report of this society retraced a missionary attempt by Calvin and Admiral Coligny with Genevese missionaries in South America, who is evidently from the fact that the interests of the mission were a temporal scheme of colonisation, if came to a disastrous end, under the of a treacherous leader. Let the and alone!

Wednesday morning was held the meeting of the Society for the servance of the Lord's Day—an n which had no existence until last twelvemonth. The subject, had long occupied the thoughts of Christians, as testified by the place it in the Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, in 1861, when Dr. A. of Edinburgh, delivered an address a been productive of good and ults. The report showed earnest activity on the part of the com- no have done much during their f existence. MEETING OF THE EVANGELICAL SOCIETY.

Evangelical Society came next in e president, Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, e proceedings by a retrospective e losses lately sustained by that ex of devoted men who have done such great things in their day, and now have entered into their Master's presence: in one short year Gausson, F. Monod, Malan, and some younger men, have exchanged this scene of toil for the realms of peace, and the mention of their departure was associated with that of Calvin, which Dr. Merle d'Aubigné described in a most interesting manner. The usual reports and addresses by deputations and friends of the society occupied the successive hours of Wednesday evening and Thursday. On the evening of that day the friends and visitors were entertained in a simple sort of conversations at the villa of Plougeon, and passed a few pleasant hours together. Notwithstanding the great importance and extent of this society's labours, and the blessing with which the Lord has crowned them, I bestow upon it merely a passing notice, but recommend it earnestly, in its financial difficulties, to those Christian readers who are able by their means to help on this good work in the service of the Lord. The American war and other causes have seriously curtailed its receipts, while its expenditure has reached the usual level of 6,000*l*. Of this sum about one-third is collected in Geneva itself, the rest must come from abroad, or the field cultivated by this society must be diminished; there is no other alternative. The Genevese Christians contribute generously. This year shows a deficit of 880*l*. An appeal has been made for extraordinary help, and in a fortnight Geneva has produced 400*l*. We have done our duty. May our brethren from abroad come to our aid! God has undoubtedly marked this city as a centre for the evangelization of French-speaking countries. But the number of Christians who support the work in Geneva itself is perhaps not more than two thousand in all. What proportion is that with the forty millions who require to be enlightened? When we have given our time, our strength, our money, and our prayers, what else can we do? We have fought the battle against error for three-and-thirty years; it is still as much a battle as ever it was. We ask for the means to carry on the war. Let those who can do so supply them.

DEDICATION OF THE SITE FOR THE REFORMATION HALL.

But I must hasten on to the proceedings of Friday, the 27th, which was in reality the commemoration day, and marked by the solemnity of dedicating the site for the Reformation Hall.

The sun rose in all its splendour, with a cloudless sky, but with that strong north-easter so well known in Geneva as la Bise blowing. This was not very favourable for the open-air meeting to be held on the place chosen for the building. But there we gathered a fruit sown for us by other hands. On account of the ill-will manifested by some of the enemies of Calvin's memory, who asserted that no fraction of the population had a right to make the commemoration a public ceremony, the spot had been surrounded by a boarding eight feet high, in order to make it strictly private. We were thus sheltered under its protection, and a party of four or five hundred met in one corner, the ladies sitting on benches, the men standing, thus showing the vast nature of the space, which could hold easily more than two thousand people.

There was no laying of a first stone, as preparatory operations were not in a sufficiently advanced state. It was more an appropriation of the ground to its destination; but to my feeling there was something very satisfactory in that spiritual form of proceeding, where nothing took a material shape, and where the winged words, shot like arrows from overflowing hearts, were the only outward homage rendered to that master spirit of the sixteenth century, who, "being dead, yet speaketh," and whose mighty words will influence unborn generations in the Reformed Church, when we are all laid in our graves. The day's business was opened under the presidency of Mr. Goudet, an advocate in our city, and president of the Reformation Hall Committee. Prayer was offered up by the Rev. Pastor Barde. Portions of Scripture were then read by the Rev. Pastor Demole from Isaiah lv. and Ephes. ii. He followed up the reading by a few observations on the purpose of the meeting. "There is to-day," he said, "nothing to be seen on this bare spot, but the foundation we lay for the Hall of the Reformation is the Word of God. We acknowledge there can be but one cornerstone, Christ; and the apostles and prophets the first layer placed upon it. Calvin, whom we meet this day to honour, would never have admitted any other. The building we intend to erect is not to be a church. We have our churches, our sheep-folds, our several feeding-grounds; this will be something quite different, a fishing-ground. Here the members of all the churches will meet with those who belong to no church at all, and the net of the Gospel will be cast. That net, though it has often been exposed to the world's stormy waters, is unbroken still; it is powerful, and in it we shall gather those who will be brought to salvation. In doing this, we shall lay a just claim to Calvin's inheritance. In his day that great man had two employments: he was a shepherd and he was a fisherman. As shepherds, like him, we have had our feeding-grounds; and now, like him as a fisherman, we must have our fishing-ground. But Calvin was what we are not—a great and mighty man of God. What he did in his might alone, let us do in our weakness, by united effort and mutual help, working together for the glory of our Lord."

The President briefly stated the facts in connexion with the first idea of the hall and its subsequent elaboration. The Committee of the Evangelical Alliance had first taken up the project, originating with the General Conference of 1861. But being unable to carry it out, it was undertaken in the same spirit by a special committee, whose labours have been so far successful. Subscriptions were collected to the amount of 4,000*l.*, from which the present ground was purchased for a sum of 2,600*l.* An architect, having consulted the plans of similar buildings, will soon submit his ideas to the committee. As to the destination of the building, Mr. Goudet confirmed Mr. Demole's previous statements, and ended by a tribute to the memory of M^r. Gabriel Naville, who was president of the committee when his premature death removed him to the eternal halls on high.

SPEECHES OF THE DEPUTATIONS.

The Rev. Carr Glyn, of Witchampton, expressed the sympathy of our English brethren with the cause. He alluded to the benefits which Calvin's powerful mind had conferred upon the Reformation in England, by his influence with King Edward VI., Archbishop Cranmer, and the Protector Somerset, with other men of note, during those great events. He acknowledged, also, the obligations under which the English clergy of another time had been to the great Reformer, when his "Institutes" and "Catechism" were used as class books in the University of Oxford, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

In the absence of Professor Rosseau, M^r. Hilaire, who was unable to attend, Pastor Barde read a letter from our brethren in Paris, expressing their strong sympathy, and signed by leading men of the several Protestant denominations.

Mr. Puaux addressed the meeting in the name of the French brethren generally. He adverted to Calvin's French nationality, to his labours in his native country before coming to Geneva, in 1536. He showed Calvin to be the organising spirit of the Genevese Reformation, of which Farel had been the originator. He showed that by the mere power of his faith and of his genius he surmounted all opposition, dictating, when an exile, the conditions of his return to Geneva, whose inhabitants implored him to come and save them. He came, and made Geneva, for a long time, the first city in the world. But Calvin was not simply a man of genius; he was also a man of a most loving heart, and he laboured as much for the Churches of the Reformation by his ever-watchful interest in their welfare as by his jealousy for the truth of God.

Pastor Chantepie de la Saussaye, from Holland, said he did not come as a deputation, there being no constituted body in Holland from whom he might have been sent; but on the strength of that spiritual relation which unites all Christians in one common head, every Reformed Christian ought to feel at home in this metropolis of the Reformation. The Churches of the Netherlands never had, like Geneva, the character of Paul, who plants, not rather that of Apollos, who waters. They have received from Geneva and Calvin both their faith, with its Confession, and their liturgy. But the impulse received from within has been long maintained within, and cultivated with care. The Church of the Netherlands has had its days of exclusive spirit and stern rigour. But yet the persecuted brother has always found a welcome and a retreat there, and Geneva has been remembered, even when forgotten on every side. At present its official organization is not favourable to a renewal of life, but the Holy Spirit begins to breathe among the people. The afflictions sent of God are a sign that there must be some of the precious metal to be tried. The wisdom of man cannot say what the Lord intends to do, but, by faith, we know that He will bring out something to His glory, and that the Lord's work, if not in our own day, at least after us, will be revived by His own Spirit.

Pastor Bauty, of the Canton de Vaud, on this Tercentenary occasion, took a comparative view of the successive centuries. 1664, one hundred years after Calvin's death, his Church was still strong and prosperous, the first among the Churches of the Reformation, prima inter pares. In 1764, it had so far degenerated, that the less we say about it the better. At present, in 1864, we are scarcely qualified to judge rightly of what we are; but let us endeavour to secure a good name with the following generations, so that, if there should be a commemoration in 1964, we need not be ashamed of their saying, "This is what they were at that time." Our duty is to preserve the faith pure as Calvin did. Calvin did the work of Hezekiah. He unveiled the Bible for those from whom it had been hid, he purified the temple. He restored the original majesty of the worship of the Lord by restoring its original spirituality. Our duty is to hold fast those blessings we received from God through him; to cultivate the faith founded on the Word of God alone—the faith that edifies the heart in the truth, and abounds in the fruits of love and devotedness in Christ Jesus. We are, perhaps, drawing near to very difficult times. In the prospect of trials our union must be our strength. Let us follow the example of former days. By the side of your John Calvin, the history of our cantons records the names of Farel, Viret, Beza, and others, who were connected by intimate friendship. They lived and they worked together. Let us imitate them! Let the several cantons be one family in the service of the Lord, as they are one family in their temporal interests. May the bond of spiritual unity always grow stronger between us all!

M. Christ-Sarrasin, of the Basle Missionary Society, said that although he belonged to Basle, he was no stranger in this Calvin Commemoration; Calvin's influence had overstepped not only the geographical limits of states, but, what is more, those of confessional denominations also. For three hundred years Calvin has been read by the learned and unlearned, by the side of the great German Reformers. As to the business now in hand, he recommended his brethren to work in the Spirit, and to beware of the flesh. One of the noblest institutions in Germany, the Orphan-house at Halle, was founded by Francke, a man whose faith was equal to "undertaking something great with the money," when a half-crown was put into his hands. Everybody has heard of his success. But the influence of the flesh appeared, by his ordering that the direction should remain in the hands of his own family, and the bad consequences soon became manifest. On the other hand, at the foundation of the celebrated Herrnhut of the Moravian Brethren, a Swiss, De Watteville, kneeling upon the first stone, just laid, offered up a prayer so glowing with the fire of the Spirit, that all present took it as the promise of great blessings, and the life of the Spirit has been manifested in that blessed community more intensely than in most parts of God's vineyard. Let, then, no particle of the flesh intrude itself into this work of the Spirit. Begin in the Spirit, and go on in the Spirit. Undertaking is a great thing, but persevering unto the end is a greater still.

DR. MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ'S ADDRESS.

Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, in closing the proceedings, remarked that while to our eyes only an empty space was visible, we might in faith behold the fabric that is to arise. With God's help, upon this spot a monument shall stand connected with the honour due to the memory of Calvin. We will honour him, and those men of God who struggled, like him, for the Gospel; but upon one condition alone, that God shall receive the supreme honour, and that Christ's praise shall triumph above every man's praise. If we lay no visible stone to-day, we the more distinctly lay the true foundation, that invisible Corner-Stone, Christ. Let Christ be the strength of our collective body. Amongst the few here gathered together this morning several nations and churches are represented. Let us see in this accidental unity a type of the essential unity of the people of God. Being one in Christ, let us give all glory to Christ, our Master. But let us not forget those who served Him faithfully and manfully, and in particular that one among them who made Geneva the capital of Protestantism. He also longed for the unity of the Christian family. Perhaps this hall, based on the wide principle of fraternity, will prove in some degree conducive to that excellent end. With that hope before him, Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, in the name of the Genevese brethren, offered a solemn greeting to those who have been first in answering the call by their presence. Adverting to the stormy wind which was blowing, he said it was an additional feature in our Commemoration which had not been anticipated, as a storm raged with equal violence three hundred years ago, when Calvin, on his deathbed, compared it with the efforts with which Satan rages against all that is good in God's creation. Lastly, he expressed the strong reliance which the Genevese Christians had upon those of mightier lands, to enable them to raise a structure worthy of that great Reformer, whose memory is the common property of all the Reformed Churches, as a new infusion of his spirit of zeal for the Lord and of submission to His Word is their common need. Amid our mountains and forests we still want materials. We expect that our brethren will each send us a stone, and that our British brethren in particular will make their stone a large stone for this Commemoration Hall.

The meeting, which had lasted two and a-half, was closed by the Rev. F. Godet, of Neuchâtel, by a prayer and singing of a doxology.

SERMON BY DR. MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ.

Having now given your readers, as completely as I can, an outline of the characteristic part of the proceedings, the rest shall be more briefly alluded to.

Dr. Merle d'Aubigné preached at five o'clock, in the Oratoire, to a crowded audience. In his opening remarks he showed the true measure of honour to which Calvin was entitled. We must not honour him to that measure; but we must remember that he has been unjustly attacked and calumniated. While he was a great man, he was still a man. He did not discriminate sufficiently between the old and the new dispensations, and attempted to make Geneva a second Jerusalem. It was a noble error, an error of which we see at this time the consequences. Passing to an appreciation of Calvin's doctrine, he showed, first, how he laid the Word of Christ as a rule of religious knowledge; secondly, how he honoured, and above all glorified, the Word of Christ; thirdly, how he founded the hope of salvation on the grace of Christ; fourthly, how he insisted on the fruit of Christ, a fruit of the Spirit, as the true result of Christ's work on this side of the grave.

In the afternoon the Sabbath-school children in connexion with the Evangelical Church, numbering 420, were addressed by Pastor Puaux, and a short biography of Calvin, as far as possible adapted to the age, was distributed amongst them in remembrance of the day.

MEETINGS OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.
DEJEUNER.

The evening was set apart for the Evangelical Alliance. Long before five o'clock a seat, not even standing room, could be obtained in the Rive Droite. The principal feature of this meeting was an elaborate address by Pastor Viguet, on Calvin, his character, views of doctrine and organization, and pastoral activity. It was rich in thoughtful quotations from the Reformer's works and in facts from his life, illustrating the writer's judgment of him. It was listened to with intense attention and interest. The time was devoted to the speeches of our friends who could not be heard at the morning meeting. The English address was translated into French by Professor Harpe. The meeting lasted for four

On Saturday morning, 28th, the Evangelical Alliance met for business, in order to consider some cases of religious intolerance in Switzerland. It was decided that a joint action of the Alliance would be premature, while there remained a hope of obtaining a satisfactory result by the use of ordinary means. Since that subject was discussed religious liberty has made some progress in the Canton of St. Gall. Let us hope that their example will be followed by others, whose names I need not mention.

At the same meeting the expediency of calling together a General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in 1866, in Amsterdam, was discussed. The proposal was warmly seconded by the Dutch brethren. May the blessing of God attend that Conference, as it was done the former ones!

After these proceedings had terminated, a ~~lecture~~ was offered to the strangers present, at the Hotel des Bergues, Professor de La Roche in the chair. All was cordiality and intimacy. Without departing from the serious tone of the public meetings, the private intercourse of cheerful conversation was much enjoyed.

THE NATIONAL CHURCH.

As Friday was the commemoration of the Evangelical Church, Sunday was that of the National. In all the churches of the town and country sermons were preached on the occasion. The attendance was universally large, a distribution of books was made to the children, and the setting sun of that day found upon us busy and as interesting a week as Geneva had witnessed for a long time. In the course of the week, besides the regular services, at least twenty special meetings were held.

MORAL EFFECT OF THE COMMEMORATION.

Let me, in conclusion, express my opinion that in all this nothing too much has been done. Such a commemoration was decidedly necessary, and its fruits can only be blessed.

Ignorance on this important subject, as on many others, characterises our day. Many people are entirely ignorant of Calvin, of his history, and of his doctrines, which they blame without understanding them, while they condemn his writings without having read them. There is no great prospect of modifying the settled sentiments of those who are opposed to Calvin as a Reformer, and a foe of the Church of Rome, nor of those who are opposed to him as an adversary of infidelity. But there is more hope of those who belong to neither of those parties, and who are simply ignorant of the history of their own church, because they never were taught it, strange as that may seem. They have shown themselves ready to listen and to learn. Making little difference between National and Independent, they have lent a willing ear to those who were qualified to speak in the cause of instruction and of truth. A small proportion only of the population have grumbled, coarsely enough. These would fain stamp Calvin as a bloodthirsty tyrant, as an enemy of mankind and of liberty, who crushed the consciences of men by his doctrines, as he blasted the happiness of their homes by his discipline. But in their blind hatred they overlook this point, that their blame is his highest praise. If a man without birth, wealth, or any material advantage, by his sole moral influence could have become the tyrant they make him, and have compelled a whole people to blind submission, he surely must have been the most wonderful being that ever lived! Even we, with all our respect for Calvin, do not make him so great.

No. He stands alone. His name is his praise. He fears no enemy. He wants no apologist. When we honour such a man, we honour ourselves by showing that we are not altogether unable to understand him; and when we follow him, we feel that we walk in the path in which he himself followed his Saviour and our Saviour, his God and our God. ITALY.

EVANGELICAL EFFORT ON THE ITALIAN SHORE OF THE ADRIATIC.

Evangelization along the eastern shore of the Italian peninsula begins to excite attention. Hitherto little has been done for this immense tract of country, extending from Ravenna to Bari. The claims of the North, Centre, and Cis-Apennine regions have more than taxed the utmost energies of all the friends of Italy. The new railway along the margin of the Adriatic, connecting Northern and Southern Italy, presents great facilities in spreading the Gospel. Several friends—Messrs. Meyer, of the Free Church of Scotland; Bruce, of the London Bible Society; and Jones, of the Wesleyan Mission—have lately gone over the whole ground, and their reports are intensely interesting. In these old provinces of the Pope and the ex-King of Naples, where ignorance, superstition, and oppression reached their highest point, a quite unlooked-for opening presents itself in preaching the good news.

In all the principal towns there is a larger or smaller company of believers; and so great a success has attended the labours of the colporteur, especially in the Abruzzi and Capitanata, that in many country-sides there is scarce a house to be found without a Bible. The desire of the people everywhere to have the Scriptures expounded to them is so lively and urgent, that it is matter of deep regret that there are no evangelists to send. Let us pray the Lord of the harvest speedily to send forth labourers into this vast but overlooked section of the vineyard. Beginning our survey of the field with the north, and travelling southwards, we are glad to know that Mr. Piggott, of Milan, has already destined an evangelist for Ravenna. At Pesaro, an excellent Florentine convert, Signor Giannini, has laboured for two or three years, visiting occasionally Rimini, on the one hand, and Fano on the other. Interesting extracts from his journal are given in the last report of the Nice society, showing the many trials through which he has been made to pass, and the many encouragements God has given him in his solitary outfield work. Last month, on a visit to Pescara, he was brought in contact with an able but violent Roman Catholic vicar, Demarinis, who not only excited the people by his preaching against Protestant intruders, but stooped to hire ruffians in order to rid the town of the presence of the heretic evangelist. The magistrate broke up the cabal by imprisoning the conspirators and enforcing the punishment, notwithstanding the combined efforts for their release, on the part of Demarinis through guile, and of Giannini through anxiety to forgive the offenders.

THE ITALIAN EPHEBUS—BIBLE CIRCULATION.

Further south, we come to Ancona, the centre of Mr. Meyer's operations. In addition to an English service, and regimental duty among the Hungarian troops in the German language, and efforts on behalf of the Jews, to whom Mr. Meyer is especially sent, there is under his care and that of an aide evangelist, Signor Arias, an increasing Italian congregation, with twenty communicants. A few miles further on is the town of Loreto, where nothing is or can be done, the very colporteurs effecting no sale, people being wholly given to idolatry. This is the Ephesus of Italy, with a sale as famous as that of Diana. Here is a house called Holy House, brought from Nazareth on the shoulders of angels, who rested for a night on a hill near Ancona, which, from circumstance, is called Positore. The house of one room, encased in by marble sculptures, hung with costly offerings, and which has to be approached from a considerable distance by the pilgrims, on bended knees, so that the stones are worn into deep ruts. The house is entirely demoralised. There is not more than 3,000 inhabitants who does not live by means of the popular superstitions.

At Pescara, in the Abruzzi, there is an Evangelical meeting, and in connexion with it a thriving Young Men's Mutual Improvement Society, under the presidency of a prudent doctor of medicine, but there is no evangelist.

At Aquila, a short way inland, there has taken place a wide circulation of the Bible, and three priests are presently seeking truth in earnest. At Chieti there are decided Christian men, and an able pastor would receive the heartiest welcome, and the surrounding district willing to hear the message. At Foggia, the capital town of Capitanata, Mr. Meyer and a colporteur have been forty Testaments in the public square every day, to the working men, who were determined to have the way of salvation explained to them. One of these purchasers and listeners, whom Mr. Meyer did not recognise, seized him by the arm as he was going home in the evening, and feelingly claimed, "Ah, you have forgotten me, but I shall read it [referring to his Bible], and my wife will read it, and my children will read it, and my friends will read it, and all my neighbours will read it too."

A MINISTER WANTED—GROSS SUPERSTITION.

At Barletta, south of the Manfredi promontory, there is the largest number of professing Christians, upwards of one hundred, of whom six are young men about twenty years of age, who would, with suitable training, make good evangelists. These are pressed very hard, both by verbal and written invitations, to have a Christian minister settled among them, and to visit the surrounding districts. Both the Delegato and the authorities of the place, attend the evangelization meeting held by my and the last-named delivered a fiery speech against the priests and in favour of the Bible.

At Bari, which lies across the country from Naples, but is not easily reached from hence, owing to the mountainous character of the country, there is a little band of Christians.

In all these towns there is an abundance of relics, sacred pictures, and holy places, so that the grossest superstitions are devoutly cherished. Most of them being seacoast towns, the favourite shrine is that of the different saints of seafaring men. The most noted of these is that of San Nicola, at Bari, the last-mentioned place. This saint is believed to have folded his infant hands and prayed immediately after he was born, and from his body, under the high altar, there exudes through every pore a "sacred manna," or liquid, which is dearly paid for and drunk by the votaries, who regard its curative properties as infallible. The great crowd that annually assembles here in May is drawn from hundreds of miles around, and is of the most description, as is seen by their conduct on the journey and their bearing in the arch, stamping, scolding, threatening, and upbraiding the saint, until he displays his powers in miracles.

THE POPE.

Addresses of gratitude to the noble English people for their reception of Garibaldi continue to flow in from townships and rural communities as well as from Evangelical associations. The great topic of Italian nationalism during the last month has, however, been the illness and probable early demise of the Pope. That Pio Nono has been long unwell, and is still labouring under severe ailments, is unquestionable, though he is again convalescent. The old man, it is said, is perfectly well aware of the anxiety of the people to see him out of the way, and is hastened thereby. The whole future of the country, in the event of his death, has been discussed in the public prints in a great variety of ways. Hope, so long deferred, is still so in the ascendant, that a favourable issue of the Roman question is everywhere anticipated for. Not even the report that a French cardinal has already been appointed to succeed the present Pope, so as to commit France to the maintenance of the temporal power, and that French protection to the future conclave has already been asked for, in order to keep down popular excitement, can weaken the persistent belief of the Italians that Rome will speedily be conceded to them.

THE NATIONAL FESTA.

Meanwhile the National Festa has been celebrated everywhere with great joy, the people of Venice, Padua, Verona, and Rome joining in the festivity, despite the precautions of their present rulers. In the struggle—not alone a civil one—between the people and the Pope, we have to note further progress. Milan, Bologna, and other towns, have this year withheld their annual grants towards the expenses of the Corpus Domini procession, which, judging by reports, seems everywhere to have been attended by a small number of indifferent spectators, which certainly was the case in Venice, where I watched it closely. The 200*l.* sterling ordinarily given by the Milan municipality was distributed among the poor. Neither the army nor the National Guard would lend it their countenance, greatly to the chagrin of the priests; and only a few Pompieri attended, after obtaining permission from the authorities, who left them free to do as they liked, and being paid by the priests beforehand.

So many onlookers failed to remove their hats on the occasion, that the priests hounded on a few bigots upon these supposed Protestants, in order to make an example and win respect to a trumpety show, which no longer commands the popular sympathy. The daily press calls attention to such facts as needing no comment, and even suggests the propriety of putting down such a foolish display of candlesticks, images, and Church garments.

INDICATIONS OF HOSTILITY TO THE PRIESTHOOD.

The town of Assola, in advertising for a professor for its Athenæum, expressly debarred all priestly applicants, and a society springs up in Turin to use every means for putting down vice and superstition, the disgraces of the country. Now and again there appears in influential journals a well-reasoned disbelief in the pretensions of the Papacy; as, for instance, the impossibility of Peter's voyage to Rome, on the occasion of the late festival of the Chair of St. Peter, while well-organised schemes for the benefit of the working man are set on foot, in the form of good dwelling-houses and savings-banks. In Messina a band of liberal priests have formed a new association against the temporal power and some of the leading dogmas of the Papacy, while Signor Faletti, a priest of high standing in Palermo, and enjoying the sympathy of his fellow-citizens, resigns an excellent curacy because he is not allowed to preach the Gospel by his archbishop, and is preparing himself at the Waldensian College in Florence for Evangelical work.

Even the Government is emboldened by the attitude of the press and the people, and has pushed forward the sale of ecclesiastical property in Sicily, prevented the Bishop of Lucca from appointing retrograde priests to public offices without the Royal exequatur, and obliged the haughty Archbishop of Milan—who is so unpopular, that he is hooted when he ventures to come into the city—to acquiesce in the appointment of liberal canons to the cathedral. The motion before Parliament in relation to this latter case was thus framed: "Provide with the greatest promptitude for the order of the State, by the removal of the instruction of the people from the hands of the priests, by the immediate abolition of all religious orders, by the sale, or, at least, equitable division, of all ecclesiastical property, and by the institution of civil marriage."

As it is, all these measures are now in discussion, and the continued hostility of the Papacy to the present régime is likely to aid their progress and execution. Still the Pope replies to all deputations that he will accept of no condition, but leave his patrimony intact to his successor. Still the brigands and abetting priests are found with papers on their persons, signed by high authorities in Rome, dignifying their crimes with the name of a holy crusade. Still the priestly functionaries, from the highest to the lowest, outrage the feelings of the people, a Naples priest refusing to publish the banns of marriage of a liberal journalist, whom he considered as under excommunication, and the Archbishop of Pisa interdicting the further use of a church, because a young liberal had had the last offices performed in it over his corpse, a few Jews and one or two liberal associations of working men being present, as last year he had done with an effigy of Christ at Pontedera for similar reasons.

DR. DE SANCTIS AND THE PLYMOUTH BRETHREN.

With reference to the resignation of his charge in Genoa on the part of Dr. De Sanctis, and his separation from the Free Italian Churches, I may quote from a letter written by Dr. De Sanctis to a friend, which sufficiently explains the circumstances.

You can frankly say—

First—That I have separated myself, because conscientiously I believe that the churches called "Free Italian" are infected with Plymouthism.

Second—That I have not wished, nor do I wish, either to excite or to favour in any way division, in order to establish a new religious denomination, but that I shall tranquilly wait and see what God wishes to do with me.

Third—That in separating myself I have had, nor have I now in view, any employment or means of subsistence, which could in the slightest have exercised an influence over my termination, which has been a necessity of conscience.

Here, then, are the details of yesterday's meeting (May 5). It was held at six o'clock p.m. with the usual disorder, without president, with any form. A countryman opened the réunion. He laid down as a principle that books are not only useless for Christians, but injurious, and that they ought to read nothing but the Bible. Then speaking of my books, he said that they were poison, because in them there was nothing else done but to lacerate the brethren, and that they only deserved to be cast into the fire. Another said that there was no charity in the assembly that instead of trying to be all united, they were searching for mere cavils to bring about disunion.

Mazzarella then said that everybody was at liberty to write books, but that the church had no right to judge of them. All this time I kept silence. When invited to speak, I remarked that until they had settled the subject for discussion I would not speak. Mazzarella rejoined, that the object of the meeting was to re-establish peace after the controversy which had been caused by the work, "The Principles of the Romish, Protestant and Christian Churches," and my replies to it. Upon this I explained the true state of the question—viz., that an anonymous book had been published in the name of the churches, expounding the doctrine of the Italian churches; that in point of fact it was an exposition of Plymouthism that after I had protested against this book, the church in Florence, directed by Magrini, had written a letter to me blaming me severely for my protest, and defending the work "Principles, &c.;" that the church in Genoa had held many meetings, at which many had shown themselves opposed to me. In this way, briefly narrating the history of my last two works, I concluded by asking whether or not the church in Genoa protested against the work "Principles," &c.

Mazzarella replied that it did not, and four or five voices joined in with his "No." He said that if the church had protested it would have descended into the dirt (I do not understand what he meant by this expression); that the books written by me in the course of this controversy were written by inspiration of the devil. He further rated me severely for having for two months abstained from taking the communion with them, and concluded by stating that we should think no more of the past, that it should all be forgotten, and that we should act as if nothing had happened. I immediately responded, with perfect calm, and without referring to any of the injurious statements made, that as I felt convinced that the church was infected with Plymouthism, and that many in the church maintained a doctrine quite contrary to my own, my conscience would not permit me to remain any longer in connexion with it, and that from the moment I wholly withdrew, reserving to myself the right to re-enter, if ever the church cast out Plymouthism.

that the committees had written approving of my whole conduct in and stating that they were in the Italian churches and against begged that the meeting should and taking up my hat, I left. that my demission should not be of jealousy and contention, cannot be too highly lauded. It is said that Signor Mazzarella is preparing a pamphlet in support of, while Signor Gavazzi is writing one against, the book of Signor Rossetti, which has caused this painful controversy.

PROTEST AGAINST A THEOLOGICAL BOOK.

As to Germany itself, there is the much more important question of faith and un- belief, of affirmation and of negation, rela- tively to the Divine origin of Christianity, which is the object of the most active con- flicts in the Church and in the press. The conflict has become altogether practical and personal in the Grand Duchy of Baden, through the recent publication of a book by Dr. Schenkel, professor at the University of Heidelberg, upon the person and the life of Jesus Christ. This book, entitled "Charac- terbild Jesu," has profoundly astonished and grieved all the friends of Evangelical truth, to whom the author, by a great number of important writings, had given the right to expect from him something totally different from what he now offers to the public.

his last work, so far as to deny the truths and facts which constitute the actual essence of Christianity. In Germany, where the universities possess the most unbounded liberty of teaching, no one would have dreamed of attacking Dr. Schenkel and his book otherwise than by the arms of science, if the author were simply a professor of theology. But he is at the same time principal of the seminary in which all the young preachers of the country are obliged to pass one year after finishing their university studies. Now this obligation necessarily subjects them to the influence of a teaching against which the conscience of every Evangelical Christian protests. This is what has been felt by the believing pastors of the Grand Duchy of Baden, and they, on the 26th of May last, met in conference at Carlsruhe, to the number of about eighty. After an exposition made by one of them of the principles embodied in Dr. Schenkel's book, they deliberated, and decided upon a solemn protest, to be addressed to the Church and to the ecclesiastical authorities of the country, requesting these last to withdraw from Dr. Schenkel a tutorship destructive of Christian truth, or to declare that his tuition shall be no longer binding upon the future pastors of the Church. We read in this protest, which will cause a great stir in the Church, and will soon be discussed in all the diocesan synods, the following estimate of the incriminated book: "Dr. Schenkel denies the incarnation of the Son of God, he denies the supernatural birth of Jesus, he denies the perfect holiness of the Saviour, he denies the miracles of Jesus, only recognising the laws of nature as the ultimate measure of the facts of Providence and of redemption, he denies the efficacy of the death of Jesus for the redemption of the world, and he denies the fact of the resurrection of Jesus, as well as His ascension. Instead of the powerful kingdom which Christ has acquired by His sufferings, His death, His resurrection, and His exaltation to the right hand of the Father, the author only knows such a spirit of Christ as he sees in the Church; he denies the future return of Christ, he denies the institution of holy baptism by Christ, and as for the Holy Supper, he attributes to it no other significance than what the Church chooses to give it."

Grounded upon these facts, the authors of the protest conclude that Dr. Schenkel has set himself in direct contradiction not only to this or that Christian doctrine, or to its theological interpretation, but to the fundamental truths of Christianity committed to the Church by its Divine Head; they conclude, moreover, that he has henceforth rendered himself incapable of theological teaching in a Church founded on the Confession of Augsburg; and not content with publicly protesting against his errors, they request the ecclesiastical authority to remove him from his functions as principal of the Theological Seminary. This document is signed by fifty-four pastors, among whom are found a good number of deans (superior ecclesiastics established over a diocese).*

SCANDALOUS PREACHING.

This affair will infallibly excite a great religious agitation in the Duchy of Baden, where very active religious conflicts have already occurred of late years. I will keep your readers informed of the issues of this conflict. It is certain that no Church, not even any National Church, can subsist with unbounded liberty of teaching, or even of unbelief, in its ministers. A pastor of Hamburg, Dr. A. Krause, appears to have wished to furnish the proof of this lately by two scandalous sermons, which he has not been ashamed since to make public. This pastor has thought fit to pass in review, from the pulpit, all the facts of the life of Jesus made known by the New Testament, and to deny them one after another, for critical reasons, drawn from his own imagination. This was, however, a little too strong, even for Hamburg, where men have long been accustomed to rationalistic preaching. A great number of the hearers of this edifying doctor have signed an address to the Consistory and to the Senate of the free city, to ask them to close to him

* Another valued Continental Correspondent has sent us an account of Dr. Schenkel's last work; and he calls special attention to the fact that Dr. Schenkel writes the Commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians in Lange's "Bibelwerk." As Dr. Lange's series is in course of translation and publication in our language, our Correspondent is afraid that Dr. Schenkel's Commentary may be included. We are not informed whether the respectable house which has issued several volumes of Lange's Commentary, intend to publish the whole of it. Nor are we aware whether Dr. Schenkel's errors appear in his work on the Ephesians, as we have not seen it. But in any case, we think it not at all likely that the publishers of the English translations would require their subscribers to take a volume which, if not tainted with heresy, is by one who is at this very time winning for himself an unenviable notoriety by repudiating the principles which he formerly avowed. No doubt the attention of the Edinburgh publishers will be directed to this matter; and we imagine it to be not unlikely that Dr. Lange himself may replace the work of Dr. Schenkel by the production of another by some one on whom no stain or suspicion rests.—Eds.

the pulpits of the Church. Here, as everywhere, the unbelieving party does not fail to cry out as against persecution, and to demand what it calls religious liberty of conscience and of teaching. This only proves that these men have lost the most elementary notion of what a church is, and which, like every other society, has certainly the imprescriptible right to determine the principles on which it resolves to exist. We should be the first to ask for all the most complete religious liberty, even the liberty of denying everything. But we also ask ministers of religion who have rejected Christianity, to have honesty enough not to carry their unbelief into the pulpits of a Christian church. Thus the question stands, at Hamburg as at Heidelberg, at Zurich, and at Paris, where similar conflicts have arisen within the churches. Let every one have the honesty to take an ecclesiastical position conformed to his convictions, and all will abide in order and in peace.

THE PRESBYTERIAL AND SYNODAL REORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH IN PRUSSIA.

We have no doubt that the work of ecclesiastical reorganization which is carried on in most of the provinces of Germany, however imperfect it may be in its principles, will result in putting an end to this doctrinal confusion to which we have called attention. We also learn with pleasure that this presbyterial and synodal reorganization, begun by Prussia several years ago, but interrupted by different causes, is just now making a new start. On the 23rd and 24th of May there was held, at Halle, a numerous meeting of the Society for Union (Unionsverein), a Christian association, founded, as its name indicates, in order to labour for the establishment of the union of the two churches, and against Lutheran exclusiveness. A petition to the Upper Consistory was there considered and signed, asking for the speedy completion of the ecclesiastical reorganization. Very soon after, the petitioners had the proof that they had well divined the intentions of the ecclesiastical authorities. In fact, on the 8th and 9th of June, there already sat, at Berlin, under the presidency of Herr von Mühler, the Minister for Worship, a conference officially summoned by him, and composed of the General Superintendents of all the provinces, and of the Superior Consistory, as well as of the presidents of the consistories, to deliberate on the last measures necessary for the accomplishment of this work. This refers to Eastern Prussia, for the Rhine provinces have for a long time had their presbyterial organization. There have been already formed everywhere in the parishes presbyterial councils; the synods of districts and of provinces have been established in the provinces of Prussia, Posen, and Pomerania. It is now hoped that ere the end of this year they will also be found in the other three provinces—Brandenburg, Saxony, and Silesia. There will remain the yet more serious question of the General or National Synod, and of the powers which the Government will be good enough to confer upon it. The impetus has been given, public opinion urges, and the necessities of the time oblige. It will be no more possible to draw back. And besides, we see that the Government shows itself quite disposed to walk in this way of progress. We have been able to recognise one token of the good results of the high conference at Berlin, in the fact that, when its labours were accomplished, the Minister for Worship entertained its members at a soirée, which the King honoured with his presence, and at which he expressed on various occasions his sincere desire to see the presbyterial and synodal reorganization of the churches crowned with happy success.

In the Church of Jesus Christ forms are not life, but they may powerfully favour its developments.

INDIA.

MURDER OF TWO MISSIONARIES.

We briefly mentioned in our last the mournful intelligence of the assassination of the Rev. L. Janvier, of the Loodiana mission. The Rev. J. T. Gracey, a friend of the deceased, writes from Seetapore (Oude) to the New York Methodist giving the following details:—

Mr. Janvier, with his wife and child, visited in March last what is called the Hoolie Festival, at Mundpore or Arundpore, in the Hoshiarpore district, on the Sutlej river. On Thursday night, the 24th, an Akali fanatic, a Seikh named Bhog Sing, who had been overheard by the police threatening to "take some Feringees' (Europeans') life," and who had been kept by the police, accordingly, under surveillance during the fair, attacked Mr. Janvier as he came out of his tent to give directions to his servants for next morning's march, and with three or four rapid blows of a club on the head rendered him insensible. He died the next morning, and was buried, I learn, at Loodiana. It is said great excitement prevailed among the people, who wanted to cut the murderer to pieces on the spot, and we learn that Mr. Janvier's "funeral was attended with marked respect by thousands of natives at Loodiana, where he had resided for years, doing good to all men."

There was no provocation whatever on the part of Mr. Janvier, as he had neither seen nor spoken to the murderer, who has been apprehended for trial, and alleges that he committed the deed in revenge of some imaginary insults passed on him by the English, and that he had vowed to take vengeance on any European at the first opportunity.

The papers of India are teeming with encomiums on Mr. Janvier. One paper says: "He was the most loving and gentle of men, and probably in the missionary labours of a life in India never hurt the feelings of one human being. He was a missionary of a high order; learned, wise, gentle, humble, winning; whose loving, benevolent life preached most touchingly the Gospel of his Master. His course was fully run; and one of the gentlest spirits ever given to man has been enlisted in the great army of martyrs." Such unqualified encomiums are rare, and when bestowed, even more rarely deserved, but none who knew Mr. Janvier will wish to detract a shade from the eulogy. He would have been counted a man of rare merit among any class, in any line of duty amongst men. The missionary Church of India will mourn that "the mighty have fallen," yet will gather a fresh impulse from the event, when she learns that a life in which have combined the meekness of Moses and the devotion of "the disciple whom Jesus loved," has been so rudely terminated. Mr. Janvier had laboured for over twenty years as a missionary, and as translator of the Scriptures into Punjabee, but when the great day of reckoning shall reveal the high and holy impulses which shall have emanated from the tragic close of so quiet a life, it is a question whether it will not be found, that of the enemies of the Lord, "the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life," for it is true to-day as ever it was that "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church." And call his death whatever modification of martyrdom you may, the same class of feelings are engendered in us, and the same sort of influences started, when our brethren by our side perish from exposure to "peril among heathen."

The Friend of India states that Mr. Janvier had united with his associates in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, immediately before he received the fatal blow. Three days afterwards, another member of the same mission fell also by the hand of an assassin. The Calcutta correspondent of the leading journal writes:—

Among the members of the Loodiana mission, to which Mr. Janvier belonged, none were more accomplished in the languages of the country than Mr. Lowenthal. At three o'clock on the morning of the 27th of April he was shot in the head, and died two hours afterwards. The event is a mystery to the authorities, who have inquired into it. The one ascertained fact is that there was no fanatical motive for the commission of the deed. The missionary's own chokeydar, a Mushee, was the murderer. He had been in Mr. Lowenthal's employment about three months. The deceased had adopted the Indian custom of rising very early in the morning, and very often would stroll about the premises in the darkness of night. It was on such an occasion that he met his death. A police patrol heard a shot and went up to the gate of his house, where he was met by the chokeydar, who said that his carbine had gone off by accident. The man may have been frightened when he told this lie, or the crime may have been a wilful one; at any rate, he went away with his wife and child directly the patrol had passed on. Another servant heard some low groans in the front verandah of the house, and found his master lying there in a dying state. Police were sent after the murderer, and he was found hiding in a field. He states that he saw a figure moving about in the darkness, and thought it was a thief. When he found that it was his master whom he had shot he was seized with a panic and ran away. The authorities at Peshawur have been making a searching investigation into all the circumstances, and I learn that they are not satisfied with the truth of the man's statement. They have found cause to suspect that others of the servants had some share in the crime, and they especially suspect a khidmutgar, who is a Mussulman. It is supposed that the ill-fated gentleman had given his servants some offence in the regulation of his household affairs.

ALGERIA.

EVANGELICAL AGENCIES AND RELIGIOUS WANTS.

The article in our last number, headed "Successful Labours of a Spanish Exile" (p. 282), has elicited the following additional information, respecting the scene of his zealous efforts, from the pen of an English clergyman:—

Milan, June 11, 1864.

Whilst spending the late winter at Algiers, I became personally acquainted with that devoted servant of God, M. Ruett, and had abundant opportunity of remarking his character and his work, and cannot speak too strongly of his personal piety, humility, and zeal, as well as of his eloquence and untiring energy as a minister of the Gospel. He seems to me to be specially called and fitted for the work given him.

M. Ruett was for a considerable time under the instruction of Dr. De Sanctis, from whom he got clear and sound theological views. At the time of his coming to Algiers he had no certain income and depended for months upon the Lord's bounty through private charities. He was subsequently allowed so much a-year by the Paris Evangelical Society, which also supports a Spanish colporteur. The Protestant Consistory at Algiers recognises his labours, and not only opened the Protestant Chapel for him to preach in, but added to his stipend.

In Algeria there is by far a greater number of Spanish than French settlers—they number to is—who, until M. Ruett's arrival, had no them of salvation full and free, through our Lord. M. Ruett not only preaches but also visits the neighbouring towns within a radius of upwards of twenty congregations vary; sometimes the halls are filled, at other times, the ing warned the people of the "heretic," are fewer. Yet as he preaches on ng heart, a glowing zeal, and a flowing many Spaniards are led to the fountain l forsake the turbid stream of Roman

The these mountains are visible across the Algiers, and are usually covered with having examined the children in various subjects, put them to a pretty close test as to their Biblical and general religious knowledge. Upon the whole I was well pleased, and think that with sound Evangelical instructors and united prayer for God's blessing, it might become a nursery for young Pro- testants, and exercise a wide and beneficial in- fluence. The institution is in debt, and has for some time languished, in consequence of not having at its head, upon the spot, a man of God with his whole heart in the work, a guiding spirit to direct and develop its daily modus operandi.

Socinianism runs strong at Algiers, and exercises a prejudicial influence upon the English society there during the winter. The "Essays and Re- views," Colenso's works, and Renan's "Life of Christ," are its artillery. The Saviour and the Holy Spirit are openly sneered at, and made the subjects of ridicule and witticism. The former is allowed to have been a good man, a moral teacher, whom the Jews put to death, just as the Athenians put their good teacher, Socrates, to death. But as to the Holy Ghost, His existence is utterly ignored, and His power laughed at as the vagary of enthusiasm. During the late winter the half of the English residents were Socinians, who apparently attended no place of worship and preserved no outward form of religion. Alas! that England's sons and daughters should so present Protestantism to Roman Catholics and Moslems!

Towards the end of the season, in the month of April, Mr. Rogers and some friends employed a man to sell Bibles, Testaments, Psalters, Gospels, and tracts at a stall, close to the market-place; but I fear, as it was so late in the season, and was the effort of only a few, it could not be carried on per- manently. If a few Christians would unite and subscribe a pound a-week for the support of a col- porteur, no doubt God's Word, in Arabic, Hebrew, French, Italian, Spanish, and English, would sell largely. The utmost freedom, toleration, and pro- tection are afforded by the French Government. Mr. Rogers and others distributed hundreds of tracts among the soldiers, who received them with avidity. The curé of the parish was displeased, complained to the Brigadier that the English were distributing pamphlets among his troops. The Brigadier called upon Mr. Rogers, who explained matters, and showed him the tracts. The Briga- dier was satisfied, and saw it was an affair of the curé. The Prefect of Police was next turned to, but Mr. Rogers appeared at the office, again ex- plained the matter, and then inquired if there was any law to prevent his distributing such tracts. The magistrate shrugged his shoulders, said there was not, and that it was the curé's affair, and not that of the police.

tion of this diminished interest in a class of meetings which formerly attracted multitudes. But this year, in addition to every other drawback, the anniversaries had to contend with the absorbing interest awakened by the war. The Christian Commission was more fortunate than the older and permanent societies in appealing directly to the patriotic feeling of the people; and accordingly it assembled on a stormy night an audience of thousands. This excellent society has just set out upon a large undertaking. Your readers may have noticed that the great fair for the Sanitary Commission placed more than a million of dollars at the command of that organization. The Christian Commission is attempting to raise a similar sum by the direct gifts of its friends; and there is little room to doubt of its complete success.

CHRISTIAN UNION—THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

I alluded a month ago to some tendencies toward Christian union, of which I hoped by this time to be able to speak more definitely. In one direction my expectation has been disappointed. When I wrote, many were looking forward to the approaching anniversary of the American Bible Society as the occasion of healing a painful breach which had long existed among those who are equally interested in the diffusion of the sacred Scriptures. Thirty years ago the Baptist Churches, which up to that time had co-operated with other denominations in the national society, considered themselves aggrieved by the refusal of the society to contribute funds for the printing of versions which had been prepared by their missionaries. They accordingly withdrew from the American Bible Society, and formed another within their own denomination. The separation has been a matter of regret to both parties, and of late hearty efforts have been made to restore the relations which were so pleasant and becoming. The basis of such restoration is not easy to define; and it is beyond doubt that only this practical difficulty has at this time prevented the reunion which all have desired. But whether that difficulty shall be surmounted, or shall prove to be insuperable, it is pleasant to know that an excited strife has all burned out, and that if the divided brethren do not henceforth work together, it is from a difference of views, and not at all from a difference of feeling.

THE OLD AND THE NEW SCHOOL PRESBYTERIANS.

The two Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church have just closed their sessions, and the signs of fraternal confidence and sympathy which the two bodies have for some years been manifesting toward each other continue to increase. It is a quarter of a century, as your readers may know, since the "Presbyterian Church in North America" was rent into two parts. The occasion was variously described. By some it was found chiefly in a difference in doctrine; and hence the popular designation of the two bodies as "Old School" and "New School." But there were unquestionably grave differences of policy, and these were at least as keenly felt as the others. But whatever the causes, the separation was made, and it was embittered by sharp and long-continued discussion and recrimination. There is nothing more grateful in the present history of American piety than the Christian and manly advances which these two parts of a divided household are making towards each other. When, a year ago, the first delegate from one of the bodies stood on the floor of the other, and with a voice tremulous at once with age and with emotion made touching reference to the painful past and to the present signs of mutual forgiveness and love, the scene was such as one witnesses but once in a lifetime. Uplifted faces all around the speaker glowed with delight and flowed with tears. Grey-haired men, who had been foremost in the fierce debate, were foremost in their visible joy over the returning affection. And when the hymn, "Blest be the tie that binds," had been sung in the highest style of tearful feeling, every man grasped his neighbour's hand with expressions of wonder and of thanksgiving to God.

The passage of a year has not diminished the motives to this fraternal affection, but increased them. Beyond doubt, the matter of slavery had much to do with the dismemberment of the Presbyterian Church. But upon that subject there are now no divided opinions. The Assembly which has been thought to be the most cautious in its policy concerning that great wrong, has this year unanimously adopted a long and explicit paper, one sentence of which fairly exhibits the spirit of the whole. It asserts the conviction of the Assembly that "the time has at length come, in the providence of God when it is His will that every vestige of human slavery among us should be effaced, and that every Christian man should add himself with industry and earnestness to his appropriate part in the performance of this great duty." Surely the Assemblies can hereafter have no difference of feeling on the score of slavery.

How rapidly, or in what way, these two most respectable and influential bodies may pass from their present friendship into that former organic unity, it is impossible to foresee. But it is manifest that they are already fulfilling every condition of substantial Christian union. One of the pleasantest signs of this union that appear late sessions, was the concerted voice of the same hour by the two in thanksgiving and prayer, in behalf of the nation.

REFORMED DUTCH CHURCH AND ITS CHINESE MISSION.

General Synod of the Reformed Church, which is now in session, occupied in considering a grave question which some readers of Christendom will be interested in. It concerns the ecclesiastical relations of the churches established by the missionaries of the Synod's The Reformed Dutch Church has for years defined and reaffirmed her policy of holding her mission churches in friendly union with herself. This is the favourite policy of Presbyterianism in this country. But the missionaries of the Dutch Church in China have rather at the establishment of a Church, and accordingly have encouraged ecclesiastical union between the congregations which they have organised and those which have been organised by English missionaries of similar faith and practice. The Synod, therefore, has now to consider the unanimous objection of its missionaries at Amoy to the policy which it reasserted a year ago. The question awakens the deepest interest in the body; and it is hard to believe that the views of those most worthy and successful men, when so confidently and seriously expressed, and so ably maintained, can fail of their effect. There is already in the Reformed Dutch Church a large body who have not needed the arguments of the missionaries to convince them that the Synod has asserted a mistaken policy, and that English and American missionaries do well to build up together a church for China. I hope to write you in my next letter that the views of these have prevailed.

ittings of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury were resumed on the 1st of last month. A very important step was taken by both Houses. It may be remembered that soon after the first ferment raised by the publication of "Essays and Reviews" the Upper House moved the Upper that the subject should be taken in condemnation of the book. The subject was, however, postponed on the ground that the question would be more properly a legal tribunal of which some of the members were members. The Judicial Committee of the Council having given judgment, the subject was renewed at the ensuing session, and the Committee of the Upper House was directed to examine the book. That Committee gave in its report on Tuesday, the 1st of last month, specifying several errors of doctrine in the Essays, and ending with a formal condemnation of the book. The adoption of this report was moved by the Bishop of Exeter and opposed by the Bishop of London, on the ground that it was undesirable to show an interest in a book that had well nigh been consigned into oblivion. The report was, however, adopted, and a formal condemnation of the book by the Bishops of London, Lincoln, and Exeter. The Archbishop of Canterbury very emphatically expressed his concurrence in this course, stating his belief that if they did not adopt it they would be betraying that trust which their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ had committed to them. He desired that that moderate censure, that moderate condemnation, should be the act of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury. The censure was conveyed in the following terms:—

That this Synod having appointed committees of the Upper and Lower House to examine and report upon the volume entitled "Essays and Reviews," and the said committees having severally reported thereon, doth hereby synodically condemn the said volume as containing teaching contrary to the doctrine received by the United Church of England and Ireland, in common with the whole Catholic Church of Christ.

This resolution was then sent down to the Lower House, which concurred in it by a majority of 39 to 19.

The other proceedings, in either House, were not important. We may mention, however, that the Archbishop of Canterbury presented a petition, addressed to the "Most noble Church in London," from priests, monks, and pilgrims in Jerusalem who had suffered persecution from the Armenians. It appeared that the King of Abyssinia had persecuted these persons, and it was supposed that he had done so in consequence of the withdrawal of the protectorate. His Grace said that he had seen Earl Russell on the previous day on the subject, and the earl had informed him that a letter had been sent to the King of Abyssinia, in consequence of which he hoped the persecutions would be stopped.

ADDRESS TO THE ARCHBISHOPS.

It will be remembered that the "Oxford Declaration," as it was called, with reference to the judgment of the Privy Council, was signed by clergymen only. An address has been lately drawn up to the two Archbishops, expressing their gratitude for the pastoral letters they had addressed to the Church on the subject of the present heresies. It is extensively signed among both the Evangelical and High Church parties, comprising some of the most eminent names in the kingdom. Among them we may mention the Duke of Marlborough, the Marquis Cholmondeley, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Attorney-General, Mr. Napier (late Lord Chancellor of Ireland), Mr. Walpole, Mr. Henley, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, and a host of others. The following is a copy of this address :—

To his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England and Metropolitan; to his Grace the Lord Archbishop of York, Primate of England and Metropolitan :—

We, the undersigned clergymen and laymen of the several provinces of England and Ireland, hereby acknowledge with deep gratitude the pastorals lately issued by your Graces to the two provinces of Canterbury and York. Our fervent prayer is that your Graces may be richly endowed with wisdom from on high, and may be enabled, with the other Primates and Bishops of the United Church of England and Ireland, to take effectual counsel for upholding, amid the peculiar dangers of the present times, the Divine authority of Holy Scripture and the integrity of the faith, so that the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour may be taught in all its purity among ourselves, and handed on, without diminution or addition, to our children's children.

Objections have been taken to this address, that, among other things, it implies a slight on the Bishop of London. The promoters emphatically deny this. The friends of the Bishop appear to be under the impression that the address is for the part the Archbishops took in the judgment, in which the Bishop undoubtedly differed from them, but it bears on the face of it to be simply for the pastorals their Graces issued after the judgment had been delivered.

DR. COLENZO.

The Metropolitan Bishop of Cape Town, having served a formal notice of deposition upon Dr. Colenso, and thus declared the see of Natal vacant, the latter has appealed by petition to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, praying that the proceedings of the Bishop of Cape Town with reference to him may be declared null and of no effect. The case has been ordered to stand over until the sittings of the Judicial Committee, after Michaelmas term.

THE LATE CANON CURETON.

The Rev. William Cureton, D.D., F.R.S., Canon of Westminster, Rector of St. Margaret's, and Chaplain to the Queen, died on the 17th ult. He was born in 1808, and his early life was not without its struggles. Having selected a particular line of study, however, he devoted himself to it with great industry, and at length achieved a European reputation as a Syriac scholar. His most celebrated work is his version of the Epistle of St. Ignatius, which occasioned some controversy, in consequence of his endeavour to prove that only three out of the seven reputed epistles were genuine.

THE CALVIN TERCENTENARY.

The annual soirée of the Evangelical Alliance took place on Friday evening, May 27 at Freemasons' Hall, being the Tercentenary of the death of Calvin, and, in accordance with the intimation already made in these pages, was specially convened on that day, to commemorate the event. The attendance was numerous. The chair was taken by Lord Calthorpe, President of the Alliance.

The Rev. T. R. Birks delivered the first address. He remarked that the great problem of these times, perhaps the most difficult of all intellectual, theological, and ecclesiastical problems, was to combine two opposite tendencies, firm adherence to the truth, and the exercise of a spirit of love and charity. Now the Evangelical Alliance represented in its structure the principle, not of compromise but of forbearance towards divergent tendencies on secondary questions. On the other hand, the great characteristic of the Reformation whose memory they now celebrated was the firmness and simplicity of his faith. He believed that the problem which it was hardest for Christians to solve was how to combine suaviter in modo with the fortiter in re; how to unite a due consideration for the prejudices and feelings of others with firmness as to great central truths. The Hon. and Rev. Bp. Noel spoke of the connexion between the religious experience of Calvin and the other Reformers, and their subsequent labours. He observed, that if Luther and Calvin were restored to life, and appeared among Chris-as in the present day, they would find that the work of Reformation had yet to be completed, and he urged the young ministers especially who were present to endeavour to teach Christ more clearly, and to contend for greater unity on the basis of salvation by Christ. The Rev. W. Arthur said he was no admirer of that part of Calvin's views in which Calvin differed from the great majority of evangelical Christians; on the contrary, he thought that part of his views was a great pity; but in the great body of truth which Calvin taught, in his opinion that man was totally lost by nature, and that he could be restored by faith in Christ alone, he heartily agreed, and he would rather hear of Calvin, than to Mr. Spurgeon, denouncing his Arminian views, than unite with a man who would so him and fraternise with him on account of those views, and at the same time cast doubt on that redemption by Christ as the means of fallen man's recovery. (Cheers.) Rev. Dr. Thomas M'Crie said, as an old Calvinist, he highly valued the honour which was then being paid to the name of John Calvin. The doctor delivered a long and fluent speech on the personal character of the great Reformer. The devotional exercises of the evening were led by the Revs. T. W. Tyler, and W. M. Bunting. The adjournment was pronounced by the Rev. S. Thomson.

The Tercentenary was celebrated at Edinburgh by a meeting in the Free Church Hall. Dr. Dalhousie presided, and the meeting was attended by ministers of the Free, United Presbyterian, and Reformed Presbyterian Churches. Professor Lindsay, of Glasgow, spoke for his subject "The Character of Calvin." Principal Fairbairn addressed himself to "The Theology of Calvin." Dr. Andrew Thomson spoke of "What Scotland owes to Calvin," through Knox; and Dr. Reid delivered a "Vindication of Calvin from Modern Misrepresentations." The proceedings were brought to a practical conclusion by a few remarks from Principal Fairbairn, who showed "the claims which Calvin has upon the gratitude and aid of the Reformed Churches," and made an appeal on behalf of the Calvin Memorial Hall at Geneva.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

The General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, on Monday, the 23rd of May, the same day with the Established Church, and sat for a period of ten days. We may remark, too, that, with the exception of the countenance afforded to the Establishment by the State throwing a thin, pale halo of the presence of Royalty around its gatherings, the forms of the two bodies are in all respects the same. Principal Fairbairn (Free Church College), who was unanimously elected Moderator, delivered an able address, in which he remarked upon the danger of a Church settling down into a formal and dead orthodoxy, unaccompanied by the life and power of godliness. He pointed to the recent decisions of the Privy Council for the Church of England as affording a practical illustration of the dire consequences of the want of Church discipline and a definite creed.

An appeal against a decision of the Presbytery of Strathbogie, which, having inserted in their minutes a graceful tribute to the memory of the late Duchess of Gordon, had resolved to delete from the minutes the amendment of a minority, on the ground that it contained severe and unwarrantable reflections on the memory of the late Duchess, was heard, and the parties concerned spoke at considerable length, after which Principal Candlish moved that the Assembly, while ruling that it was incompetent for an inferior Court to delete any part of the res gestæ of its own minute, appoint the amendment to which the appeal referred to be deleted, and instruct the Presbytery accordingly. The Earl of Dalhousie seconded the motion, which was unanimously carried.

The report of the Finance Committee showed an increase of subscriptions of about 1,100% over those of last year, the total amount, 343,134*l.*, being the largest in any year since that of the Disruption. The Sustentation Fund amounted, this year, to 116,324*l.* The Earl of Dalhousie, on the request by the clerk for leave to print among other manuscript reports one on colleagues and successors having reference to the retirement of Dr. Guthrie, paid a warm tribute to the personal qualities and public services of the reverend doctor. The noble Earl proposed that a minute expressive of the feeling of the Assembly on Dr. Guthrie's retirement should be recorded, which was agreed to. Dr. Buchanan, convener of the Committee on Union, laid on the table the report of that committee. The report set out with a statement of the distinctive principles on which the committees of the Free and United Presbyterian Churches differ, and detailed the proceedings of the Reformed, United Presbyterian, and Original Secession Synods on the question. After reading the various communications from these bodies,

Dr. Buchanan explained the purport and supported the object of the report in a speech of some length. Dr. Candlish moved the reappointment of the committee under the former instructions. Dr. Julius Wood made a counter motion to the general effect that, in view of the differences and difficulties which beset the question of union, the committee should be directed rather to seek to promote harmonious co-operation among, than to bring about union between the Churches. After several members of Assembly had spoken on both sides, the discussion was adjourned. At a subsequent sitting it was resumed by Professor Gibson, and continued for four hours, when, in deference to the general feeling of the House, Dr. Wood withdrew his motion, and that of Dr. Candlish was unanimously adopted. Next day, deputations from the Irish Presbyterian Church and the English Presbyterian Church, charged to express sympathy and satisfaction with the Union movement, were received, heard, and thanked.

The report of the College Committee was given in by Principal Candlish. The statistics contained in it, as far as they relate to the supply of candidates for the ministry, were regarded as far from encouraging. The report on Popery was given in by Dr. Begg. In his speech, the reverend doctor censured the apathy and indifference with which Papal aggression is regarded by those possessed of power and influence in the country. He also referred to the rumoured intention of the Pope to appoint an Archbishop of Edinburgh, stating that the brother of a peer, himself a nobleman, was understood to be the person selected for the office. After some remarks from Principal Candlish and others, Mr. Dunlop, M.P., said he must still maintain the opinion he held and expressed in that House last year, and for which he gave his reasons. He would not give the least countenance to the policy of Mr. Whalley. For he must say that, next to the skill and talent with which the Popish cause is prosecuted and advanced by its own supporters—next to that, as a means of advancing its interests, is the injudiciousness of some of our advocates.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

Lord Stenton and Belhaven was the Royal Commissioner appointed to represent the Sovereign at this year's meeting of the Assembly, as he has been for many years past—in fact, every year that the Whigs have been in office since the time of Earl Grey. After the usual formalities, the retiring Moderator, Dr. Craik, of Glasgow, proposed Dr. Pirie, of Aberdeen, as his successor, which was unanimously agreed to. The Queen's letter to the Assembly was then read, assuring the venerable body, in formal and stereotyped phrase, of the continuance of her Royal favour, and enclosing the annual donation of 2,000*l.* for the promotion of education in the Highlands and Islands. The Moderator also, in formal terms, acknowledged the Royal bounty, and accepted the gift.

A discussion of some interest took place respecting the bill introduced into the House of Lords by the Duke of Buccleuch to remove the disabilities that now prevented Episcopalian clergymen, ordained by Scottish bishops, from accepting livings in England. Dr. Lee, of Edinburgh, called attention to this bill, as one that might—he did not say that would—affect the interest and position of the Scottish Establishment. Dr. Bissett, a late moderator, and several of the lay members of the Assembly, expressed their inability to see how the bill relating to another community could at all affect them. It was agreed, however, to refer the bill to a committee, and there the matter ended.

The other business before the Assembly was for the most part of a local character, if we except a rather interesting discussion, which took place at one of the sittings, on the subject of innovations in public worship. A few years ago, Dr. Lee, of Edinburgh, introduced a liturgy into his church of the Greyfriars, with responses on the part of the congregation. He also introduced the English custom of standing to sing, and kneeling or bending the person in prayer. These innovations were stoutly objected to at the time, and the Assembly came to a deliverance enjoining the doctor to abstain from the practice of reading his prayers, but giving no deliverance on the other points. The doctor, we believe, complied with the injunction so far, that he did not use his prayer-book, but he adopted the words all the same; and, of course, there was nothing to prevent his congregation from using their copies of the book in their pews. Since then some other ministers of the Church have shown a disposition to follow his example, and the subject was brought up again in the course of the proceedings of the Assembly, but no new judgment was adopted.

The Moderator, in his closing address, congratulated the Assembly on the generally satisfactory state of their mission agency both at home and abroad, and then proceeded to refer to the progress of the Established Church at twenty years, characterising the assertion that she now re-her pale only a small fragment of on of Scotland. He spoke in of the Free Church, counsel-ling the Assembly to manifest towards their brethren of that denomination a true spirit of Christian conciliation, and to speak of all Dissenters with becoming courtesy and kindness.

Miscellaneous.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

GREECE.

Thompson, agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Western Turkey, has been at Athens on behalf of the society, to present a copy of the Greek Scriptures to the First. His Majesty received Dr. Thompson, who was accompanied by Dr. King, editor of the Star of the East, very affably, and expressed his pleasure at the Bible in modern Greek, and his obligations to the society for it. Dr. King mentions the formation of a society, by the twenty-five or twenty-six editors of the Star of the East at Athens, which is "to meet once a-week to discuss subjects connected with the country." By a large majority, they chose Dr. Kalopothakes for their president. He is the only one, Dr. King writes, "who, during my late troubles, ventured to boldly and take my part, and combat the 'Holy Synod of Greece';" declaring himself in favour of entire liberty of speech and discussion on religious subjects.

TURKEY.

Dr. Wood, Secretary of the American Board, has been visiting its missions in the East. He writes from Constantinople that there is much to pain the heart in the present state of Evangelical Protestantism in this city and vicinity, as compared with what it was an or twenty years ago, when he was a missionary there :—

Dr. Wood] its native adherents, though fewer in number, and amid obloquy and were full of zeal for the conversion of souls. Some, indeed, had a too strong disposition to rely on minor points, being more ready to denounce the priesthood and errors of the Romish Churches than to dwell on the spiritual themes of the Gospel; but a large number showed a warm interest in making known the way of salvation, and persuading men to it. Now, unhappily, we see but little of this. Instead of taking out the New Testament, and calling attention to its teachings on all proper occasions, as they did then, their conversational topics are worldly things, and the spirit of worldliness seems to fill their hearts. Then, their confidence in missionary teachers, and attachment to them, were unbounded. Now, many are full of distrust, and there is among them a readiness to take offence which is deplorable. We have heard that, among a large proportion of them, far more of thought and conversation is given to the alleged mistakes and faults of missionaries than with topics which minister to their comfort.

Dr. Wood adverts to the causes of this lamentable state of things :—

The increase of business activity—connected with the great enlargement of commercial intercourse between Europe and the provinces of this empire—and the influx of Occidental civilization, together with a mightily disturbing force on the public mind; and, by the absorption of the excitement of unfounded hopes, sadly hinder our spiritual work. A chief cause of uneasiness towards the missionaries is, that after so many years, the Protestant cause has so little to offer to institutions of education, and the adherence to it of men of wealth and high social position combined with certain other universal elements of human nature, this feeling of disapprobation to disapproval of our general policy and a desire for one that we cannot adopt, has led to long controversy respecting the mutual relations of missionaries and native pastors and the system of operations carried on by the funds of the American Board and the Turkish Bible Society. The subject of disagreement has not been forms of Church order or worship; and in what form, there should be a taking of the native element into the councils of the Church, in determining the use of funds committed to their hands for disbursement.

An Armenian ex-priest, named Vertanes, who was for some time a helper on the staff of the American mission, but who so conducted himself as to compel his dismissal, has been holding separate services, with the view, it is believed, of leading to the formation of a Reformed Armenian Church, which is to be Evangelical, but as little removed from the Armenian Church as possible. The pastor and some of the members of the Pera Church are annoyed by his action; but they confess sympathy with his avowed object. Dr. Wood remarks :—

It is very happy to say that the excellent representatives of the Church Missionary Society, who are sent to the Mohammedans, and with whom we are on the best of terms, advise the Pera Church, in reply to individual applications made to them, as I am informed, to turn again to the source from which they first received their knowledge of the truth. It is possible that they may do this, if they do not succeed in their present plan of getting foreign aid; but they are not prepared to do it now. The freedom of conscience, which it is the present policy of the Armenian ecclesiastics and leaders of opinion to tolerate in their Church, proves a snare to many. Not only are partially-awakened minds within its fold kept from breaking away, but the kind words and artful appeals addressed to the Protestants unsettle such of them as have not discernment to perceive whereunto what is desired of them would lead. The low state of piety generally prevalent in our churches disposes many who do not agree with the Pera church in its policy, or who approve it only in part, to desire to sink out of sight, as much as possible, the difference between Protestants and the Oriental Churches. Consequently, they are restive under that style of preaching and publication which once fell below their tone of feeling.

Notwithstanding all these drawbacks, Dr. Wood experienced great comfort in the evidence which he saw of the reality of grace amid imperfections and of progress in many respects—

It is a significant fact, that the natives of Constantinople, who pride themselves on their metropolitan birth, are passed by, and the power of Divine truth is exhibited chiefly among the more simple-minded people from the provinces. And when I look on the whole field, and see what God has done at Marash, Oorfa, Diarbekir, Kharpoot, Arabkir, and many places nearer the capital, raising up churches, more than forty in number—and some of them large and rapidly increasing—since my removal from the country in 1850, and then contemplate the great extension in our system of operations, the valuable literature created, the spread of the Word of God, and other productions of the press, and the manifest progress of thought beyond the bounds of the Protestant organizations, I am filled with joyfulness at beholding such a spectacle.

The Protestants of Bitlis have at different times suffered much persecution, and the work has been in various ways greatly hindered by the bitter opposition of the bishop of the place. The American missionaries now write that their prospects are more encouraging:—

Amongst other things, 200 piastres worth of Bibles, which had been lent to the people—for fear that if they were given or sold to them their priests would burn them—this bishop seized upon, refusing to restore them either to the people or to the missionaries, or to pay for their value. He did all in his power to break up the Protestant schools, and in many other ways to destroy the work in Bitlis. Lately the bishop visited the head-quarters at Constantinople, and, to his astonishment, he found himself far behind the times! The enlightened and liberal spirit of the progressive party here utterly amazed him. He was at first enraged, then troubled, finally pleased. He ended, so it would seem, in adopting some of the sentiments of the Progressionists. He returned to Bitlis and restored the Bibles, withdrew his prohibition from attendance on the Protestant schools, and now urges his people to establish good schools amongst themselves, that they may not live and die like ignorant heathen!

From Kharpoot a missionary writes:—

Our schools and congregations, in the city and at the majority of our out-stations, were never so full; the sales of Scriptures were never so large as within the past two months, and that notwithstanding such poverty of the people as has not been known for many years; the people were never so liberal; and our Church members were never so active in labours to enlighten others. There is good prospect of a supply of the right men and women for our two schools.

EGYPT.

Dr. Wood, Secretary of the American Board, while passing through Egypt lately visited the United Presbyterian mission at Cairo. He speaks of the agents as men of the right stamp for a position requiring very high missionary qualifications, and goes on to say:—

They occupy premises which were given to the mission by Said Pasha, the late Viceroy. The building was formerly a hospital. It stands on the Esbekieh, or great public square, and furnishes apartments for three or four families, several convenient schoolrooms, and a chapel for public worship. The gift was a singular act of generosity in a Mussulman ruler, and secures to the mission advantages which are above its great money value. I was pleased to ascertain that the policy of the brethren, in respect to the mode of conducting schools, and the principles of intercourse with the people and ecclesiastics, is similar to that of our missions, and that the success realised is far beyond what I had supposed it to be. Opposition begins to be made by the Coptic ecclesiastical authorities, but as yet without any great effect. A church of forty members has been gathered. A boys' school, in which Christianity is taught fully and plainly, contains five or six Moslems among the seventy or eighty scholars. It has numbered about 150, of whom from thirty to forty were Moslems; but the present Pasha, by establishing new schools and holding out special inducements, has drawn away most of the latter. Two girls' schools are flourishing, and several of the pupils give evidence of piety. Of the church members, all but six or seven are adults, and only five or six are females. The circulation of the Scriptures, and other religious books, is on a scale which I was not prepared to expect. While the work of the mission takes hold more especially of the Copts, it is by no means confined to them.

Dr. Wood also speaks of the gratification he experienced in Alexandria in seeing the noble establishment of the devoted German ladies, the "Prussian Deaconesses," containing 212 female pupils, of all the nationalities except Turks, who are receiving an education under a strong Evangelical influence.

SYRIA.

We have mentioned, more than once, the disinterested efforts of the British Consul at , Mr. Skene, for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the Arab tribes roving between the Taurus and the Euphrates. The report of the Moslem Missionary Society, just issued, under Mr. Skene's influence, considerable portions of these tribes have turned their swords into harrows, and their spears into pruning-hooks. Fertile wastes have been reclaimed. The swift and dromedary have given place to the yoke of oxen and the plough. Comfortable cottages have superseded the black tents of Kedar. Some forty new settlements have thus been effected. At Mr. Skene's suggestion, six forts were built along the cordon of settlements, and 150 horsemen are stationed at each fort, with a couple of light field-pieces, for the protection of these novel settlers. It is these settlements that the Moslem Mission Society carry on their work, at the solicitation, and with active co-operation of the people themselves.

The society's agent, Cas Butros, is described by Mr. Consul Skene as a successful and zealous missionary. "He allows the fire of his character at times to appear, and was called Butros—i.e., Peter. From childhood to middle age he was shut up in a monastery, of which he was latterly superior, and he has retained some notions of every-day life which do not belong to the world as it is." We are further told that—

"For himself he requires very little. A piece of bread and a glass of water are to him equal to a dinner, and he sleeps on the ground in the desert as soundly as at home. But his openness towards others seems incorrigible. I have been in the habit of helping him, but I cannot do so, and I fear I have done him harm rather than good, as he has found it too easy to come to money to meet the outlay of his hospitality and generosity. I firmly believe he will, in time, become a great Mussulman movement. All he wants is to have his mind free from worldly cares, and devote himself entirely to his work.

Towards the close of last year two converts from Mohammedanism were baptized by Butros. Mr. Skene writes, under date of May 2, as follows :—

"Cas Butros returned from Telet Aishah very unwell, and has been confined to his room some time. He is now well, I am glad to say. In spite of his illness, he has not been altogether inactive, and with his usual success, he has brought three of the Mussulmans, who are in the habit of spending part of their time in his house, to the verge of declaring themselves. Two of them, * * *, and * * *, by name, are men of about thirty years of age, and respectable characters. The third, * * *, is a woman, and I have advised him not to press his conversion for the present, lest opposition should be made by the Sheikhs and Imams, on the ground of his being a minor. One of the former two will be baptized at once, but Cas Butros is prudent, and says he will not be in haste about it.

Close to the ruins of Cesarea Philippi is a village called Ain Kunya, where persecution for the Gospel's sake gives evidence of the alarm of the enemy and of the progress of truth. The Rev. Mr. Eddy, of the American Board, writes that—

"Some three years ago, when persecution was strong in Deir Mimas, one Protestant fled from its vicinity to this place. Through his influence others have become enlightened, have abandoned their idolatrous rites, and, in spite of threats, stonings, and beatings, have stood firm. They support a Sunday school among themselves, and are appealing, we trust not in vain, to the Government in view of freedom of worship and conscience.

PERSIA.

Dr. Perkins writes, that the enemies of the Protestants have not yet disturbed them in their work, notwithstanding their threats to do so. He adds :—

"The British Ambassador is taking hold of the matter of the sore oppressions of the Nestorians with a vigorous hand, under instructions from his Government—thanks to Lord John Russell, and yet to Mr. Layard. The presence of Consul Glen here is a great restraint upon the oppressors, and in full sympathy with us in our work.

Another missionary speaks of the improved state of feeling, among the people, towards truth, owing in a measure to the conviction that the missionaries are their true friends in moral matters. The presence of the Holy Spirit is also manifest. "There is scarcely a village where there are not anxious souls, seeking to find their way to the fountain of living and cleansing blood."

INDIA.

In the city of Kolapoor are 252 idol temples, and but one building for the worship of the true God, just erected. An American missionary writes that "the statue of Lord Ganesha, in the Town Hall, is worshipped by the ignorant classes of Hindoos with as much devotion as is paid by them to the images of Bram or Shive ! This superstitious practice has lately extended itself to the Mohammedans. The worshippers are mostly women, and average no less than fifteen or twenty cocoa-nuts are broken daily on the base of the statue." Other cases are mentioned in which persons recently deceased have been deified and oblation is paid to their statues.

The Bishops of Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras have issued a pastoral letter to the members of the Church of England at home. It contains an energetic call for aid on behalf of the heathen and professedly Christian population, and states that while there is much to deplore, and while superstition is powerfully dominant, yet that the aspect of missions is full of encouragement. They allude with special thankfulness to the "self-denying zeal and successful work" of other Protestant bodies—in South Travancore, by the Congregationalists; in Choata Nagpore, by the Lutherans of Prussia; in Burmah, amongst the Karens, by Dr. Judson and his American successors; and in connexion with schools and colleges by the Free Church of Scotland. The bishops state that they do not propose to establish any new agency to carry out their designs, believing that the existing missionary societies are the obvious channels through which assistance may be rendered to Indian missions. They add that large masses of Englishmen are living in India in a state of spiritual destitution which is nearly as deplorable as that of the heathen, and they urge that if this evil be suffered to continue it will present a formidable obstacle to missionary progress. The three bishops have also addressed a pastoral letter to the clergy of the Church of England in India, urging upon them, in an earnest and loving spirit, the fulfilment of their responsibilities.

The sad details relating to the death of the Rev. Messrs. Janvier and Lowenthal, of the Loodiana mission, who were murdered within three days of each other, will be found in an earlier page. A third missionary—the Rev. Adam White, of Sassoor, in the Deccan—has been carried off by cholera. He had been indefatigable in his attention to those suffering around him from that fearful malady, and appears to have fallen a martyr to his devotedness.

CEYLON.

A missionary of the American Board, forwarding a "tabular view" of the Ceylon mission for the past year, says:—

Forty have been added to the churches during the year, on profession of faith. Eight have been excommunicated, six removed by death, and thirteen dismissed to unite with churches out of our connexion, which leaves a nett gain of thirteen members. Over 1,600 children and youth have been under instruction. We think there is steady progress in our work, though not as rapid as we should be glad to see.

CHINA.

The Christians of Fuh-chau, who, at the commencement of the year, suffered severely from the riots of a persecuting mob, have ceased to be molested, and are now quietly allowed to profess their religion. The Mandarins have made full compensation for damage done, and the Rev. Mr. Wolfe, of the Church mission, states that he has built up the chapel, school, and helpers' houses more substantial than ever. "Not one of our people," he says, "went back. The riots have done good. They have brought Christianity more under the notice and observation of the rulers and people. They have increased the zeal and boldness of our Christians, and have drawn forth some literary men as our defenders. A book has been written and circulated, defending the missionaries, and ridiculing the pretensions of the literary class." Mr. Wolfe is of opinion that this publication shows that Christianity is gaining ground.

Further south, at Khi-boey (Amoy district), the English Presbyterian missionaries report the baptism of eight men, who had been long on trial and stood the test well.

Still more to the south—inland from Swatow—two English Presbyterian missionaries have had opportunities of preaching the Gospel to many who heard it for the first time. One of these brethren, Dr. Gault, a medical missionary (his companion being the Rev. Mr. Smith), thus writes:—

I had my travelling medicine case with me, and got abundance of work during the next three days. The excitement was considerable, as there had been no foreigner there previously, except a German missionary, who visited the place about seventeen years ago. The opportunities for preaching on each of these days were good, and occasionally, when sent for to private houses, there were little groups gathered together, and these heard the Gospel of Jesus under favourable circumstances. I had to leave, as my medicines were becoming exhausted, and returned alone to Swatow, leaving Mr. Smith to take advantage of the occasion, solely for preaching. Next week I returned with a replenished medicine case, and stayed a few days more—altogether Mr. Smith was three Sabbaths there, and I two; while, in addition, a native assistant was with us part of the time. I have a list of upwards of 220 cases treated. The people were remarkably well disposed to us, and invited us in several instances to return.

JAPAN.

We have mentioned (Evangelical Christianity, 1863, p. 399) the formation, at Yokohama, of a congregation of American Protestants, and the grant of a site for their church and for misary residences by the Japanese Government. We now learn that the moment building operations were commenced the Government interfered and refused to allow them to proceed. Ten months' negotiation followed between the Japanese authorities and the United States Minister, on behalf of the Protestants and their pastor, who is also a missionary of the United Protestant Dutch Church. The result is, that another site, even more desirable than that originally granted, has been obtained. "It is the most valuable lot in the place," writes the missionary, "and if it is wisely managed, it can be made to support by itself this entire mission. All of it is not needed for the church and manse. A church erected here will be near to the Japanese part of the town, and in a position to attract the attention of all who land at this port, for it is close by the piers, where all business is done in the way of shipping and importing merchandise."

It is gratifying to see the United States Minister taking an interest not only in the materialities, but in the spiritual welfare of the new church and all upon whom its influence is brought to bear. The honourable gentleman thus writes:—

Our little church has of late had such rich blessings as to deserve special mention. While as yet no prospect exists of reaching the heathen, and the dark mantle of indifference, if not prejudice, hangs as a thick veil, which God will in His own good time lift, yet within a short year an ample field of labour and usefulness has been opened to it.

Since May we have about fifty ships on an average lying in this harbour, of which half have been men-of-war. You cannot imagine what scenes we have, alas! too often witnessed on shore. Thousands of seamen afloat, and these in turn sent ashore by hundreds for a holiday, with money in their pockets and rum cheap, what a liberal product of vice and drunkenness might be expected. Besides foreign liquors of every colour and mixture of adulteration, we have here the Japanese saki, the rice-wine, an abominable liquor which a cast-iron throat and stomach may regard as palatable, which has in the eyes of some the one merit of making rapidly and thoroughly drunk at the least possible cost. I have already mentioned in one of my letters the circumstance of a native man insisting on a sailor's holiday that it was the Sabbath day, because so many people were drunk.

In this direction, and among these men, God's Spirit is now moving and manifesting His omnipotent power. Two warrant officers and three seamen of the British fleet have already been received into the communion of our Church, and many others are now anxiously inquiring what they shall do to be saved!

The Romish priests who have been sent to Japan by the French Propaganda are pressing to erect a church, for which they have obtained a site from the Government at Yokohama. They write in an exulting tone to their friends at having been able to celebrate Mass on first Sunday in Lent, in a city where for two hundred years they had been prohibited from doing so, and which contains the remains of their twenty-six martyrs, crucified two or three years since by the Pope. They have already erected a church at Yokohama, for which a bell was lately baptized. "The reverend fathers of the foreign mission," we are told, "who have charge of the mission, left nothing undone to render the ceremony as imposing as possible. The French Minister at Japan and Admiral Jaurès were present, and gave their name to the bell."

SOUTH AFRICA.

From Hebron, a station of the French Protestant Society, a missionary writes that he has received into the Church nine converts from heathenism. Seven others, who were also candidates for baptism, he has retained, for the present, in his catechumen class.

One of the leading chiefs in Zululand, named Gaus, was lately thrown from his horse, and his arm broken, when within a short distance of the house of the Rev. Mr. Robertson, of the Propagation Society. The missionary ran to his assistance, brought him home, set the broken limb, and bound it in splints and bandages. For some time he remained with Mr. and Mrs. Robertson, and the latter, in a letter full of those delicate touches which could come from none but a female pen, describes the way in which this occurrence had brought them into closer contact and more friendly relations with their Zulu neighbours. The chief is described as a middle-aged man, with quiet dignity of manners and a very kind expression. While he lay on a couch, at the missionary's house—

It was a most interesting time to us [writes Mrs. Robertson], and we had no disagreeable inconveniences from the crowds of Zulus who came from all parts of the country to visit him. Our house has been covered with the spears and shields and sleeping mats of the different regiments and companies that have come to pay their respects to him, but it was all so orderly. Only the leading men were admitted to his presence, and the others seated in groups about. The king and Ketchwayo came several times to inquire for him, and each time an especial and earnest message to my husband to let him be removed until he thought fit. His own people wished so much to have him home; Gaus himself, not wishing to go, had been obliged often to send for Mr. Robertson and Usjabula (Christian native teacher) and Heber (a Christian native) to fight his battles for him. Ketchwayo's people said that when he heard of Gaus being with us, he sent to some white gentleman to inquire if our Umfundisi [teacher] were a skilful surgeon; and being assured that he was the most able man in the country, it was his express wish that he should remain here. We are quite at a loss to know how my husband has acquired such a reputation.

After the chief's recovery and return home, Mr. Robertson frequently visited him. Among other indications of the increased estimation in which he found he was now held, were these words addressed to him by Gaus: "I always knew how much you were liked at Kwamagwaza [where the mission is situate], but now every one knows you and loves you." "All this," adds Mrs. Robertson, "we treasure with deep thankfulness—it seems like a new blessing given us on our work in bringing them nearer to us."

This story of Gaus is not complete without the addition of two or three other points of interest, some of them, unhappily, tragic ones. Mr. Robertson, speaking of the chief himself, says:—

We have long been friends. He has great influence with Ketchwayo, and was present and helped me when I obtained permission from the prince for our two converts to become Christians. As a matter of course, the accident was attributed to witchcraft; and four people, a man, two women, and a little infant, have been killed. Eleven others were to have shared the same fate, but through the kind-heartedness of Gaus they were spared. The witch doctors were all agreed that there is something in the country that the ancestral spirits of the Zulu nation disapproved of. Then they hinted that the spirits were displeased at Gaus, because he was so intimate with an Umfundisi [teacher]; and finally they have come to the conclusion that they had a kind regard for him, in causing him to meet with the accident so near to one who could cure him. I did not know personally the people who were killed; but some of Gaus's headsmen, speaking to Usajabula about it, said that if they had been special friends of mine they would not have killed them; they would have given them to me to do what I liked with.

WESTERN AFRICA.

A letter from a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Monrovia, states that a remarkable awakening prevails among the natives within the bounds of the Monrovia district, and more than thirty of their number had been received into church-fellowship.

We mentioned in our February number (p. 95) the success which had attended the operations of the Church Missionary Society at Onitsha, on the Niger. It should be remembered that no European missionaries have ever been stationed here, the labourers being a native clergyman and native teachers. The diary of the former—the Rev. Mr. Taylor, who accompanied his colleague, the Rev. S. Crowther, in the autumn of 1862, up the Niger, and was landed at Onitsha, where he has since remained—has now come to hand. It contains some entries which ought not to pass unnoticed. Thus, we read:—

Oct. 27.—This afternoon Ewebo, Okosi's wife, brought up all her dumb idols, made of stick, and delivered them to me, as a proof that they had unitedly renounced the traditions of their forefathers.

Oct. 28.—This evening, to my joy, Mba, and Kari his wife, brought me all their idols, confessing that they have been long deceived under the traditions of their forefathers.

Nov. 3.—About midday, as I wiped my pen from translating, Onyeruro brought me all her idols, with tears in her eyes. Who would not be pleased to hear the following conversation which took place? "My dear Onyeruro, what led you to bring all these sticks to me?" "Eze Tsukum"—i.e., "My minister, I am convinced that idols are useless things, which cannot profit at all." "Do you wish now to give them up?" "That is my desire. Long time I have been praying that God would enable me and give me strength to take them away from my sight. I compare my state now as a new creature in the Gospel, and cannot bear to have these idols by me: to-day God has given me strength to bring them." "Allow me to ask you one or two questions more. On whom do you depend for strength?" "Nwa Tsuku, onye Bataram"—i.e., "On God the Son, my Redeemer." "Are you able to run this race by yourself?" "No." "What are you to do, then, in case trials should arise to try you?" "Agama welite obim elu owu nga ike ga biakitem"—i.e., "I will lift up my heart: it is there I shall receive strength." She pressed on me not to leave her out as a candidate at the up-roaching baptism.

Nov. 10.—Whilst busily engaged in translating St. Mark's Gospel, the people flocked in, and repeated nearly every word of what they heard yesterday. I was so glad, that I laid my pen by, and helped them on in the things pertaining to their everlasting peace, for therefore am I sent. About six o'clock P.M. Osakwe brought his dumb idols to me, and gravely deposited them in my hands, and said, "Ike agum na osisi na, oku Tsuku obago na obim ubua, ubotsi iziz abum onye nkafe"—i.e., "I am tired of these sticks" (meaning his idols), "for such they are. The Word of God enters now in my heart: once I was foolish."

Soon baptisms commenced, and persecution followed. Referring to the female converts, Mr. Taylor writes: "Some have been entirely abandoned and ejected by their so-called husbands; others have been deserted by their relatives; and some have been cruelly beaten and tortured." "The result of it, however," he adds, "has now filled the town, in which the Holy Scriptures and the claims of Jesus are a daily subject of inquiry."

Mr. Taylor mentions a case in which he had sought in vain to dissuade a rich heathen woman from sacrificing a human being in honour of her daughter, who had just died. A

A little slave girl was selected for slaughter at the funeral, and brutally killed, by being stricken on the head with a club.

SOUTH AMERICA.

A missionary narrates the particulars of a visit which he had received at Buenos Ayres from an Indian chief. He speaks of his tribe as sowing and reaping, as making butter and cheese, and using milk, and living in houses. They have convents and monasteries, and parish schools, but he is not pleased with their Romish methods of teaching.

One Sunday night [says the missionary], after the close of our service, at my request, he addressed the congregation in Spanish, which he speaks well, and which all the people present could understand. He liked our simple form of worship, and the purity of our lives, and that he preferred the Protestant religion to the Catholic; that he desired to see schools and churches among his people; they were comparatively civilised—an Araucanian tribe; that he wished to take a missionary to home with him next time, and he would do it; he preferred one of us to go (i.e., Protestants); if we could not, he would apply to the Government of Chili to send him one. "I will build," he said, "a church like this (it is a neat church that will hold three hundred and fifty persons)."

BRITISH COLUMBIA.

The Rev. Dr. Evans, chairman of the Pacific District, under the care of the Canada Wesleyan Conference, has visited the Cariboo gold fields. He states that in those districts there is a prevalence of Sabbath desecration unparalleled in any other part of Her Majesty's dominions; yet, that there is a decided improvement in the attendance on public worship, amounting, so far as his congregations were concerned, to at least an average of two to one compared with last year. To obviate the necessity of holding religious services in tavern saloons, which had generally to be done, he had set about the erection of a place of worship, the site for which was given by the resident and magistrate and gold commissioner. The result is the opening of "a substantial hewed log church, which," says Dr. Evans, "was opened every subsequent Sabbath, until I left for home, and which I have directed to be placed at the disposal of any Protestant body, during our absence, who reciprocate such a recognition of the oneness in Christ of those who serve Him." Dr. Evans found that one indispensable piece of furniture for the church could only be procured at a cost which might surprise him. For a very common sheet-iron stove he was asked two hundred and fifty dollars.

AUSTRALASIA.

The migration, in 1856, of the Pitcairners (descended from the crew of the Bounty) from Norfolk Island, will not have escaped the recollection of our readers. Mr. Nobbs, their minister, writes as follows to the Propagation Society, whose missionary he now is:—

"We are living very comfortably, the greater portion at least. A few still hanker after Pitcairn's; but a very short time since a party of twenty-seven persons left us, in a small vessel, to return to their native land; and I presume (D.V.) they are nearly at the desired haven by this time. It is, perhaps, as I said in this latter party went, as it will equalise the number of the sexes, the first party having a majority of female children; but this recent one is just the contrary. We who remain number about a hundred and forty-eight persons, nearly equal as to sex; but our confirmation last year added twenty communicants. The monthly average at the Lord's-table is seventy. We expect Bishop Patteson in April, but there will be no confirmation this year: in the coming year, if it pleases God, we will be several of the proper age, and, I trust, of requisite qualifications. The births last year were sixteen, the deaths eight; total number of births since our arrival in 1856, one hundred and fifteen; deaths during that time, twenty-six. Personally I have had a good deal of sickness, and am still unwell. Age is beginning to undermine my energies, and I feel that I am steadily and incessantly advancing to the house appointed for all living; may I also attain that house "not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Year after year we are graciously permitted to pursue our daily avocations in peace; and the Sabbath is, in every desirable sense, a truly welcome day. I have twenty scholars in the Sunday-school, instructed by nine teachers.

POLYNESIA.

Dr. George Turner writes from Malua, Samoa, describing the warm welcome with which he was received on his recent return thither:—

"The people come dressed in their best and chanting some song of welcome and respect. They do not come empty-handed—each has something—yam, taro, bananas, fowls, &c.—and after stopping to sing and laying down the presents, they all sit down. One makes a speech for the whole. I reply; I shake hands, and off they go. We have had a month of this work, and it is not over yet. The Roman Catholic priests were busy—did all they could to persuade the people that I was not coming. One tale was that I had been forbidden to come by the Queen—no less! And so the natives must make that up in their songs—imploring the Queen to let me come! The arrival of 4,000 Bibles, and of Comments, &c., all add to the general joy. The 2,000 which preceded us sold fast, and we now brought are fast going. Within the last few months we have actually sold a thousand Bibles (1,000L.) worth of the new Bibles!

"In the adjacent islands of Momono and Apolima upwards of thirty men and women had been received, on visitation, by the missionaries into the fellowship of the Church. At Nengone, of the Loyalty group, peace was restored between the heathen and the Christian sides of the island :—

The heathen party would fight with the Christians ; the latter seemed to have no alternative, and did go to war. After two or three battles, the heathen party was completely driven and broken up. Some forty were killed. This is, in all probability, the last struggle between Christianity and heathenism.

On Lifu there is much to encourage :—

Mr. McFarlane, our missionary there, has commenced an institution for the education of a native agency, and I was glad to see among his students young Bula, the son of the old cannibal chief of whom I told you. Twenty years ago all were heathen, and cannibal heathen too, of the most ferocious description.

At Aneiteum heathenism is completely overthrown ; there are three hundred members in the Church, and as many more, perhaps, candidates for Church fellowship.

Another American missionary ship has been built on the Pacific coast, named the Evening Star. She was despatched from San Francisco to join the Morning Star, which was built some years ago at Boston. Both vessels were built and fitted out by the Sunday-school children in the Atlantic States and California.

Literature.

STEWART ON MEDIATORIAL SOVEREIGNTY.*

THE title of Mr. Stewart's work involves a proposition, and means that mediatorial sovereignty is that which is otherwise called the mystery of Christ—that it is, in fact, pre-eminently the revelation of the Old and New Testaments. We are aware of a text which assures us that the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy ; but Mr. Stewart goes beyond this in definiteness, and assures us that the sum and substance of all revelation is contained in the two words "mediatorial sovereignty." We have thus attempted what the author waives in his preface—"an exposition of the title-page," upon which we only remark that it is not often desirable that title-pages should require exposition. The work, we are told, has a twofold bearing—upon the world, and upon the Church. In its bearing upon the world it brings out certain internal evidences of Scripture ; and in its bearing upon the Church, it points out the wealth of her inheritance in Christ, doctrinally considered. Taking the Bible as a revelation of truth, the precise nature and extent of inspiration is not necessarily to be determined. At the same time, the Bible is dealt with as the authoritative vehicle for the communication of Divine truth ; and the external form is upheld along with the interior truth. We cannot undertake to summarise the preface, which nevertheless contains many important observations, and should be read by all who are about to peruse the work which follows it. The whole work is written in a bold and fluent style ; many passages are eloquent ; and it is characterised by the courageous and outspoken advocacy of views which are often original and striking. Having said this of its style and manner, and premising that we cannot accept every theory advanced, we proceed to describe very briefly the plan of the two volumes.

In two introductory chapters the author maintains that the aspect of Deity most open to man is sovereignty, and that Scripture is the authentic depository of the Divine sovereignty in its relation to man. On the first of these we observe that there can be no doubt that it is mainly correct, although we think the idea is put in rather too exclusive a form. Everywhere the sovereignty of God is essentially connected with the idea of Him, but that sovereignty undoubtedly combines paternal as well as regal supremacy. It is a sovereignty of love and goodness, and also of wisdom, of power, and of will. There is danger lest the bare idea of sovereignty should appeal more to the sense of duty and subjection than to loving faith ; and from this danger Mr. Stewart's theory is less free than his book. Of the second chapter, concerning Scripture, we have only to say that it unquestionably is the authentic depository of Divine sovereignty in relation to man, but at the same time it throws a light upon nature and providence, which enables us to gather important lessons in the same direction from them. To this the author would not object, for the very framework of his rests upon the fact that it is the mediatorial aspect of sovereignty which is peculiar to the Bible. But here again we are in peril of making the Bible only a revelation of law, and not of grace; for it is as much a revelation of grace as of law. It is not alone a King, but a loving Saviour, by whom "grace and truth" came into the world, as the author himself afterwards shows.

In the introductory chapters, Mr. Steward proceeds to develop his system, first upon the Old Testament. His first proposition is that sovereignty is the chief characteristic of the creation of man. This idea is worked out carefully and supported by a series of arguments. He proves his point to this extent—that the Divine sovereignty is visible in man's creation, a fact which few or none would question. But he is in principle too far, as we suppose, when he maintains that Adam was only under law, and not under grace, when he sinned. In his second chapter he draws various proofs of sovereignty from Adam's federal character and its influence on the fall. Adam is representative of the race, which therefore fell because he fell, and received the punishment which he deserved. The relations thus implied must have been instituted by an absolute sovereignty. The truths involved in the scriptural account of Adam and the direct bearing upon the mediatorial Person and work of Christ. The four following chapters show that mediatorial sovereignty is implied in the Divine titles—Word—Father—Lord—Redeemer—Jehovah. Elohim, or as Mr. Steward ventures to write it, regarded as a trinal appellation, and yet as involving unity. Hence it is inferred from expressions as "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made," word means the Father, the First Person of the Elohim. It is possible, he thinks, that "the breath of his mouth," as just quoted, signifies the Holy Spirit. We fear, however, that the next verse, "For he spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast" (Ps. xxxiii. 9), does not support these expositions. Indeed, is it an established fact that the Word is one of the titles of God in the Old Testament? There is not one among those quoted by Mr. Steward which seems to require such an explanation. The phrase "the Angel of the Lord," is reasonably affirmed to be sometimes a Divine title. "Redeemer" is unquestionably a name given to the Lord; but it is a serious question whether the Hebrew commonly translated Redeemer, conveyed the idea of the English word when applied to Christ. It is curious that in the New Testament the word Redeemer never occurs; and "redemption," however, are frequently met with in different senses. As to the bearing of the word "Redeemer" upon the argument of the work before us, we are inclined to believe it has a distinct reference to the exercise of sovereign mercy to the Lord's people, and not of sovereign justice to others. The terms Jehovah, and Lord, are also difficult; but we only say that possibly Jehovah is a name which foreshadows the manifestation of the Saviour, a view recently developed with much skill by Mr. Tyler.

The seventh chapter is on the forms of Divine manifestation, and it is followed by five chapters on various indications of mediatorial sovereignty in the Old Testament faith and promises, Church, and types. Our space will not allow us to indicate the frequent instances which we regard as questionable the interpretations adopted. Very often we concur, and we concur entirely with the main idea, that mediatorial sovereignty is visible in almost every part of the Old Testament dispensations. The Mosaic system, as we have seen, was pre-eminently an exhibition of mediatorial sovereignty. The Messianic is so prominent in the Old Testament, points in the same direction. On many occasions, the Old Testament may, as Mr. Steward says, be considered as "fundamental to the New Testament, where he finds proofs of mediatorial sovereignty in the prophecies, and titles of Christ, and in sundry other particulars concerning his Church. These investigations occupy between 600 and 700 pages. With industry the writer collects from all parts of Scripture illustrations and arguments. He reasons skilfully rather than learnedly; always religiously, and sometimes

He calmly and patiently pursues his course from first to last, and we only state the fact when we say, that he has accumulated an unequalled mass of materials in support of his thesis, and that, often as we differ from him in details, we feel that he has abundantly demonstrated the sovereign aspect of the mediatorial character of God. We have an idea that the book might have been made much smaller, but his powers of amplification have carried him along, and hence the remarkably copious treatment of his subject. And yet, he quotes nobody, he refers to nobody, except indirectly. There are no foot-notes, and no elaborate and learned criticisms. From first to last the work consists of a series of discussions or dissertations, in which the Bible is the author's one book of reference and authority—we might say, it is the Bible in the authorised version. Yet, in the chapters concerning the Church, there are multiplied evidences that our author has read other books. We wish that a treatise involving the right interpretation of so many passages of Scripture had shown a little more attention to critical inquiries; that it had come out less in the style of lectures, or if not less in the style of lectures, that it had been accompanied by some notes to show that its author is a scholar as well as a theologian. In these days the soundest divinity in the world is not sufficient to guarantee the author of such a book success, if that divinity is not sustained by true and careful expositions of texts. Mr. Steward perhaps understands Greek, and possibly Hebrew, but we believe he has not used either of them for his own security so freely as he ought to have done.

Of the closing chapters, and of many opinions advanced in the work, we cannot find space to speak. The author has placed within our reach what may greatly assist us in our investigation of a vast and important subject. We admire his plainness of speech and his great ability, and above all we honour the reverential tone in which he has written. Much more we could write, but we restrain our hand, conscious that no brief notice, nor any notice, can render adequate justice to a work which covers so vast a range, and treats of such profound themes—a work which carries us from the beginning of time, through all the phases of God's dispensations to man, on into the kingdom that is yet to come. A patient perusal of these two volumes alone can enable any one to see clearly how much Mr. Steward has undertaken and accomplished.

Explanation of the Gospel According to St. John.

With an Introduction Treating of its Authenticity, a New Translation, and Critical Essays. (Explication de l'Evangile Selon Saint Jean, &c.) By A CHRISTIAN. First and Second Parts. Geneva and Paris: Cherbuliez.

WE are happy to see the religious literature of the French Protestants enriched by such works as this. It is a fair popular commentary, the notes of which show that the anonymous author is acquainted with the principal writings of modern German critics upon the Gospel, Epistles, and Apocalypse of St. John, while the text happily proves that he is free from all taint of rationalism. The text contains, moreover, numerous selections from Vinet, Pascal, Calvin, Quesnel, Duguet, and Madame la Mothe Guyon, which are so well chosen as to be of themselves enough to give value to the work. One is particularly struck by the quotations from Calvin, so completely do they prove the great Reformer's freedom from doctrinal bias in his interpretations of Scripture. His whole attitude as a commentator is that of one listening to the oracles of God with sincerity and humility, without ever attempting to impose his own views upon them.

The work is to be finished in the third part, which is also to contain the introduction on the question of authenticity, the whole forming one octavo volume. The most important of the critical notes and essays is that upon the origin and meaning of the term Logos.

English Biblical Criticism and the Pentateuch, from a German Point of View. By JOHN MUEHLEISEN-ARNOLD, B.D. Vol. I. Longman.

MR. ARNOLD has brought to bear upon this work two or three important qualifications, in which we may safely say he is in advance of many who have lately written upon the Pentateuch. He has not covered his pages with Oriental type, but he is an excellent Oriental scholar, as we all know, and as he shows by numerous indications in this volume. He is also well versed in German literature; in deed, he tells us that he was born and educated in Germany. In point of scholarship, then, he has a double claim to a respectful hearing, and we are quite sure his intellectual capacity and Evangelical spirit will be denied by no one. With such qualifications he has girt himself to the task of combating prevalent error, and of instructing in the views which are taken by the best scholars and divines of his country. The present volume of which a second edition is already in preparation consists of three chapters, headed, "The Theological Crisis," "The Unity of the Pentateuch," and "The Pentateuch and its Author." We regard these chapters as a very valuable contribution to the defence of the genuineness and authenticity of the Pentateuch, and we have much pleasure in recommending their intelligent perusal to our readers.

The Rise and Progress of Religious Life in England. By SAMUEL ROWLES PATTISON Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

TO trace the true Apostolic succession of men who have adhered to Evangelical Christianity to their teaching and their lives, from its first planting in this island to the close of the last century, is no easy task. It is occasionally found to be a hazardous thing to fix the exact doctrinal position of some who live in our own day. How great, then, must be the difficulty of estimating and many of the men who flourished centuries ago as we endeavour to view them from the light stand-point! The religious life in any age, however, has its collective and as well as its individual developments, by the delineation of the former, no the latter, that we can have its history. For we regard the wider or the narrower effort to give us the result of con-research is so useful, that an author who has but partial success deserves our Mr. Pattison proceeds upon right prin-ciples considerable industry in the of facts, and has evidently taken some pains to reduce them to the form in which they appear in this volume. He has thus produced a work which deserves to be extensively read. Yet in the survey of the past, a keener effort to discover the religious element in social events, and a more comprehensive view, would have given his work a more value. He has the merit, however, of opening up a new path and prepared the way for others who may follow in his steps. A full analytical table of contents gives the work double value for purposes of reference.

Compassion; or, Jesus Showing Mercy. By JAMES CULROSS, A.M. Nisbet and Co. This volume comprises a short general view of the ministry, and a series of chapters on the mercy shown by Him as recorded in the Gospels. The intention of the author is to show those who desire the mercy of God in what He has done for them by means of recorded facts rather than by mere reasoning and argument. The grace and love of Jesus are thus set before us in His very words and actions, drawn from what He did for others both in life and what we may be encouraged to do for Him. The successive chapters are written in an earnest and affectionate spirit, and with a dignified familiarity. We feel as we read that the author is full of love to Christ and that his pages are admirably fitted for the use of the seeking sinner to the Saviour. Every page is something to awaken feeling, to arrest the mind and to stimulate hope. Both as to subject and its execution, the book is one which has much satisfaction in recommending.

Home Life: A Book of Examples and Principles. The Religious Tract Society. The object of this work is to deepen the convictions of christian parents and heads of households of their responsibilities; to point out, especially from experience, how those responsibilities are fulfilled; and to illustrate, by facts from real life, the reward, even in this world, of parental fidelity. A book of the kind is wanted, and the writer has fairly accomplished his task; though the rich vein which he has mined is by no means exhausted. These pages may be read with advantage by parents who are not distinctively Christian, and the hand of friendship might not improbably confer a blessing upon some household still devoid of the dearest bond of home life by the introduction of this attractive volume.

Christian Self-Culture; or, the Origin and Development of a Christian Life. By LEONARD BACON. Edinburgh: Andrew Elliot.

DR. BACON reminds us that the Christian life may be viewed under the aspect either of discipline and self-culture, or of Christian experience. It is with the first of these aspects only that he professes to deal. His aim is practical throughout. He starts with the great question, What are you in your own consciousness? then explains how the Christian life really begins, and urges his reader to begin at once. Assuming that the offer of salvation is accepted, and that faith in Christ is exercised, he points out that faith is unfinished and fragmentary unless it stands in its proper relation to virtue—that is, unless it lives in a vital connexion with true worth, with active strength, with manliness of soul. In like manner, as taught by the Apostle—whose exhortation (2 Pet. i. 5-7) is made the basis of remark throughout—he shows that the other Christian graces not yet possessed require to be added to these, until the whole circle is complete, and there is the full evidence of reality of Christian growth and fruitfulness. But how is one grace developed into the other? What is the vital relation of each to the rest? And how may the Apostle's exhortation be best fulfilled? Dr. Bacon's answers to these questions is the theme of the book. He writes with a directness of aim and earnestness of purpose which well befits that theme. His avoidance of the slightest approach to whatever is vague or irrelevant, his well-chosen and terse language, and, above all, his vigorous style of thought, adapt this book for usefulness in some circles, and among some minds, that might refuse attention to other well-meant, but less able efforts, to arouse the conscience and enlighten the judgment.

The Battle of Armageddon, and its Results. An Exposition of the Sixth and Seventh Vials of the Apocalypse; and also an Inquiry Regarding the Commencement and Termination of the 1,260 Symbolical Days. By JAMES MEIKLE.

THIS can hardly be called a new book; and it is one which in no case could be reviewed at length in these pages. Its author frequently takes ground where he excludes himself from the remotest chance of finding the concurrence of multitudes of sincere and Evangelical Christians. We refer more especially to the strong terms in which he speaks of Established and National Churches, and declares his conviction that even the Lutheran Churches and the Church of England are involved in the sin, and will be overtaken by the punishments, denounced against the enemies of God in the Apocalypse. He regards the 1,260 symbolical days as terminated in the English Revolution of 1688. If Dr. Meikle had lived in the reigns of the second Charles and his successor, we should not have so much wondered at his views on some points; he seems to be a true representative of the ages which produced the "Hind Let Loose," "Faithful Contendings," and the "Scottish Worthies." While, therefore, our author has written much that is truly excellent, and some things deserving of honest investigation, we regard his volume as diminished in value by certain unfortunate passages. Such passages are not unfrequent, but we will only mention the one wherein there is a somewhat elaborate endeavour to prove that the beast which came up out of the earth, having two horns like a lamb, and speaking like a dragon (Rev. xiii. 2, &c.), is a symbol of what Dr. Meikle pleases to call "the two civil establishments of Protestantism in Europe—of Lutheranism in Germany, and of Calvinism in England." He ought to know that there are far more than "two civil establishments of Protestantism in Europe;" but he is satisfied to remember two, because his beast has but two horns, one representing the Act of Supremacy in England passed in 1534, and the other the Diet of Augsburg's decisions in 1555. We had hoped for better things from Ayrshire.

Christian Work for Gentle Hands: Thoughts on Female Agency in the Church of God. By JOHN DWYER. Tresidder.

WOMAN'S work in the Church was well understood in primitive times, and although long in abeyance, is now happily receiving a large measure of attention. This work is so diversified in its character, that there are few who cannot take some share in it. It is cause for sincere thankfulness that it is so much studied, and that its importance is so generally felt in our time. Mr. Dwyer has, in the small volume before us, contributed his thoughts for the direction and encouragement of the sisterhood. He writes in a pleasing and appropriate manner, and his remarks are fitted to promote the object he has in view. We are not sure, however, that the arguments for the employment of women in preaching, public exhortations, and prayer will be so generally acquiesced in as other portions of the volume. The author admits that such engagements must be not the rule, but the exception; but still he justifies and pleads for them in certain cases.

The Fall of Babylon. An Epic Poem. By the Rev. HIBBERT NEWTON, B.A. Westerton.

THE Rev. Mr. Newton, "officiating minister of St. Michael's Chapel of Ease to St. George the Martyr's, Southwark," has found leisure to write a volume of about fifteen thousand lines, of ten syllables each, rhyming alternately. Some portions of the book we have read, and we have paid particular attention to the preliminary n. We are sorry to say we cannot pronounce favourably of the work as to advise any to read it; for, although there are many thoughts in it, there is much that is incoherent and fanciful, much that is indiscreet and unworthy. In sober truth, we think Mr. N. might have been much better employed.

Five Years of Prayer, with the Answers SAMUEL IRENAUS PRIME. Nisbet and

THE daily prayer-meeting at Fulton-street York, is now in the seventh year of its existence. Dr. Prime's "Power of Prayer" was published after it had been carried on for twelve months and became the means of extensive usefulness to a large number of villages and rural congregations. He tells us, revivals of religion followed the opening of the remarkable facts contained in the work. He here narrates what has occurred since the publication of his former volume, of a similar character to the facts there recorded. The contents of the work before us are so arranged as to exhibit the power of prayer in the various departments of public, social, and domestic life, showing the remarkable answers which God has given to praying parents, husbands, wives, children, and to Christians in the army and America does not engross the whole of the work; he devotes successive chapters to revivals in Ireland, Scotland, England, and France and Germany; and concludes the whole with an account of George Muller and his work at Harms. Dr. Prime, as a religious journal has had peculiar facilities for preparing a work of this kind, of which he has done well for himself, and we hope that its perusal will be attended by similar beneficial results to which followed his former publication.

Wholesome Words; or, One Hundred Choice sayings from Old Authors. Selected and by J. E. RYLAND, M.A. Jackson, W. and Hodder.

THESE "Wholesome Words" are upon topics which bear chiefly upon the Christian life. Some like one-third of the selections are from Lecky, while the remainder are from Jeremy Taylor, Sibbes, and Adams.

Trial and Trust; or, Ellen Morden's Experience of Life. By EMMA LESLIE. W. Macmillan.

WE have here a tale intended to teach certain important moral and religious lessons. The interest is of a domestic character, and is told in a manner which will be certain to win the attention of youthful readers. Ellen Morden, the principal personage in the story, is a pious, good woman whose troubles are very numerous and trying, who never loses heart and hope, and is left at the end of the story as the authoress in the sunshine of a happy and satisfactory marriage. We confidently recommend the book as likely to be useful as well as attractive.

Monthly Retrospect.

not know that the nations of Europe have ever been brought into a position more momentous issues hung on their decision than that in which they now stand. When the elements of foreign war or domestic strife lie scattered around to an unhardy, if ever, before known, Germany and Denmark are about to recommence, where these pages can be in the hands of our readers, they probably will have recommenced. The earnest and anxious efforts of our own Ministers to secure some middle compromise between both parties, have been but coldly seconded by the other and have been absolutely rejected by the disputants themselves. The armistice on Sunday, the 26th, when both parties are free to recommence the war which ended six weeks before. But it must be obvious to every one, that in that short time the character of the dispute has materially changed. Other nations have meddled and though that was done from the most pacific purposes, the very act of meddling some extent made it their own. Public opinion on the Continent is loudly protesting that the English proposals, having been so peremptorily rejected, the honour of which will be stained if she do not go to war to enforce them; and though we are not the habit of allowing Continental opinions to control our insular feelings, it cannot be denied that in this particular case the Continental assertion begins to find an echo in our national heart. But it is not England alone that is in danger of being drawn within the swirling vortex—the neighbouring State of Sweden is said to be on the eve of leaving her weak Scandinavian sister; and if Austria become much farther committed to the Venetia, while Hungary will claim for herself that right of national existence which she is fighting to maintain in Holstein. France again, who has all along manifested an indifference to the claims of her ancient northern ally, will be left free to work her will in Europe; there will be none to oppose her. Everywhere we see everywhere symptoms of storm and gloom; the peace of Europe, which has been undisturbed more or less unbroken for half a century, was never in more danger of a total overthrow than now. We have arrived at one of those great crises which God in His providence from time to time appoints, which change at a stroke the whole previous current of events, and depress or lift nations to a different level. In His hands are the issues of the most momentous events; and to Him, we doubt not, all His children will look in these days which so vividly realise the prophetic vision of the last days.

In the present agitation of the nations, the condition of Italy will be watched with interest. Italy is the pivot on which the destinies of the Papedom turn; it is also the battle-field on which the controversy between the true and the false is likely to be decided. For some time past Europe has been agitated with respect to the health of the Pope. His death would produce a sensation anywhere; no country in the world is it so earnestly watched for as in Italy. It is in vain there to be assured that another Pope will be elected as soon as the present Pontiff dies; his successor is already fixed upon; and further, that with a view to compliment Austria and incline the Emperor to continue his protection over the temporal Power, the wish of the cardinals has fallen upon a Frenchman. Nothing can persuade the Italian that his death will not untie the knot which has hitherto been found so hard, and in any way or other, so facilitate matters as to put them in possession of their long-expected capital. It is even said that a project is on foot to remove the capital from Turin to a place somewhere nearer the Eternal City, that the King and the Ministers, and the apparatus of Government, may be ready to take advantage of the first opening and move themselves in. With regard to Venetia it is the same. The Italians look forward with eagerness to a renewal of the Danish war, in the hope that in that northern struggle Austria will be compelled to relax her hold on the Venetian provinces—a hold that she would never be able to tighten again. In the midst of such exciting political speculations, one would think that the Gospel would have small chance of being listened to. It is not so otherwise than so; as the deeply-interesting letter of our correspondent for this month abundantly testifies. We there see that a hopeful, healthy work has been begun and is making rapid progress along the eastern coast of the Peninsula. This work is almost if not altogether, independent of English effort, which has been exerted mainly on the western coast, and it is altogether the fruit of native energy and zeal. We refer to our correspondent's letter for the details, and we have here only to express our regret that the tares should have come up among the wheat in the Free Italian Churches so rapidly as to have forced that true patriot and zealous Christian, Dr. De Sanctis, out of their communion by their narrow and intolerant spirit. We must admire the noble attitude he has assumed under the circumstances, and we trust it will speedily be seen in what way God contrives to bring good out of this evil.

It will be observed that our German correspondent, writing from Frankfort, is strongly in favour of the Germanising of the debateable land of Schleswig. We accept him as the measure of the warmth with which the question is everywhere regarded in that country. But it will also be observed, from his letter, that these political questions are not the only ones that agitate the minds of Christian men in that country. The unsettled state of the times appears to have imparted new life to scepticism in Germany, as well as nearer home; and German Christians, like their English brethren, are mourning the falling off into Rationalism of good and able men, from whom better things were at one time anticipated. The most saddening feature, in both cases, is, that men in the clerical office insist on continuing in their position after they have given up the only foundations on which their position rests; they call themselves the clergymen of a Christian Church, while they hold and inculcate principles which cut up, by the roots, Church and clergy and Christianity. Our correspondent looks to the reorganization of the National Protestant Church, which has already made some progress in Prussia, for a remedy of these evils, and with his concluding remarks we heartily coincide, that forms in a Church are not life, but they may materially aid its development.

French political society has been agitated, of late, by a series of domiciliary visits, which the French police have made to the houses of suspected persons, and the seizure of their private papers—a step for which no cause appears to have been given, and the policy of which none can understand. French religious society is fed and stimulated, as our correspondent graphically records, by gaudy processions of ecclesiastics, bearing about religious images, and the Host, to the intense delight of the mob and the disgust of quiet, sober people, and the confirmation of thousands in their hard, scornful scepticism, for which indeed, these mummeries are the best excuse. French Protestantism, too, has its scepticism. I may be remembered that some time ago the Pastoral Conference of Paris held a meeting and by a large majority declared in favour of orthodoxy. The Rationalists have since held counter demonstration at Nismes, where they have put forth a declaration which, we regret to say, denies some of the fundamental truths of the Gospel.

In our columns, this month, will be found a full and extremely interesting narrative from the pen of a valued correspondent of the proceedings connected with the celebration of the Tercentenary of Calvin, held in the city which was the scene of his labours, and place of his death. The very fact that such a celebration has been held, is as our correspondent remarks, a cheering sign of the times. Such was the extent to which the principles of Calvin had been forgotten, even in the city which owes all its historical importance to his name, that thirty or forty years ago, such a celebration would have been impossible. We are glad to observe that the English deputation which attended from the English Alliance took the opportunity of their being in the neighbourhood to wait upon the Vice-President of the Swiss Federal Council, to whom they were courteously introduced by our Ambassador, and represented to him the grievous outrage which had been committed on a person in the Canton of Lucerne, who, refusing to have his child baptized, had all his family taken from him. The Vice-President received the deputation most courteously, warmly condemned the act of intolerance of which they complained, and promised that as soon as the Council assembled, which will be on the 4th of this present month, the matter would be set right, and the poor man would have his children restored to him. This is but one of many successful interferences of the Evangelical Alliance on behalf of the principles of religious liberty.

The terrible scourge of war in America is still unabated; and, as far as human eyes can see, as far from an end as ever. The Federal armies under General Grant have penetrated to within about twelve miles of Richmond, but right in front of them lies the army of Lee, which all through the advance has barred the direct road, and compelled the Federal general to make various circuitous marches, only to find when he arrived at the end of them that his enemy had been still quicker than he; to fight several bloody battles, only to find that the positions successively taken up could not be forced. It is characteristic of that hardening of the heart with which this great war makes us all too familiar, that the last repulse of Grant, with a loss in killed and wounded of about 6,000 men, is thought rather an unimportant affair. But we have had the war brought near our own doors, in the naval fight between the Kearsage and the notorious Alabama, which happened a few miles out from the port of Cherbourg, and which resulted in the Alabama being sent to the bottom with a portion of her crew. This happened on a quiet Sunday morning, and the report of the guns might have been heard in some of the village churches that line our coasts, while the congregations were intent on their prayers. Battles, we know, have been fought before on the Lord's-day, but this is, we believe, the first instance in which one ship challenged another to come out to the harbour and fight, and in which the captain of the challenged ship deliberately selected the Sunday for the purpose. The whole affair, indeed, seems to have been an act of foolhardiness, for there was no obligation on Captain Semmes to fight, and he ought to have been aware of the superiority of his opponent. But we cannot profess to have much sympathy for the fate of a ship that was in the first instance stolen away from our shores by a trick, and whose mission ever since has been to prey on unarmed and defenceless merchantmen. The result will have no effect on the issue of the war. But while the termination of the strife is thus uncertain, some of its consequences are tolerably clear. Among these is the elevation of the negro in the scale of social life. His emancipation from slavery seems now to be adopted as a settled policy all through the Northern States. In proof of this, we may mention that there are at present only two candidates now for the Presidency—Mr. Lincoln, to be re-elected; and General Fremont, who ran Mr. Buchanan so close eight years ago. Both of these men make it a leading point in their policy that slavery shall be unconditionally abolished throughout the Union.

HOME.

We have given, under the head of our Home Intelligence, some details of the proceedings of Convocation at their recent sitting. It will be seen that they have taken a step in advance of all their other proceedings, and one which may hereafter be of some importance. The two Houses have pronounced a formal and judicial condemnation of the "Essays and Reviews." In this, of course, they have done no more than all right-thinking Englishmen have done before them—no more than they themselves, as individuals, have done before in a hundred different ways; but it is a new thing that the Convocation, as a body, should take upon itself the power of censuring or condemning published opinions at all. Since the date of their resuscitation, under the late Archbishop of Canterbury, they have discussed many questions, and they have recommended many plans, but they have done nothing more; their functions, in fact, were no more than those of a debating society; it was believed they required the license of the Crown to perform any substantive act. Their leaders have now found out that the power of censure is inherent in them; that they do not require the license of the Crown to empower them to exercise it. We shall be curious to know if the Crown lawyers, or still more, the House of Commons, sustain this opinion. At present, indeed, the question may not be raised, but it may hereafter come to be of importance.

We are to have a judicial discussion of Dr. Colenso's position in the Church after all. The bishop himself has been advised to make his appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council against the judgment of the Bishop of Cape Town and his coadjutors, who, it will be remembered, summoned Dr. Colenso before him, as his metropolitan, and on his failing to appear, proceeded in the cause and finally deposed him from the office of bishop of the see of Natal. The Lord Chancellor, who presided at the time of the bishop's presenting his appeal, directed that it should stand over for the present. The first point, of course, to be considered is, whether Dr. Gray had jurisdiction to depose Dr. Colenso; after that it comes the question of the judgment, when the bishop's views, and their compatibility with that of a dignitary in the English Church, will be fully gone into.

The Tercentenary of Calvin was fitly celebrated in his own city of Geneva. But the reverence paid to his memory, and the desire to profit by his teaching, was not confined to that place. The Protestants of France owned their obligations to him; Holland was not unmindful of his services; and we at home were forward to acknowledge our obligations to the Genevese Reformer. Scotland was, of course, foremost in the good work. The Established Church celebrated the occasion in solitary state ; the unestablished bodies of Presbyterians met in pleasant harmony. In London the event was celebrated by a souirée among the members of the Evangelical Alliance—the president, Lord Calthorpe, presiding. The meeting was addressed by several speakers, who, representing every Evangelical denomination, maintained a marked and delightful harmony in honouring those features of the great Reformer's character which are common to all Christians.

It will be seen in our Home Intelligence that a portion of the Scotch Presbyterians are a little uneasy about the effect of the Duke of Buccleuch's bill for allowing clergymen ordained by Scotch bishops to be eligible for promotion in the English Church. They fear that the bill will give the Scotch Episcopal Church a standing in the country that has not before been conceded to it. But in truth the bill concerns more nearly the English Church than the Scotch Presbyterians ; and as it stood at first, it was fraught with danger. The Romanising tendencies of the Scottish Episcopalians are well known ; and the bill provided that any patron might present one of them to a living in his gift, with no more restraint than if his nominee had been ordained in England. Some additional episcopal control is now conceded, and to that extent the measure has been deprived of much of its objectionable qualities. But with the example of the Scotch and Tractarian Bishop Trower in the diocese of Gibraltar before their eyes, none can wonder that English Evangelicals look with suspicion on this new movement towards a Church with such retrograde tendencies.

A bill brought into the House of Lords by Lord Gage, the other day, gave rise to a singular discussion. The bill was a very simple one. His lordship, in common with his countrymen, has no faith in the Apocrypha, and feels scandalised at its elevation to a level with the Word of God, in being read in its turn as a portion of our public devotions. He proposed, therefore, to empower a clergyman who came upon a portion of the Apocrypha in the course of his reading, to substitute for it, at his discretion, a chapter in the Old or New Testament. The bill evoked a storm of opposition, chiefly from the bishops. The Bishop of Oxford went so far as to contend that there were portions of the Apocrypha better fitted for edification, in the public services of the Church, than certain portions of the Bible. Several other peers, lay and clerical, followed in his wake, and the bill was abandoned. This is a curious sign of the times. We may well concede that while all Scripture is fitted for reproof and instruction, it is not all fitted, or indeed intended, to act in the same mode ; and that there are portions, precious from the views they give us of human depravity, that are not intended for public and promiscuous reading ; but it is a curious instance of the obliquity that prevails on these subjects, to find the heads and leaders of the Church contending for the elevation of writings which they know to be the unassisted composition of men to such dignity as to be read before our congregations in the same way, and as if they possessed equal authority with the Divine Word.

The National system of education in Ireland has been the subject of contention ever since its establishment, about thirty years ago. The latest debateable question is the encouragement given to the monastic and convent schools, which, so far as that encouragement is given, departs from the principle of the Irish system, and becomes denominational, and not national. The Protestants, who conscientiously object to give up the daily reading of the Scriptures in their schools, and by that course deprive themselves of the grants in aid of education voted by Government, naturally complain of this state of things, and Sir Hugh Cairns, in the course of last month, made a motion impugning it. The Irish Attorney-General, who is a Roman Catholic, made a zealous defence. The position of Sir Robert Peel, as Irish Secretary, was more peculiar. He had previously condemned the aid given to the convent schools, but now the exigencies of the approaching election induced him to give them his support, though he did it with an ill grace. The majority of the House of Commons sustained him, however, and it was agreed, by a considerable majority, that the system as it stood was worthy of support. We remark that it was well for the convents that this vote was taken immediately before, and not immediately after, an election.

RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE IN SWITZERLAND.

In April last a communication was received narrating the following case of religious persecution in the Canton of Lucerne—that Antoine Lauber, of Marbac, having been required by the municipal authorities to have his infant child baptized, declined to do so, on the ground of his objection to infant baptism; that, in consequence, and for no other reason known to exist, his house was forcibly entered by the police, his five children carried away, who have not up to the present time been returned to their parents.

The Foreign Secretary, accompanied by the President of the Alliance, Lord Calthorpe, had an interview with Lord Russell on the subject, who kindly promised to write to Her Majesty's Minister at Berne; also, in the event of a memorial from the Evangelical Alliance being presented to the Federal Council of the Swiss Confederation, to furnish the deputation presenting it with a letter of introduction.

The deputation proceeding to Geneva for the Tercentenary services of John Calvin, at the close of those meetings went to Berne, bearing the memorial from the Alliance. The deputation were courteously received both by Her Majesty's Minister, Rear-Admiral the Hon. E. A. J. Harria, and by the Vice-President of the Swiss Confederation, Councillor Schenk, in the absence of the President, who not only assured them of his personal disapproval of the proceedings, but that public opinion throughout Switzerland had almost unanimously condemned the authorities of Marbac, as well as the Grand Council of Lucerne.

The deputation since their return have heard from an influential resident in Berne that there is every hope that the children will shortly be restored to their parents, and that the whole case will be brought before the Swiss Parliament at its opening. We hope to give particulars of the case and the result of this effort of the Alliance in our next.

THE CALVIN TERCENTENARY IN GENEVA.

An account of these services appearing in another part of Evangelical Christendom, it is unnecessary here to give an account of the interesting meetings held during the week commencing May 23rd. The deputation from the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance consisted of the Rev. C. J. Glyn, Rector of Wichehampton, Rev. Dr. Steane, Rev. Professor Gibson, Belfast; Rev. C. Clemanee, Nottingham; Rev. Hermann Schmettau, and R. N. Fowler, Esq. On their way they had the gratification of meeting in Paris their beloved brother Manuel Matamoros, on his way to Lausanne, where he is to study theology under M. R. Bridel and the brethren of the Canton de Vaud, preparatory to his undertaking the work assigned him at Bayonne.

The deputation were gratified to learn that, as the result of the Geneva Conference in 1861, committees for the observance of the Lord's-day have multiplied in Switzerland. During the week of the Tercentenary services a crowded meeting was held, attended by the various representatives of the various cantons, who stated that the movement, though meeting with difficulties, was daily progressing and finding additional adherents. At a subsequent private meeting resolutions of a very important character were adopted—for instance, 1. That an annual meeting of the Lord's-day Society should be held in different cantons alternately; and 2. That the several committees take combined action for the purpose of bringing their influence to bear on the Federal and Cantonal Government for the limitation of labour on the Lord's-day in the postal and railway departments, and for the discontinuance of military reviews and inspections and of drill practice.

THE NESTORIANS.

The following letter has just been received from our esteemed friend the Rev. Dr. Perkins, American missionary to the Nestorians in Oroomiah:—

“Oroomiah, Persia, April 21, 1864.

“My dear Sir,—Your favour of January 5th was received three days ago. I am thankful to say that Consul Glen is still here, and his presence does much for the quiet and protection of the Nestorians. Our mission have recommended to your Ambassador at Teheran that Mr. Glen, or some other Englishman, be permanently located here, unostentatiously, to look after their welfare. We have not received from him any response. Mr. Abbott, late British Consul at Tabreez, now in London, who has exerted himself a great deal for their benefit, I think, would strongly favour that measure, and would doubtless second any application you might make to forward that great object, at the Foreign-office. I am entirely satisfied that no other measure will mitigate the sufferings of these oppressed Christians. The Persian agent, sent hither from the capital, a few months ago, for their relief, like his predecessor, seems to make it his study only to oppress and fleece the Nestorians, even more than their hard masters.

“I duly received the circular for the Week of Prayer, and it was printed in our periodical. That season was observed by the Nestorians very extensively this year, and was followed with very blessed effects, even precious revivals in many places. Few measures of the Church of Christ have been more signally owned and honoured of the Lord.

“You will have in mind, dear Joseph, one of the Secretaries of the Nestorian branch of the Evangelical Alliance, who has repeatedly written you. He died a week ago to-day. By his death a great light is removed from the Nestorians. He had been my fellow-labourer in the department of the press here more than twenty years. He was admirably qualified for that work by the finest native talents and extensive culture, and a very beautiful Christian character. We deeply feel his loss; but are thankful that he lived so long, and was enabled to accomplish so much. He greatly loved the Evangelical Alliance.

“Our missionary work is in general quite prosperous at the present time; and as spring opens, and the earth begins to yield its wonted increase, we trust that the sufferings of the poor will be mitigated.

“We are most grateful to you for the kind interest you take in the welfare of the Nestorians, and believe that your efforts will not be in vain—indeed, they have already resulted in great good.

“Wishing you every blessing, and with kindest regards, in which my fellow-labourers join me, I am, as ever, most gratefully and truly yours,

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE IN EDINBURGH.

THE Evangelical Alliance convened its Eighteenth Annual Conference in the city of Edinburgh. The meetings commenced on July the 5th, and terminated the 8th. They were held in the morning at a commodious and well-constructed hall in Queen-street, and in the evening in the more spacious building erected for the General Assembly of the Free Church. They were largely attended by the general public, in proportion to the interest of the subjects and the fame of the speakers.

The actual members present were not so numerous as on some former occasions. There were but few of the English clergy or other ministers attached to the body, and fewer still of the many who sympathise with its objects, while not formally identifying themselves with the Alliance. Some of the chairmen announced were happily unable to attend—Lord Calthorpe, the President, through the necessities of public duty; and Lord Roden through illness. Some of the speakers also failed; amongst others, the Revs. Dr. Norman McLeod, Principal Candlish, and James Blackwood. But the absence most marked and most deeply regretted, was that of Mr. Henderson, of Park. Notwithstanding the disappointment caused by these absences, common to all public meetings, the Conference, on the whole, must be regarded as a success. Lord Benholme, the Hon. Major Baillie, the Master of Polwarth, and the other chairmen of the public or devotional assemblies, discharged their duties with dignity and ability, and the gentlemen who had been entrusted with the delivery of the several addresses showed themselves able expositors of the subjects allotted to them.

The subjects were those proper to the Alliance—Christian Union, Infidelity, Popery, and Sabbath Observance; and those which are naturally suggested at a united gathering of the soldiers of the cross, the state of Protestantism on the Continent, and the growth of foreign and domestic Evangelical missions.

Christian Union was assigned to the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, whose address was characterised by his usual clearness of conception, fidelity and directness of appeal, and severe simplicity of style. His rebukes of the Bishop of Oxford, on the one hand, for classifying Dissenters with evil and reprobate men in his late charge, and of Mr. Spurgeon, on the other, for attributing dishonesty of motive to the Evangelical clergy, were alike just and well received. "I have met many able and zealous bigots, but I do not remember to have met any with much of the spirit of Christ," is a sentence which may be adopted by every close observer of the religious leaders of his own time. Although really one of the best addresses of the whole series, it scarcely produced its proper effect upon the audience, because, being, apparently, to over-fatigue, its delivery was deficient in animation; and as the address was not handed to the reporters of the press, only a brief and imperfect abstract of it appears in the Edinburgh papers; but it was well worthy of being given to the world in a more permanent form. The Rev. D. T. K. Drummond, of Edinburgh, to whom was assigned the reading of the Practical Resolutions adopted at the first meeting of the Alliance, in 1846, urged the introduction of members of the Society of Friends into the body, if it could be done consistently with the preservation of the doctrinal Basis intact. His wishes met with a general response from the audience, and the subject was remitted to the Council for their favourable consideration. The design of the original introduction of the articles on Baptism and the Lord's Supper was not to exclude those who, being Evangelical in doctrine and spirit, yet believe that these ordinances were binding only upon the apostolic age, but rather those who holding the high priestly theory as to the necessary moral and spiritual effects of the Sacraments when duly administered by a successor of the Apostles, could not be Evangelical in doctrine. There would be nothing, therefore, contrary to the spirit of the Alliance in admitting to membership individual Evangelical Friends, and the letter might be satisfied by a note authorising and defining exceptions. The subject merits, and will doubtless receive, the calm and impartial deliberation of the Council.

The subject of Infidelity was assigned to distinguished advocates. The first paper was by Rev. Dr. McCosh, of Belfast, "On the Present Tendency of Religious Thought Throughout the Three Kingdoms." It was a most masterly address—"the production," as Mr. Noel observed, "of a scholar, a gentleman, and a Christian." Its power upon the audience was enhanced by the manly form, the thoughtful aspect, the graceful delivery of the speaker. The house was excited to loud and earnest applause, and a resolution that it should be adopted and printed by the Conference was carried unanimously. It was followed by a very able paper by the Rev. Dr. Cairns, of Berwick, "On the Last Phase of German Unbelief." After the comprehensive statement of Dr. McCosh, Dr. Cairns deemed it desirable to confine himself to one single point. This he did, and gave a succinct account of Dr. Strauss's new issue of his "Life of Jesus," of the variations of the present from the former work, and of its probable effect amongst his own countrymen. Mr. Peter Bayne concluded with a discourse "On the General Aspects of the Infidel Controversy of the Present Day," which, although not equalling the point of the first address, or the definiteness of the second, was not unworthy of his growing reputation.

The question of the Sabbath was treated with his accustomed judiciousness and power by Dr. Andrew Thomson. This was the only topic on which debate arose; not, however, as to principles, but modes. All were agreed that the Lord's day should be kept holy, and be consecrated to the public service of the sanctuary; but some earnest brethren seemed to think that it was unlawful to hire conveyances to go to the house of prayer, while others were anxious that Christian liberty should not be infringed, nor the conscience of one brother made the rule of another. Mr. Macfie well reminded the meeting, that charity in diversity was the fundamental principle of the Alliance, and therefore that as to the mode of observing the day every man was responsible to his Heavenly Master alone. It was cheering to learn that sound principles upon the sacredness of the first day of the week are beginning to extend in Sweden, France, and other continental countries.

Popery was to have been handled by Principal Candlish, and it is to be hoped that he will yet, in some form, give to the world his impressions about the growth of this monster in the British Isles—its causes, and its cure. The remarks of the Rev. C. Seaver and Dr. Wylie, although pertinent, were not novel, and were heard by a comparatively thin and exhausted meeting.

The state of the Continental Churches was presented by various brethren, British and foreign, from abroad. Italy was the appropriate theme of the Rev. Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn, who read a statement full of interesting details and valuable information. It is well known that a considerable spirit of disunion exists between the "Fratelli," as the non-Vaudois Italian converts style themselves, and the Vaudois Church itself. In this controversy, Dr. Stewart's judgment and affections are enlisted on the side of the Vaudois, and he gave expression to his opinions with characteristic decision and emphasis. Had any member been disposed to have advocated the side of the "Fratelli," the meeting would doubtless have heard him with respect and attention; but the Alliance could not be identified with the opinions of any of its members on the course pursued by foreign communities. It could only implore both to live together in peace, and show to their nation "how much these Christians love one another."

The other representatives from Italy were the Rev. Messrs. Meille and Pilatte. Signor Meille, of Turin, although an Italian, speaks the French tongue with the accuracy and force of a native. He gave expression to the most generous sentiments of Christian sympathy with all his Italian Christian brethren. "We do not want Italy," said the reverend gentleman, himself a Vaudois pastor, "the Church of the Vaudois, or the Church of any other party, but the Church of Jesus Christ." There were some men whose whole aspect and speech are alike redolent of genuine Christian sincerity and feeling. Their inner spirit moulds their countenances into a peaceful and benignant expression, with which all their words harmonise. Such a man was Dr. Cæsar Malan, of Geneva. Such a man is Signor Meille, of Turin. He was followed by M. Pilatte, of Nice, who spoke in English with a vigour natural to an energetic Frenchman trained in the United States of America, and who stirred the meeting to enthusiasm by his demand of Rome for Italy. "Italy has grown. It is not yet fully developed. It wants Rome. (Cheers.) It shall have it. (Cheers.) It must have it. (Renewed cheers.) If the wishes of all free men in Europe are heard on high for other ends than the political power and glory of Italy—for that greater end, the glory of Christ—Rome will be once more the capital of free Italy." (Applause.)

Professor de St. Hilaire gave a statement of the progress of sound Protestant principles in France, of which he took an encouraging view. He dealt at large on the effects produced by M. Renan's "Life of Jesus," which are not all evil; for the work has given rise to extensive inquiry; and indifference, especially amongst the upper classes, has been exchanged for excitement. A formal answer is being prepared by M. E. de Pressensé, an abbreviated edition of which is to precede the more elaborate work. Although the Professor speaks the English tongue with great accuracy, yet none who have heard him in English only can have any idea of the brilliancy, beauty, and force which mark his addresses in his native French.

To Foreign Missions no less than two evenings were assigned; but the information was of general interest. India was well represented by the Rev. Mr. Hall, late of Madras; the Rev. Dr. Murray Mitchell, from Bombay; and the Rev. Dr. Prochnow, of Berlin, long a missionary himself, and now the director of the "Gossner" Missionary and other institutions in Prussia. Africa found an earnest advocate in the Rev. James Stewart; the Feejee Islands in the Rev. Mr. Wilson; and the Turkish Empire in the Rev. Dr. Wood, of New York.

Home Missions again occupied a considerable portion of time; but although Messrs. Wilson, Robertson, and Macgill discharged the duty imposed upon them with credit to themselves, there was no novelty in their facts, principles, or plans. On this subject the most interesting statement occurred in a speech delivered at a meeting for foreign missions by Mr. Burns Thomson, superintendent of the Cowgate Mission Dispensary. It was evident from his account of the effect produced amongst the poorest classes in Edinburgh, that medical missions, if planted in the worst neighbourhoods of our great cities and towns, would prove sources of healing both to the bodies and souls of multitudes whom no other agency can reach. The Master went not only for healing and teaching. The medical missionary follows in His footsteps; and if only one is successful in Madagascar or China, he may be still more so, under the Divine blessing, in Westminster or Bethnal-green.

From this resumé it will be seen that the Council provided a very comprehensive bill of fare for the visitors at the Conference; and if any exception is to be taken their procedure, it is that the provision was too ample. Less lecturing and more time for discussion was much desired by a large number present, especially of the members. Had each subject been introduced by one brief paper, and an opportunity been then given for free interchange of thought upon its contents, the Conference would have been more deserving of its name. As it was, there was little possibility of conferring upon any topic; and even the Alliance itself, its position, and its prospects—a subject demanding at present the most anxious consideration of its friends—had not a single hour appropriated to it. Dr. Davis, indeed, in a speech which was heartily received, concluded the meetings by an earnest appeal to those present to join its ranks, and to assist it in spreading the principles of Christian union; but had there been a reference on the Alliance, misapprehensions would have been cleared away, if any such exist, and a large accession gained over to its membership.

Two other topics deserve a passing notice. A letter was received from some Berlin professors, urging the Alliance to use its influence to secure peace between Germany and Britain, and containing an indictment against Denmark. A cautious answer was prepared, but it did not, and could not without offence, express a strong conviction entertained by the meeting, that however unwise Denmark might have been, its course did not justify the violent conduct of Prussia and the barbarity of its armies. Should such communications be received in future? The Alliance does well to become the medium of presenting the claims of the persecuted to the British public, but ought it to lend itself to give to the world the attacks of its partisans?

Another question is suggested by certain appeals for pecuniary aid which were made in the course of the proceedings. How far it is well to permit assemblies for conference to be converted unawares into meetings for raising funds. It may be right, but there were some who felt that an undue advantage was being taken of them.

Experience should be recorded for future guidance, and the next Conference will be all the better for a careful consideration of any defects, supposed or real, of the last. Upon the whole, no one who attended these meetings will regret his journey to Edinburgh, and they have left as their memorial a series of masterly papers on topics which deeply affect the faith and the duty of the Christian commonwealth.

THE TRUE WORD IN THE RIGHT TONE.

ALL truth is precious, and the most important truths are those which bear on the highest themes. Of such truths the great repository is Holy Writ, and we are unspeakably beholden to the men who, by searching the Scriptures, find out the treasures, and make them more widely available. We are indebted to the deep-sea diver who fathoms the places hard to be understood, and who, opening some dark saying, brings to view a pearl of great price. We are indebted to the skillful lapidary who, familiar with facets and angles of cleavage, removes from some doctrine that earthy dulness which it has contracted in our coarse handling, and by setting it in a proper light makes it flash with tinted glory, like a lamp in a rainbow, like the sun encaged in a fountain. We are indebted to the interpreter who has enucleated the meaning of a mysterious passage; still more indebted to the theologian who has given due prominence to a doctrine overlooked or undervalued, and not only secured it in a shrine where henceforward it may be safe from desecration, but placed it on a pedestal where, as it sheds light on lesser truths, it may withal arrest the most cursory beholder.

But "the truth as it is in Jesus" consists of something more than doctrinal propositions, nor can any number of dogmas embody the whole of scriptural divinity.

You take up the Elements of Euclid, and as you proceed from statement to statement, you feel that it all is true. Everything which is here advanced respecting the properties of triangles, and squares, and circles, is so correct, that the moment you understand the proof—indeed, often before you peruse the proof—the moment you understand the theorem, there is an end of the matter, that statement stands fast, that conclusion is irresistible and is established for ever.

But you never think of the "spirit" of Euclid. Was he grave? was he playful? was he morose or kind-hearted? was he a good man or a bad? a favourite with his friends or a misanthrope? And so when you take up a volume of chronology or the transactions of a learned society, you don't disturb yourself as to the temper or disposition of the authors. Historic dates, mathematical propositions, scientific observations, are quite irrespective of the heart and soul of the writer. However good and loveable he may have been, it does not come out in his work; and however true are his sayings, they are truths of the driest description—dry annals, dry demonstrations, dry records of phenomena. A copying machine, a calculating engine, a photographic apparatus, could have done the most of it—could have registered these solar spots, could have worked these logarithms, could have transcribed these dates as well as a man of heart and soul; and, indeed, in such a case, a chief effort of the will is to keep out the heart and soul, and prevent them from disturbing the intellectual processes.

How different when you take up "Thoughts" by Pascal or John Foster, a history like Macaulay's, a poem like "The Task." Here, too, you have got a book, but not a book made by machinery. It is a book with a man inside of it—the living man—the whole man, heart, and soul, and strength, and mind. And although you may take out the truths he tells—although you may write a chronological abstract of the history—although you may make a memorandum of the keen intuitions or subtle inductions of the sage—although you may string on your rosary the maxims and metaphors of the bard—you know that over and above these truths you have encountered something more—the man of like passions with yourself, in whom these truths lived and moved and had a being; and the author in his living entirety—the hearty historian, the playful poet, the keen and caustic moralist—have exerted on your consenting mind an influence which abstract propositions never can produce.

Where a moral or spiritual result is to be wrought, it is not to be attained by the mere doctrines which the author lays down; but very influential, heart upon heart, is the tone of mind, the turn or disposition of the teacher. And in considering any doctrine—in trying to ascertain its precise extent and import—it is of much moment to ascertain, if we can, the spirit in which it was originally spoken or written.

"The words which I speak unto you," said the Lord Jesus, "they are spirit and they are life." They are not mere oracles. They are the utterance of one who is the Life as well as the Truth. And in order to be in communion with the speaker, it is not enough to catch the mere formal proposition: you must be so far in unison as to comprehend his feeling, and for the moment share it. "It is the spirit that quickeneth." Life comes to souls, not through the "flesh" of definitions and dogmas, but from the living God, who in living words enters the heart-sanctuary, and who, from the time He takes up His habitation there, makes it a living temple. The "spirit," then, of Christ's speaking, and so far of all Scriptures, in which the living

Word of God is the true speaker—in the Psalms the chief minstrel, in the Proverb the chief moralist, in the Prophecies the true seer, in the Narratives the true historiographer—the spirit of Christ, what is it, as distinguished from the doctrine which the Bible reveals and the truths it defines?

It is a godly spirit. As has been remarked of England's great favourite, "His genius was wide as the world, yet not in any sense above the world." "His men as passionate and strong; his women are beautiful with a loveliness that scarcely ever reminds us of heaven: he has 'neither raised the mortal to the skies,' nor 'brought the angel down;' and notwithstanding his scriptural parallels, and moralities manifold, there is scarcely any Christian poet from whom the thirst for the supernatural is so remarkably absent."* What is the lack in so many books of man's making, the glory of the Bible: in it God is everywhere, and God is all in all. And although the remote and awful reverence of Amos and Ezekiel at last gives place to the filial nearness and affection into which Jesus introduced His disciples, never throughout the Book do we lose sight of the all-pervading presence and all-controlling supremacy of the King immortal, and in alternate outbursts of goodness and majesty, "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice: the Lord reigneth, let the people tremble," hope is encouraged and presumption is checked, whilst, with all their condescension to our finite capacity, the Divine perfections make no concession to our sinful wishes, or to that wayward propensity of fallen humanity which is ever more feigning a god like unto itself.

Still, like the spirit of Jesus, the spirit of the Bible is a kindly spirit. Not aloof and arrogant, not lecturing, not reprimanding, the scriptural tone is sympathetic, considerate, encouraging. We cannot call the Bible a "genial" book, for the books commonly so called accept man as he is, and leave him very much as they find him; whereas, the Bible avows that man is wrong and wretched, and seeks to make him better: hence its pity is sublime, its sympathy, if that of a kindred heart, is still the sympathy of perfect Goodness and stainless Purity. "Turn ye, turn ye; why will ye die?" "How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity! and fools hate knowledge? Turn you at my reproof; behold, I will pour out my spirit upon you, I will make known my words unto you." "Come unto me, and I will give you rest."

The Bible spirit is a serious spirit. There are some gay and sprightly writers whom we enjoy for the moment, and who perhaps leave in our minds a small residuum of knowledge or instruction: but in dealing with the highest matters—in questions of life and death—jesting would not be convenient, and there is small room for even irony. And such is the view which the Bible takes of man's depravity. So terrible are the calamities which sin is still to bring upon the earth, and so fearful are the prospects of the sinner who dies unchanged, that we cannot wonder that the tone of Inspiration is usually grave and solemn. Predictions like the Rise of Antichrist, the Apostacy, or world's falling away from God, the Battle of Armageddon, and the great Woes which are yet to overtake the great wickednesses—such predictions are naturally set to mournful music; just as the wrath of God is revealed against an unrighteousness in accents firm and unmistakeable.

Yet a hopeful spirit. Even where the sky is overcast the air is warm, because above the clouds the sun is shining; and in the quarter from which the apparent sets in the horizon is clear. Even where great and precious promises are not actually spoken, the glow of the Gospel is felt; and beyond the murky battle cloud of man's crimes and conflicts, the sun of millennial glory keeps shining. With our world the worst is not over yet, the best is also coming; and though sin be had a long and disastrous reign, grace shall also reign unto eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. So, grave and serious as it is, the Bible is also a sustaining book, and has done more to keep up the heart and inspire the effort of good men than all other books together.

Finally, the Bible spirit is a holy spirit. Full of God, it is full of goodness. Need we say how everlasting rectitude runs through its precepts and reproofs?—how the beauties of holiness blossom up from every page, and how its very air is sanctity? If it were not such a holy book, would not bad men like it better? and if there were in it less of the living God, are there not many to whom, in virtue of its other charms, it would prove a more attractive volume?

The words which Jesus speaks are spoken in a spirit heavenly, gracious, earnest, encouraging; hence their hallowing effect. Not only is it the truth He speaks, but the spirit in which He speaks it is a spirit loving, compassionate, faithful to the souls of men, and loyal to the Lord of all. And it is not to the mere momentousness of their announcements, the mere intrinsic weight of their sayings, vast as these are, that His words owe their amazing power; for stronger than any separate truth, there is in them the True One himself, and if we can catch and repeat them as spoken by Him, there won't be what there too often is when uttered by us—the kind word coldly spoken, the tender solemn warning harshly spoken, the most gracious thing in all the world, God's Gospel, gruffly spoken.

If so, it is the wisdom of those who desire strong consolation to get as much as possible into contact with the living Christ. "The flesh profiteth nothing," and it often happens that ministers and books and systems of divinity, if they do not lead the inquirer in the wrong direction, do not conduct him far enough. You are not far enough till, so to speak, you are within sight and hearing of the Saviour himself—till you are near enough to see the kindness in His countenance and to perceive the grace which is poured into His lips; till you are near enough to descry that God's beloved Son is truly the seeker of lost souls, so that you can entrust Him with your own; till you are near enough to catch that voice which with gentle but immortal cadence fills our dispensation, and which as it enters your spirit publishing peace, in the joy of pardon drowns the love of sin.

Those who are called to teach Christianity should try to do it as nearly as possible in the Master's spirit. So taught, it does not consist of mere articles or propositions. In order to get a creed at all complete, we do not look at the letters painted on the wall or printed in the book, but we look to the Lord Jesus. When we want to say, "I believe in God the Father Almighty," we can hardly frame to pronounce it till Jesus shows plainly that God indeed is a Father; and so when we want to believe in the forgiveness of sins, in the resurrection of the body, in the life everlasting, we have to look to Him in whom pardon and life are impersonate. And so with every doctrine in divinity. Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ, and truth as spoken by Him was "truth in love;" and to try to separate Christ's doctrine from Christ's life and Christ's spirit, is to give us a rose without the scent, a rainbow without the colour, an anthem without the music, a summer without the sun; it is to offer a stone to those who ask for bread, it is to exhibit fossil ferns and a piece of petrified timber to those who would fain be conducted to the Tree of Life and the Pastures green. God's sovereignty, as inquirers have sometimes viewed it, and as a cold theology has sometimes showed it, is very formidable; for, dis severed from the Living God, a mere attribute may add to the blindness of caprice the fixity of fate; but, as viewed by the Lord Jesus, it was a joyful thought that the helm was in hands so wise and holy, and lifting His eyes to the Father's throne, He rejoiced in spirit, and said, "Father, I thank thee." Predestination, as men have sometimes taken it, is a bar to the Fountain opened, rendering access doubly difficult, and reducing the number of the saved; predestination, as the Saviour put it, is a palisade around the sheepfold, barring nothing out except the roaring lion, and ensuring the safety of all who are once within: "To my sheep I give eternal life, neither shall any pluck them out of my Father's hand." And in unison with representations so bright and worthy, those doctrines of God's sovereignty and electing grace which are so often mere tenets in men's systems, but which in the theology of Jesus were living truths, awaken the rapture of like-minded apostles as they exclaim, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace."

Truth is a rock, and on that rock faith plants its foot and feels secure. But even on the rock you cannot live long without an atmosphere, and the believer's atmosphere is love. That atmosphere is viewless, transparent, often forgotten; still it is real, and it is vital. "The words that I speak are spirit," says the Saviour. Over and above the resting-place which weary spirits have found at His feet, which guilty consciences have found in His arms, there is an afflatus gone forth from those words of His which to inhale and be surrounded with is like entering Heaven's vestibule. You may have felt an influence from a fellow-creature's words, and as you read the manly sense and wholesome energy of Walter Scott, the grand enthusiasm of Chalmers, the sublime regards of Niebuhr, the sunny suffusion of Richter, there was for the moment a spell upon your spirit—an induction or transference from that other mind into your own; and even without being able to recall facts or sayings, you had still derived a benefit—a spiritual or moral benefit over and above any specific addition to your intellectual knowledge. And so, communing with Christ—living in His society and listening to His words as far as the fixed and prayerful perusal of Scripture enables you to do—His words will abide in you. They will, according to your need, exert an influence tonic or soothing—cheering your sadness, reviving your languor, reproving your earthliness, correcting your morbidness, animating your faith and hope, and in a fuller development of Heaven-born powers and tendencies helping forward your sanctification.

See here, if not the basis of ecclesiastical union, the secret of Christian communion. The words which I speak unto you, says Jesus, are spirit and they are life; and the man who has affinity for these words is so far one spirit with Christ—he is a Christian, and I should not like to exclude from communion with myself the man who is in communion with my Lord. Looking back to the fathers of the early Church, and looking on our neighbour Christians of the present day, one may observe a great lack of clear and consistent ideas, and may find important truth mixed with astounding errors. Yet, after all, if it is to be by their fruits that we know them—if the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, goodness, meekness, temperance—if love to Christ constitutes true discipleship—we must accept them as brethren; and if any challenge your fraternisation with such, your apology must be, "If we are not exactly of one symbol, we are at least of one heart and one soul. If there is a sentence in the creed which we cannot say together, there is nothing in Christ which we would wish to be different, and heresies of the heart are quite as dangerous and to me as estranging as errors in the head. You yourself would allow that verbal soundness is a poor substitute for vital godliness; and although you call him heterodox, I do not find him heteropneustic."

nal which exerts considerable influence on public opinion, the Temps of Paris, has inserted in its columns a series of articles on the legal right of priests to marry. This piquant controversy has attracted the serious attention of the educated, and has called forth keen rejoinders in the Ultramontane camp. No one the Romish Church the right to impose on its clergy the obligation of celibacy; religious communion is at liberty to make its own rules, provided there be no violation of social morality; and if the law is to have an understanding with counsellors to forbid priests to marry, the land has nothing to do with it. The real question is this: When a priest renounces his sacerdotal engagements, does he lose his place in society as an ordained minister, ought he not to recover his right to contract marriage? Men who really value the conditions of religious liberty, entertain the shadow of a doubt on this subject. Evidently the priest, who is a priest, ought to recover his rights in their full extent; and as every man can legally contract a marriage if of suitable age, an ex-priest can the Romish Church refuses to admit of just and obvious principles. She maintains that the sacerdotal character is such that the magistrates ought absolutely to prevent a priest from marrying, and such priest should no longer exercise his function, or though he may have embraced Protestant religion.

reasons alleged by the Jesuit papers in support of the position they thus take are singular. It is maintained that it is the duty of the State to enforce the fulfilment of the vows; that the violation of an oath is to be sanctioned by the laws; that, if auricular confession would be made, if, a few days afterwards, a priest is to marry; and that this prospect encourages badly-disposed ecclesiastics to a life of vicious lives.

Temps has not had much trouble in such poor sophisms as these. First, the promise made by the priest, at the time of his ordination, is not at all a legal contract, inasmuch as the magistrate does not interfere in it in any way. Secondly, the fear that auricular confession would be rendered less easy than at present is illusory, inasmuch as priests are able to marry in England, Switzerland, Prussia, and Holland, and we do not see that the Roman Catholics of those countries abstain from confession. Thirdly, if the prospect of the possibility of a marriage should threaten certain unpleasant results, it is for the leaders of the Romish Church to provide against them. It is not for the public legislator to act the part of a moral police on behalf of the clergy.

The discussion, you see, is a somewhat serious one. It is not probable that the Government will, at the present moment, give their sanction to the views of the Temps. Popery still possesses much influence in the higher regions of the State. But the question is making way in the national mind, and that is something. The compulsory celibacy of priests must disappear one day, as so many other antiquated institutions of the middle ages have done.

OPPOSITION TO CLERICAL SCHOOLS AT BORDEAUX, ETC.

There are in France two sets of schools for children of the humbler class; one conducted by laymen, and placed under the control and management of the University; the other established by priests or semi-priests, such as the Frères Ignorantins, and the Frères de la Doctrine Chrétienne. In reality, these are Jesuits, disguised under a false name, who obtain the control of the education of the people.

The clerical schools are becoming very numerous, and are daily upon the increase. This is easily explained. In countries where Popery reigns supreme—in the Pontifical States, for example, in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, as it used to be called, and in Spain—elementary schools are extremely scarce, and the lower classes vegetate in gross ignorance. The state of things in France is totally different. The reverend disciples of Ignatius Loyola are fully aware that they have no power to prevent the opening of these schools. And in this position, what do they do? They resolve that they themselves will establish schools—and plenty of them—animated by their own spirit and governed according to their own principles.

The great rule of the Frères Ignorantins, in these elementary establishments, is to give their pupils the least possible instruction. They teach them the Romish catechism, the *Mtanie*s of the Virgin Mary, and so forth, with the rudiments of reading and writing. The intellect of the children is not developed in any way, so that these schools serve rather to augment the ignorance of the people than to dissipate it.

This state of things gives rise, most justly, to a feeling of dissatisfaction. All enlightened men, in connexion with the press, in academical councils, and in other positions, are opposed to the extension of the schools of the Frères Ignorantins, and use every effort to get them superseded by lay institutions.

The municipal council of Bordeaux has recently given a memorable example of this opposition. An application having been made to them to vote a pecuniary grant to one of these clerical schools, they positively refused to do so, saying that the instruction given by the Brethren of the Christian Doctrine is very inadequate. The Jesuit organs expressed warm displeasure at this decision; but their anger will not prevent many other municipal councils from adopting the same policy. It is of consequence that the education of our people should at length be conducted with earnestness and ability.

COLLECTIONS FOR ANOTHER CANONISATION AT ROME.

Among the accomplishments of the Romish clergy, the highest place must be given to the invention of the most skilful means for increasing the amount of their revenues. The Pope and his subordinates well know how to make the most of the purses of their devotees, and they succeed, by all imaginable means, in getting hold of some of their money.

One of the most lucrative of their methods is the old custom of canonisations. It would seem that the Roman Pontiff ought to make saints without receiving any remuneration, for this is certainly work of a spiritual kind. But the fact is far otherwise: canonisations cost a great deal of money—100,000 francs, and even 200,000 francs and more. How is this? From various causes. First, a canonisation is never pronounced in a day; it is an affair which lasts for three or four generations. Then, inquiries are instituted to prove the miracles of persons whose canonisation is sought; payment is required for advocates, reporters, correspondence, expenses, &c., &c. And besides, and the cardinals display great splendour when the judgment is pronounced, and naturally these salaries must be handsomely remunerated as well as their servants, the monks, tans, and others, who take part in it.

There lived in France, in the 18th century, one Marie Alacoque, a sort of pious nun, whose folly and superstition such, that her name has become famous. The Jesuits have written the biography of Marie Alacoque, in which they relate that, from the age of four, she had long private interviews with God, in which she possessed, in an eminent degree, the gift of prophecy; and she performed miracles, which are fully authenticated by the evidence of her reverend biographer. The name of Jesus was carved upon the point of a penknife, with which, she said, caused ineffable pleasure. She founded the community of the Sacrament, which has continued to the present day, and gains numerous adherents. In 1816, Marie Alacoque has been already beatified, and in 1820 time is come for granting to her full canonisation. But something is wanted; Money. The Bishop of Autun, in whose diocese Marie Alacoque resided, published a long letter, in which he extolling, in glowing language, the moral virtues of this holy person, hit the main point. "You unders dearest brethren," he says, "the prayer for this canonisation necessitates great sums of money. We require the exercise of your piety. Rome reckons upon it. . . . We appeal, then, not only to the faithful of the diocese, but to all souls that are devoted to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. . . . And that from all points of the world they will contribute, according to his merit, by a moderate offering, to the splendour of this great demonstration."

The Bishop of Autun addresses the poor as well as the rich, and more than one family will deprive itself of the bread which it needs, in order to support the luxury and extravagance of the Roman cardinals! This is called almsgiving!

FORMATION AND RULES OF THE BIBLE SOCIETY OF FRANCE.

I have already mentioned to you the schism which broke out in our stant Bible Society. The majority of the committee belonged to the rationalist or heret party. These gentlemen violently attacked our ancient and venerable versions of the Scriptures. They pretended that they were filled with contradictions and faults of language. To remedy this, they proposed to circulate a translation made at Geneva, in 1535—a work inspired by the spirit of simianism, or Unitarianism, which is now dominant in the city of Calvin. This is not

The same members of the committee re-announced a new version of the books of Scripture, the translation of which has been entrusted to young, unknown men. As the Holy Word of God, designed to awaken our souls and to edify our families in connexion with the domestic altar, is given to the caprice and arbitrary interpretation the first comer!

It is evident that men of piety and serious purpose could not co-operate in such undertakings. They gave in their resignation, and established a new institution, the name of which is the Bible Society of France. The following rules deserve to be given at length:—

"1. The Bible Society of France is founded on belief in the Divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, and in their infallible authority in matters of religion.

"2. The French versions circulated by the society are, for the present, those of Ostervald and Martin, without the Apocrypha. If, however, the majority of the churches demand other faithful versions, these may be distributed by the society."

There is here, as you see, two important things: first, an explicit profession of belief in the inspiration and authority of the Bible; and, secondly, an engagement to distribute only authorised versions, or faithful translations, which may be asked for by the majority of the churches. These are valuable pledges to the Protestants of France. We have no difficulty in admitting that our French version might be better; but wise precautions must be taken lest, under the pretext of mending existing translations, the Word of God should be mutilated.

We have now, therefore, three Bible Societies—the old Protestant Bible Society, which is managed by the Rationalists; the new Bible Society of France, which belongs to the National Church, but is under the guarantee of a vigilant orthodoxy; and the English and Foreign Bible Society, established by the members of the Dissenting or Independent Churches. This multiplying of ~~their~~ institutions, perhaps, offers some inconveniences, but it has also certain advantages. The Bible will be circulated the more abundantly in our country, and this is a cheering fact.

DEATH OF PROFESSOR MATTER.

For some time past death has made great havoc in the ranks of our professors of theology and our pastors, both Lutheran and Reformed. I shall not mention all these losses; for obituary notices have but little interest for foreign readers, except in the case of eminent men, who have acquired a wide reputation.

Among these persons of superior standing, I must mention M. Matter, Professor in the Lutheran Theological College at Strasbourg, Inspector-General of the University, Honorary Counsellor of Public Instruction, Corresponding Member of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres, Officer of the Legion of Honour, &c. M. Matter reached this high rank by his own merits and his assiduous exertions. He was born in 1791, of a family of poor peasants in Alsace. He received a good education, and soon gave evidence of superior capacity. His works are numerous. He wrote an "Ecclesiastical History," in four volumes, which, while not exempt from faults, was the fruit of vast and ripe erudition. M. Matter also produced works, which were generally appreciated, on the "School of Alexandria," "Gnosticism," the "Moral and Political History of the Last Three Centuries," "Modern Philosophy in Relation to Religion," and others. He pursued his labours until extreme old age; for no great while ago he issued a "Life of Swedenborg," the Swedish mystic; and at the time he was removed by death, he had in course of preparation a book upon "Fenelon and his School."

One fact must be remarked with reference to M. Matter—namely, that in proportion as he acquired more experience and became more matured, he advanced in the Evangelical faith. Having studied in the German universities, during his earlier years, his intellect was led astray by rationalist opinions. But, after more careful examination of the Scriptures, philosophy, and the history of theology, he renounced the views of the negative school, and openly professed the fundamental doctrines of revelation. This is a proof, amid many others of the same kind, of the inherent power of Christian truth. Trifling and superficial minds abandon the word of Christ, and more enlightened men return to it.

While the Lutheran College of Strasbourg has been deprived of one of its most distinguished doctors, another professor, M. Colani, has been appointed to the chair of sacred eloquence. M. Colani is well known in our religious world by the Revue de Théologie, of which he has been, for several years, the principal editor. This publication is completely devoted to the negative school. It has contained articles by M. Scherer and other theologians of the same class, in which all the doctrines of revelation, from original sin to the inspired declarations respecting the final judgment, are denied.

Assuredly M. Colani is a man of learning and character. He has published some volumes of sermons, which, while very poor and incomplete in a doctrinal point of view, are very remarkable for originality of design and power of expression. But it is deeply to be regretted that he should have been appointed to a chair of theology. His lectures and his influence will tend to train pastors who will be far more likely to offer to their flocks philosophical lucubrations rather than the salutary truths of the Gospel.

M. Duruy, Minister of Public Instruction, appears himself to have been embarrassed by this choice; for, with the decree making the appointment, he published a letter, addressed to the Rector of the Academy of Strasbourg, in which he took his stand upon the resolutions of the Lutheran Faculty of Theology and of the General Consistory, and upon a declaration in which M. Colani, in ambiguous terms, maintains that he holds the same sentiments as were held by Luther. It is a said affair altogether.

CANDIDATURE OF M. JEAN MONOD FOR THE CHAIR OF THEOLOGY AT MONTAUBAN.

Our consistories of the National Reformed Church are also occupied, just at present, in choosing a successor to the venerable M. Jalaguier, who was professor of dogmatic theology. The suffrages have been given, from the first, almost unanimously, to M. Jean Monod, at present pastor at Nîmes, and son of the excellent Frédéric Monod, whose death was so deeply regretted by Christians of all countries.

It would be premature to offer any opinion upon the position in which M. Jean Monod is now placed, and I shall abstain, on this occasion, from explaining how it is that he has united the two opposite parties in voting for him. This is a delicate and complicated subject. I shall only say, that the pastor in question is known for his deep piety, his zeal in the ministry of the Gospel, and the integrity of his character. He has published a Declaration of Principles, which contains the essential doctrines of the Gospel. The choice of such a pastor will be of great advantage to our churches. X. X. X.

THE WAR OF PRINCIPLES, SOCIAL AND RELIGIOUS.

"No rose-water policy!" is the cry of those who are pressing on the crisis of European destiny. "France threw down the gauntlet seventy-five years ago against the divine right of kings; it was in the name of the people of all lands; the duel is now entering into a decisive period. On one side are democracy, liberty, the sovereignty of the people, new rights, the expansion of all popular faculties, strength, devotedness, and energy; on the other are despotism, oppression of body and conscience, iniquity—in short, the pretended right divine. The duel between contrary principles leaves no room for combination. One must destroy the other. It is wise and well to familiarise the public with such manly prospects, rather than to soothe it with delusive hopes." "No rose-water policy!" cries Strauss, whose new "Life of Jesus" is being rapidly prepared for our public; liberty can never be established except on the ruins of supernatural Christianity. A great social interest is contained in the controversy upon the four Gospels. The aim of the modern critics is most practical; faith in the supernatural is the rivet of the chain which enslaves mankind. With regard to Christ, the question is no longer a question of His ministry, but of His crown. "No rose-water policy!" cries a French philosopher; the very idea of God is in peril, it is fading away from men's souls. Thick clouds seem gathering between heaven and us. Are the three thousand years of philosophic progress among men to result in an emphatic naturalism and end in the idolatry of man by man? If we run through all parties, we have the same foreboding of evil, and each is preparing in its own way to respond to the cry, "No rose-water policy!" Even the calm and venerable M. Guizot, whose vigorous pen is just now engaged in a noble vindication of Christianity, against Despotism, Catholicism and Criticising Protestantism that although the Christian religion will never disappear from the world, and entirely withdraw its light from man—destinies being from above—yet for men to return from such aberrations, and light and harmony to be restored to modern society there must burst over it one of those wild

d revolutionary storms from which man-learn wisdom only after having suffered most violent pangs. "Can we be raised from such a fall," chimes in the liberal Gratry, "by any human strength? Do men of practical experience smile when a man is devoted to moral worth and regenerating virtue? And are they not right, if Christ himself, by His supernatural power, does not interfere?"

UNSUCCESSFUL EVANGELISTIC EFFORTS.

Nothing is more startling than the coinciding apprehensions and predictions of a time of peril to faith, morals, and civilisation, and the converging of hatred against genuine Christianity, because almost wholly confounded with its degrading and carnal counterfeit. That a sifting-time is at hand, there is no doubt, and if not so, it will pass from speculation into fact. If the foundations be destroyed, will the righteous do? Possess their souls in patience, until the Lord himself rebuke in derision who set themselves against Him and His Christ. When, after battle with the wise, with their own sons, the sons of God turn to the limp of Gospel truth, and arm themselves with a foolish pebble and an insignificant stone, they will discover the strength which can give them victory. The workers in the lower ranks of society find that the soil on the heights is coming down in a fearful ratio, but all who act with expectation of the Lord's presence, love, and power, are continually compelled to sing the song of victory, as soul after soul wins its weapon of resistance and sits at the feet of Jesus. It is the experience of faithful labourers, that the field was never so large and never so vast. Time, time! or labourers, is all they ask. But the faithful and glowing Christians are rare; the faithful go about mourning over present future sterility, while they see not that God is graciously suspending His judgment and sending down refreshing showers for faithful men look up for them. There is a strange shyness respecting the grace of God and the reviving influence of His Spirit, when it comes not in the usual channels; and this shyness is an insuperable obstacle to the bold, outspoken Christianity we need must have, if we would contend for the adversary, and save souls. Here, in Paris especially, prayer is made daily, and lay meetings are held, some of which flourish vigorously. An increasing number of tracts are being published. No opposition is made to their quiet circulation, and when they are refused it is from a mistaken notion that they come from the clericals. The dislike to these latter is intense; and book after book derives its popularity from disclosures of the hidden life of priest and nun.

FRENCH WESLEYAN CONFERENCE—NEW CHAPELS.

The French Wesleyan Methodist Conference met at Nîmes in the latter part of June. It was presided over by Pastor Hocart, who is to represent the French Methodists at the British Conference this year. The reports presented were, as a whole, encouraging. Souls have submitted to Christ, and are rejoicing in Him, in most of the stations. A gracious influence has been experienced in some of the schools. Some small towns seem moved with a sense of spiritual need, and the chapels are besieged. In others, the Lord's-day is beginning to be properly observed. A new chapel was opened by the President of the Conference at Vigan, in the Cevennes, on June the 26th, and was filled to overflowing on the occasion. Another chapel has been erected in Champagne, on a piece of ground formerly occupied by a convent, and not far from the spot where stood the castle of the Duke of Guise, who ordered the massacre of Vassy. Still more recently, last Sunday, a new Wesleyan chapel was opened at Thernes, having removed from rather an obscure part into a populous neighbourhood, where souls are already seeking the truth. As usual, members of all other Evangelical churches were present to join fraternally in asking for a blessing on the work.

THE UNIVERSAL ISRAELITE ALLIANCE.

Every intelligent Christian looks with more or less interest towards Israel, with whose destinies the happiness of the world is bound up. The Universal Israelite Alliance, commenced in Paris in 1860, with a handful of members, now numbers 3,000, and extends its protecting and cheering influence all over the world over. Its aim is the welfare, progress, and protection of Jews in every land, the obtaining information as to the existence, numbers, and condition of Jewish communities, and the raising from the dust of down-trodden Israelites in barbarous, Mohammedan, or so-called Christian lands. This year the Alliance met in Herz's Concert Hall, Paris. About 400 were present, and the evening was exceedingly interesting and animating. The president, M. Crémieux, gave an attractive speech from his chair, which from indisposition he had not been expected to occupy. He was full of hope and prospects of success for the Alliance. The number of 7,000,000 known Jews, shows them to be more numerous than at any previous time. He delighted the audience in retracing their history—slaves in the midst of idolators—rescued by God and taught by Him the unity of the Godhead, nationality, and freedom, while other nations had a god for every passion, vice, and cruelty. He challenged admiration for the grand and immutable Decalogue, and looked forward to the time when the world will know the Jews better, and approach them saying, "Forgive, let us be brothers!"

The report gave interesting information as to the generally favourable replies of various governments to the appeals of the Alliance against injustice to Jews, its extending influence (it has members now even in central America, on the shores of the Pacific), and the increase of schools. Its receipts for the last twelvemonth were 8,46 francs; and its expenses, 7,662 francs.

Israel and its movements are of no small interest during the present influx of emigrants. Israel's God is denied as flatly by the modern critics as the divinity of Jesus by themselves. So far as the unity and personality of the Godhead are concerned, we fight shoulder to shoulder in the same ranks. To the prophet student the Jewish movement is one of the most striking points of the time. Sir Cullin Eardley was mentioned with grateful applause, and several speeches, among others that of Professor Pétavel, of Neuchâtel elicited much cheering.

SWITZERLAND.

THE RELIGIOUS ANNIVERSARIES AT BASLE.

A Basle journal says: The religious societies held their anniversaries from the 27th of June to this 1st July, amid vast audiences, drawn from the town and other places. Eight hundred persons received hospitality within our city, and the same, if not a larger number, came to town daily from the environs, and returned to the homes where they were staying every evening. The entire period, for five consecutive days, were, so to speak, passed either in the churches or in the gardens and grounds open to visitors for the delivery of addresses or for fraternal conversation. The Bible Society, the Society for Dispersed Protestants, the Friends of Israel, and the Beuggen Asylum, are institutions such as are to be found in any other town; only their annual meetings, as held here, possess a special interest, both because these are old and important societies, whose worth has been tested, and also because the large concourse of strangers affords a wide range for the selection of speakers. But this concourse itself is due especially to the Evangelical Missionary Society—a society not local in its character, but international, we may even say, cosmopolitan. A missionary society can hardly exist except upon a somewhat wide basis; it requires an horizon of ideas which is wider than that of territorial churches, and which makes it a confederation of various countries; it requires large resources, which can only be got together by the combination and united efforts of a great number of localities. This is the case with the Basle Missionary Society, and it makes a great impression on occasion of anniversary meetings. See here, for example this year, an aged servant of God, who passed thirty-three years consecutively, with a body of German emigrants in the Caucasus—who, while there, undertook the work of evangelist among the Tartars, and who gave us an account of a baptism in Tartary; notice, beside him, two missionaries from India, whose hair has been silvered by the toil, and who make us share their lengthened experience;—and yonder man, pale and enfeebled by the heat of a tropical climate—he is a Christian who has expended his strength in giving instruction to the negroes of the Gold Coast, and trained them to regular manual occupation;—and serve, also, those six brethren to whom the farewell benediction is being given: three are natives of Wurtemberg, two of Switzerland, one of Baden, and one of Russia; two are going to China, two to India, the fifth to Australia, and the sixth to the United States; two others left, some weeks since, for Basle and another for Africa. Then among the visitors, notice a superior officer of Prussia stationed upon the confines of Russia, who passed over the bridge on the Rhine, Basle, as a volunteer, then aged seventy in the year 1814, twelve months before the foundation of the Missionary Society; he relates to his brethren the story of his life, the way by which he has been guided by the Divine hand to Jesus. Beside him we see a young officer, our compatriot, who, in a few dierlike tone, electrifies the audience

hich has especially marked the course mittee is checked in its energetic efforts by its financial position. The society is burdened by old debts, amounting to the sum of 66,000 francs, and, in addition to this, the deficiency of last year reached 79,000 francs.

It has, therefore, the alternative, either to reduce the scale of its operations, or, which would be infinitely better, to obtain a considerable increase of contributions from the friends of missions.

the Government in most of the communes, and on the next generation it is to be hoped that their beneficial effects will be manifest.
In the meantime, few of those who reside in the country can read a word, so that colportage must, in the first instance, be confined to the towns." The priests of Italy, who outnumber, by ten to one at least, the ministers of religion in Great Britain, are responsible for this blot upon the Papal escutcheon.
They neither go in themselves to instruct the people, nor do they willingly allow others to do so. They not only wink at this ignorance, but proclaim it the mother of devotion.
The mother of superstitious devotion to the interests of the Church, our colporteurs and evangelists everywhere find it to be. Their work is a most uphill one, in every sense. No roseate hue colours their reports. Every piece of work well done has to be done in great faith and with much exertion. Every step of progress has to be combated for, often even unto blood, against secret, and powerful, and unscrupulous priestly machinations. The moral sense has been so undermined by the system of Rome, the conscience is so dead, in priest and people, that rarely does even the love of fair play side itself with the missionary, and more rarely still does the natural shame of villany stay the remorseless hand of the priest. No scruple interferes to prevent the adoption of any and every expedient that "good may come" to the Papal cause. Vice is pandered to, ignorance is played upon, prejudice is fanned even to blood-thirstiness, for the triumph of priestly rule. Of every one of these tactics, and many more unmentionable ones, we have lately made sad proof.

EVANGELICALS ANNOYED AND PERSECUTED.

Over the door of the Waldensian church, in Milan, a little boy was paid by a neighbouring church to paste up this bill: "Here there will be to-morrow evening a grand dancing festival. This is the head-quarters of Luther's ministers, and the house of the devil." The room above the Perugia locale was hired, and whenever the Evangelical service began such a hideous noise of rending rocks and tumbling houses was started, that the worshippers were speedily dispersed. The cowardly anonymous letter, threatening the stiletto to the evangelist, is an everyday occurrence, which seldom, I rejoice to say, drives the faithful preacher from his post. At Chiavenna weapons are supplied with which to attack the Protestants, and the cry is raised, "Death to the Evangelicals! Away with the servants of Satan!"

Near Sanzana a quiet reading meeting of twelve Christians, in their own private houses, is put down by the clamour of an excited populace. A bomb is thrown into the office of the Temporale, a vigorous opponent of the priesthood, which maintains constantly, with too convincing proofs, that theft built up the edifice of the temporal power, while cunning finished it and ignorance and superstition have maintained the building.

The dépôt in Florence is occasionally blocked up, by night, with all kinds of filth—a scene which the onlooking inmates of a neighbouring monastery enjoy. Such a widespread combination of priestly and of St. Vincent de Paul devotees, who now take the place in Italy of the hated Jesuits—though the name is changed, the system is unaltered—has been entered into in order to work upon the minds of landlords, through a bigoted brother, father, mother-in-law, or simple friend, that even in the large towns of Tuscany, such as Pisa, Leghorn, Lucca, Sienna, and Florence, it is becoming a herculean task to find shops, houses, or locales for the spread of that very Gospel which has been so largely received by the people of these places. Dr. de Sanctis, who is now so ably editing the Evangelical newspaper in Florence, had a house taken the other day, and every preliminary gone through, when at the last moment, before the contract was signed, the landlord backed out, on the ground that the tenant was an Italian who had changed his religion.

At Leghorn, the priests excite a tumult at the funeral of an Evangelical Roman refugee, in order to raise the accusation of disturbance of the peace against Mr. Ribet. In Pistoia they attempt the same thing, and are only defeated by the resolution of the authorities to maintain the law of freedom of conscience in connexion with this new and prosperous mission. They succeeded, however, in imprisoning for three months one of the worthiest of the Pistoia believers, because he imprudently invited the evangelist to preach in the military barracks. This man, a lieutenant in the royal army, was ten years in prison for Liberalism under the Bourbon régime, and was only liberated when Garibaldi seized Palermo, while his father was tortured to death under the mild sway of King Bomba.

THE PERSECUTIONS OF CLERICAL ORIGIN.

In regard to each of these cases cited, we have been careful to assure ourselves of the intervention of priestly influence, and let these few stand as specimens from a huge monthly catalogue which might be laid before your readers. Indeed, wherever the Gospel is carried in this land, we hear of threats, fines, imprisonments, banishments, persecutions in various shapes, as in the olden times. As yet, the cost of being an Evangelical in Italy has to be seriously counted; for even when brute force or guile or influence fail, resort is had to other means. A placard is posted on the streets of Florence with all the names of the parents whose children are sent to Signor Ferretti's Evangelical School, warning the public to avoid such heretics in every relation of life or business. The priests of Salerno establish a week of prayer and implore the Madonna that the devil, in the person of the evangelist from Naples, may not prevail with his evil suggestions over the minds of the people. In Brescia, oratorical monks are brought, and in their violent and excited preachings are allowed to hold up the most sacred relics, in order to give point to their denunciations of Protestantism, and to work on the feelings of their hearers. Or a newspaper is started, still further to honour the Virgin, or, like the Buon Pastore of Naples, to instruct the flock in the wiles of our preachers. Precious instruction it is, judging from the first number, in which, after a moral essay on Matthew vi., we find a dialogue on the Inquisition, showing that the Church can and ought, as a loving mother, to use this instrument against heretics; also the legend of St. Candida, in which is pointed out the church in Naples at whose altar the Apostle Peter first said mass in Italy; and finally, the story of the awful punishment inflicted by God on a student of the University, lately, for having blasphemed against the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin—viz., that he was found dead in his grumble when sixty-two new schools are opened in a year or two in Salerno, when a private gentleman offers facilities at Volterra for the education of 160 uncared-for urchins, and when in the district of Ariana, for example, where, before 1862, there were only twelve schools, with 150 children, there are now fifty-eight schools, with 2,500 children in attendance ;—so well is it known that priestly rule never would have reformed a town as the present Government is doing with Bologna, no fewer than 120 rascals having been put at the bar in a recent celebrated trial, and the statistics of crime during the last three years showing an improvement from the state of matters when that town was under Papal rule, which is probably without a parallel in modern legislation, municipal or Governmental ;—so well is it known that the priests maintain to their shame, but for their profit, the lying superstitions of the country, e. g., the heart of Sister Chiara in a convent at Sienna, used to heal children of every malady: the stripping and beating of St. Michael in Girgenti (the saint who sends rain on the Sicilians) when he permits a season of drought to continue, although plied with prayers and honoured with sumptuous rites ; and the veneration in the same neighbourhood of San Calocero, whose colossal statue is borne on the shoulders of sixteen men, who dance for ten minutes with great animation at his festivity in the heat of summer, and thereafter turn out their sixteen handkerchiefs to remove the perspiration from the forehead of the saint ;—so well are all these things known now, that it is no marvel that the prejudices of the people should be giving way, and the baneful influence of the priests should be rapidly declining.

DECLINE OF PAPAL INFLUENCE.

It is a well-known fact, that the city of Lyons alone has given more to the Peter's Pence during the last three years—namely, two millions of francs—than the whole of Italy, whipped and spurred to generosity by the pulpit and clerical press though the people have been. No sooner is it known that the priests abuse a book than the people run upon it. This is the real explanation of the prodigious sale of Renan's romance of Christ's Life in Italy. It is not that the Italians are greater infidels than their French neighbours, but that the Papal anathema gave the work a fictitious importance, on the principle that if you wish to form a good library, order from your bookseller the works which are to be found catalogued in the "Index Expurgatorius" of Rome.

The other day the statue of Pasquin, in Rome, had the following paper affixed to it:—

1. The Pope is invested with two Powers.
2. The Soldier defends both of them.
3. The Citizen pays for all the three.
4. The Labourer works for all the four.
5. The Priest eats for all the five.
6. The Doctor kills all the six.
7. The Thief robs all the seven.
8. The Confessor absolves all the eight.
9. The Grave-digger buries all the nine.
10. The Devil carries away all the ten to his own place.

A DIFFICULTY IN PALERMO.

The little congregation in Palermo has lately been engaged in an internal struggle in regard to the purity of the Lord's house and the sanctity of the Lord's-day, which presently has led to a division. The Rev. Simpson Kay, late of Sienna, on going to take the pastoral oversight of the church this winter, after receiving ordination in the Valleys, found, to his regret and surprise, that the communion was dispensed indiscriminately to the mixed assembly of Italians, Swiss, Germans, Dutch, French, &c. Many of these parties kept open shop on the Sabbath-day, attended service very irregularly, and were in the habit of promenading and visiting the theatre or other places of public amusement on that holy day. Mr. Kay faithfully remonstrated both in public and private, and refused to administer the ordinance on Easter Sunday to all who had reached the age of twenty-one years, and had been guilty of nothing which deprived them of their civil rights, as had been insisted upon by the committee of management. Mr. Kay has, therefore, opened a more central locale than Palazzo Paterno for the Italian element of the congregation, which sympathised with his views and adhered to him. As all the steps of the controversy were conducted with Christian affection, we trust that the breach will soon be healed and that the pastor's fidelity will win over a large number of the foreign Protestants, whose youthful training and life-long habits in Sicily call for kindly bearing and loving suasion on these vital questions. In addition to this small congregation of twenty Italian Christians, Mr. Kay has a weekly service in the harbour for British and American sailors, and an English service on shore, attended by thirty persons, for the British residents.

EDUCATION IN NAPLES.

In Naples, the Committee in Aid of Italian Evangelization has just published another interesting report. The committee confines itself now almost entirely to the maintenance of Evangelical schools, of which there are twelve in Naples, all admirably conducted and doing great good to their 350 pupils. Of these twelve schools, the committee supports nine. Last year, it raised 700*l.* sterling, a very large portion of which was subscribed on the spot. This is a noteworthy feature. The work, in all departments, is extending in so many directions, that help from home will shortly be wholly insufficient, unless native Christians are trained to the habit of giving of their substance to the Lord's cause, and unless that cause recommends itself to the Christian communities of foreign residents and visitors in the various localities. The same praiseworthy fact comes out, this year, in the reports of the Protestant Hospital in Genoa, and of the Society in Turin for training as first-class artisans the orphans in the Waldensian Valleys. I am happy to say that a friend of the London Evangelical Continental Society has enabled the Claudian press lately to print and circulate among all the Evangelists in Italy several of the convincing tracts of the Rev. John Ross, on the duty and privilege of devoting a portion of one's income, whatever that income may be, to the Redeemer's cause. It is very gratifying to know that wealthy merchants in Naples not only contribute money, but give of their time and strength to the labour of love, leaving their offices on Saturdays to join with their fellow-labourers in preparing the scriptural lessons for the Sabbath-schools, and then on the Sabbath, along with their wives, taking their share in the instruction of the young and quick-witted Neapolitans, whose thirst for education happily at present so great. No other part of Italy so much needs education, and the reliance upon schools, of whatever sort, in which sound instruction is conveyed, reminds us of the earnestness with which our Indian subject-crowd to schools, nothing daunted even by their missionary character, if only all the branches of an English education can be had so as to qualify them for advancement in

A WORD TO BRITISH TOURISTS.

This most unexpected rush on schooling the Naples Committee, most wisely, in the interest of the Gospel, takes advantage of and with its whole strength, thus deserves every commendation and encouragement. We trust their latest effort, the opening of a normal school, will not be the least blessed. The personal labours of the members of the committee, and other Christian foreigners in Naples, was called attention to, as a distinctive ference to the whole subject of the of Christ's kingdom, while the uned sanctuary and ill-spent Sabbath

ANTI-PAPAL ATTACK ON PROTESTANTISM.

In the organ of the Mezzocannone Association a long series of articles has appeared on the work of God in Italy. Latterly the subject of Protestantism came to be treated of. Italy, says the writer, cannot accept Protestantism, because it is illogical; because it is an exotic plant; because it stands fast in the sixteenth century, stationary with Luther and Calvin; because it has destroyed science, art, letters; because it is an asceticism and void of sense; because it condemns love of country; because it has extinguished the fire of heroism; because it has served and come to terms with the Papacy, by continuing a clerical caste, building its churches after a pagan model, and forming Anglicans, Lutherans, Calvinists, &c., but never Christians; because it is not Christianity; and so on ad nauseam.
The same journal printed, the other day, an address of the association to Garibaldi, whom discussing the finances of the country, which are not in a very healthy state, and cannot well be until Venice and Rome are united with their sister States in a compact and permanent kingdom. So urgent is the question of war here, and so expensive the formidable preparations for it, that Italy is deeply grieved to find that Great Britain is resolved on peace. She had hoped to come in for a large profit from any conflict of the Northern Powers, and rages impotent through the press in her bitter disappointment. A great stir has been caused by the repeal in Parliament of the law which protected the priesthood from the levy. The protests of bishops and other dignitaries will produce no effect. Henceforth a due proportion of priests and monks must march as recruits under their country's banner. The Tuscan public has been intensely gratified by the condemnation to the galleys of ten heads of departments in the direction of the State lottery. It is said that a gigantic swindle has been going on for twenty or thirty years, during which time corruption had infected the whole of this iniquitous system, which trafficks in the evil habits of the poor. On good authority, I am assured that this case has opened the eyes of the intelligent public to the demoralising effects of lotteries, but at present it is said that Government could not afford to lose the large revenue annually raised from this source.

THE WALDENSIAN COLLEGE, ETC., ETC.

The annual examinations of the students at the Waldensian College here have closed satisfactorily. Four of the young men have finished their course, and will shortly be ordained to different stations North and South.

A new museum at San Pier d'Arena, near Genoa, has lately been successfully commenced, and schools opened in connexion with it.

A venerable English Christian writes with profound gratitude to God for the blessing vouchsafed on his Evangelistic labours among the citizens of Cagliari, in the island of Sardinia, and craves that a regular evangelist be sent there immediately.

A very large congregation continues to assemble in Bologna in connexion with the ministry of Signor Minetti. Next to Milan, it is the most flourishing mission supported by the Nice Society. More than 100 well-to-do people are in communion with the church.

The Gospel, which has found so many sincere friends in the Valley Intelvi, which lies close to Lake Como, more than fifty persons having espoused the cause at Argegno and San Felice, at either end of the valley, and other smaller villages, has spread into the neighbouring Valley of Camonica, from which cheering intelligence reaches us.

A very devoted and useful labourer has just been lost to the work in the person of Mr. Paul Combe, teacher of the grammar-school at Ponnaret, in the Valleys. Not only was Mr. Combe a popular instructor, but he zealously evangelised in the Valley of Aosta, and so gained the confidence of various Roman Catholic families there, that they confided their sons to his care for their education. It is feared that he has fallen a victim to his very success, as his schoolroom was literally packed with most intelligent lads when last I visited it.

A book is now in the press which is impatiently looked for, as another blow to the Papacy. It is the experiences of convent life on the part of an Italian princess, who was taken about to five of these establishments in the South before she succeeded in effecting her escape. The exposé of the inner life of the nuns is said to be most damaging.

SIGNOR MAZZARELLA.

[The following letter, written in English, has been received since our last publication. We transcribed it to our correspondent, who has appended a few remarks, which will be found below.]

Genoa, July 8, 1864.

In the Evangelical Christendom for the month of July you have published a letter addressed by Mr. de Sanctis to a friend, in which my name is mentioned, and not in a very friendly manner. Allow me to tell you, that it contains important inaccuracies and alterations, which it would take me too long a time to refute at present in your journal. I do not ascribe these statements to any malicious feeling on his part, therefore do not call them falsehoods; but I do ascribe them rather to Mr. de Sanctis's well-known unfortunate tendency to yield to the passionate impulse of the moment, shutting out from him every other thought or influence. That may also be the reason why this dear friend has already so often changed his mind, always with much sincerity and very little calm.

In 1854, when, with considerable éclat, he left the Vaudois, and as late as 1863, I have always been near him to calm down and moderate his passionate resentment against the Vaudois, and especially against my worthy friend and brother Mr. Meille. But the Christian and (I present myself as a reverend friend to whom Mr. de Sanctis addressed the letter you have published, did not, I suppose, feel himself called upon by the Lord, who is now to exercise the same office of peacemaker in intervening with Mr. de Sanctis on our behalf. To make a noise may sometimes be useful in teaers, but surely should neither be re-nor encouraged in Christians.

I do not write pamphlets, neither il of any one—not even of Mr. de in answer to any one; for I have no te a stir or noise. In writing I shall e state of the Church and the Italian on, and it will then be seen that we not by Plymouthism, but by the Christ and the moral and religious ly. ence to the above letter, your respondent regrets that Signor has not rectified or denied any of l statements in Dr. de Sanctis's h are not to be set aside by vague f unfriendliness or uncharitable-also that Signor Mazzarella has n in a few words, gratified the ublic by disavowing all sympathy r Rossetti's book, which bitterly

Evangelical Alliance and every hurch of Christ by name, and has unhappy controversy, which love and fidelity to His truth obliged your correspondent to take notice of, though with feelings of shame and deepest regret.

[We think it only right to add an extract from a letter, which we have received since the above, addressed to the Foreign Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, by Mr. H. Roberts, and dated from near Genoa. Mr. Roberts writes immediately after having seen Signor Mazzarella, and by his desire:]

Signor Mazzarella wishes it should be known that the principles which he fully expressed on two occasions, at the meeting of the Alliance held in Geneva, in 1861, as well as in London in 1862, are those which he still maintains most fully—that he does not sympathise with the publication entitled “The Principles of the Romish, Protestant, and Christian Churches,” attributed to Signor Rossetti, nor does he hold the Plymouthistic views to which have been unjustly attributed his silence with regard to the work in question, that silence having arisen in some measure from a conviction of the undue importance given to it already, and the undesirableness of the minds of recent converts from Popery being agitated with subjects which the great majority of them are incapable, from the want of education, of arriving at a just conclusion.

Signor Mazzarella has been most anxious that the evils which resulted at Turin from the withdrawal of Dr. de Sanctis from the Vaudois Church should not be repeated at Genoa, and he therefore feels most deeply pained at the necessity for self-defence imposed upon him by the inaccuracy of statements published in English.

For the past seven months I have had an opportunity of witnessing something of the self-denying labours of Signor Mazzarella, who, in addition to his public duties as Judge of the Court of Appeals, and labours of a literary character, now devotes every evening in the week to evangelization, as if he were a paid agent.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, July 15, 1864.

IN HOLSTEIN AND ONE OF ITS MORAL RESULTS.

st letter, under date June 15, I ou thus: “Our looks are directed, ch hope, towards the London Com- which, before these lines meet your readers, will emanate either tion of hostilities or a simple a of the armistice.” The more of these alternatives has, unhappily, alised, the resumption of hostilities lace, and it is therefore the force ich is to resolve the exciting ques- pending between Denmark and The capture of the island of Alsen nian troops, has brought about at a change of ministry, and the e between the belligerent powers rectly of peace. God grant that this peace may be promptly re-established in a manner honourable to the weak, and without the abuse of victory by the strong!

One of the moral results of this war, which I deeply deplore, is the bitter disagreement which it has caused between two great nations who are made for mutual understanding, and to promote by their harmony the interests of Christian civilization—I mean England and Germany. What I deplore above all, is that the very Christians of these two countries are come to this, that they can no longer discuss freely and fraternally the religious and moral questions involved in this sad conflict. These regrets, which I have experienced for a very long time, have been aggravated by the report, which I received yesterday, of the deliberations of the Evangelical Alliance at Edinburgh. I admit that the reply made to the letter of the German Branch of the Alliance is as fraternal as it could be in presence of the public opinion which prevails in England upon this subject. But what I do not understand is, that brethren, members of the Evangelical Alliance, have been able to express their regret that the communication of their brethren of Germany had been read at one of the sittings, and had received publicity through the discussions of the assembly. Placing myself in an altogether impartial point of view, and with the little sympathy which I have often expressed in these letters for the war undertaken against Denmark by Herr von Bismark, it seems to me that a letter signed by several of the most eminent Christians of Germany, by men occupying the highest position in the scientific world and in the Church—a letter which carefully avoided every political question, in order to occupy itself only with the religious and moral interests of the Duchies—a letter which had no other aim than to conciliate the minds of the two countries, and to re-establish between brethren the good harmony which for the moment had been interrupted—was fitted to produce quite a different impression. While fully respecting the views and convictions of our brethren of England on the question by which we are occupied, it is none the less certain that facts remain facts. Now the facts contained in the letter of the German Branch of the Alliance are undeniable, and known to all the world. It is a fact, again, that the ministers of religion in all the Protestant provinces of Germany, without exception, have expressed, by means of energetic addresses, their sympathy for their persecuted brethren of Holstein and of Schleswig, and it is well known that the German clergy are eminently imbued with the principle of submission to the authorities, and are quite foes to all revolution. As for the Duchies themselves, as well in Schleswig as in Holstein, it is moreover a fact, that everywhere, from town to town, and from village to village, they have proclaimed, with enthusiasm, their independence of Denmark and their hatred for the Danish Government. While Sonderburg, the capital of the island of Alsens, was still burning, the inhabitants of the city assembled in a body to make the world hear this same proclamation. These are the facts which authorised the public opinion of all Europe to think, from the commencement of the war, that the Danish domination over these Duchies was become a moral impossibility.

In presence of these facts, one may experience either regret or joy, according to the political or religious point of view which he occupies; but it is impossible for men who are independent in their judgment not to take account of them. And it ought to be more impossible yet for Christians, who consider all things here below from the elevated view of the government of God and of His kingdom, to avow that their private political opinions hinder them from recognising collectively these Divine dispensations, and from deriving serious lessons from them. But after all, if they allow themselves to be divided when the question between them is only of the religious and moral results of the events in the history of their respective countries, then, alas! one need no more speak of an Evangelical Alliance. But, thank God, it will not be so. The reply of the English Branch of the Alliance will be to our brethren of Germany, despite of all its reserves, the certain pledge that after the actual crisis of the political world has passed, the disciples of the Saviour on both sides of the ocean will find themselves one at the feet of Him who hath loved them.

MEETING OF A GENERAL PROTESTANT SYNOD AT VIENNA.

The most important ecclesiastical event of the moment, in Germany, is the meeting of the General Synod of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches at Vienna. The fact alone of this official assembly is highly significant in regard to the progress of religious liberty in Austria. While the Protestants of France have been, for more than a century, deprived of their synodal assemblies, and ask for them again of the actual Government in vain; while even in Prussia we are still taking the first very timid steps which are to conduct to this great result, here are the two Protestant confessions of Austria, who see their delegates officially assembled, freely to deliberate upon the interests of their churches. A deputation of the members of the assembly, having at its head its president, Dr. Franz, has been graciously received by the Emperor, and has conveyed to him the expression of the gratitude of the Protestants of the empire for the Patent of 1861, by which their rights and liberties were recognised. The monarch replied: "I rejoice extremely to see the General Synods assembled at Vienna, and it is my earnest desire to see the Protestants of the empire in full possession of their rights and liberties." The deputation was no less well received by the Minister for Worship. A fact equally significant is, that on May 23, the Synodal Assembly attended in a body at a grand religious solemnity celebrated at Vienna, to commemorate the tercentenary anniversary of the death of Calvin. The principal labours of the Synod naturally have for their object the bringing into practical operation the provisions of the Imperial Patent, which has assured them of their rights, and which hitherto, it must be said, has scarcely existed except on paper—thanks to the obstinate opposition of the Catholic clergy. The Synod was divided into sections or particular committees to regulate the relations of the Protestant churches with the Government, with the Catholic Church, and with regard to its internal administration, &c. I have only wished to-day to announce to your readers the cheering fact of this Synodal Assembly, reserving to myself the privilege of returning to the subject, to set forth the results when they are known.

THE NEW ECCLESIASTICAL CONSTITUTION IN HANOVER.

Hanover supplies us with another example of the incessant progress which the ecclesiastical movement makes towards the realisation of the presbyterial and synodal principle, which gives the people a large part in the government of the Church, hitherto entirely administered by the State. The Hanover Chamber of Deputies has sanctioned the new ecclesiastical constitution, elaborated by a constituent synod, after the violent agitations with which I have sometimes occupied your readers. Here, then, once more, is a German State wherein has been accomplished that ecclesiastical revolution to which the Grand Duchy of Baden opened the way, and which is now equally in course of preparation in Hesse, in Saxony, in Prussia, and elsewhere. I am far from considering these popular constitutions as the normal and definitive state of the Christian Church, but as a transition they are certainly worth more than the servitude which existed beforehand, and in all cases they have powerfully contributed to the progress of religious liberty.

A CHURCH-BUILDING SOCIETY FOUNDED AT BERLIN.

There has just been formed at Berlin a society, which has for its object the building of churches in that great capital of Prussia. There is not, perhaps, a Christian city in the world, and certainly not a Protestant city, where the disproportion between the population and the means of edification is so deplorable as at Berlin. There are reckoned to be in that capital several parishes of 30,000, 40,000, and even 50,000 souls, which have but one single church, and one sole pastor. It is intelligible that in such a state of things, not only the preaching of the Gospel, but all the functions of the pastorate, have become purely impossible. What a revelation have we here of the religious indifference of a people, and of the deplorable results of the National principle, which can in this way leave immense masses of the population deprived of all the means of religious instruction and edification! The National system has habituated the people only to look to the Government for everything which concerns the needs of the churches; and hence indifference and death. It is therefore joyfully that we hail the formation of the Berlin society, which counts at its head men known for their piety, talent, and influence. Besides the immediate and so necessary results which it will obtain, it will create, by the very fact of its existence, in the population of the capital of Prussia, that power which has wrought such great things in the churches of England, Scotland, and America—the power to which you have given the name of “the Voluntary Principle.”

MATAMOROS AT FRANKFORT.

Some Christian friends of our city have lately had the lively pleasure of making the personal acquaintance of a man whom Spanish fanaticism has rendered famous—Mr. Matamoros. He was passing through Germany, on his way to Holland, whither he was invited by his excellent friend Dr. Capadose, to whom he thus returned the visit which the latter had made him in his prison at Granada. It was with profound edification and the most sympathetic interest that we found in our interviews with Mr. Matamoros everything we were led to expect by his long sufferings endured for the name of Jesus—a living faith, the chivalrous energy of the Spanish character, an ardent soul, which expressed in words of fire and decided gestures only his Christian conviction. Mr. Matamoros is now at Lausanne, where he is pursuing a course of study in divinity at the theological seminary of the Free Church. But he is not the only Spaniard who is thus engaged. There are no less than twelve young men, among whom are two brothers of Mr. Matamoros, who are preparing by study to carry the light into the darkness of unhappy Spain, when the moment for it arrives. In expectation of this moment, a whole mass of Spaniards, disseminated in different cities of the South of France and of Algeria, are already profiting, and will profit yet more, by the Gospel light which has begun to shine on Spain. With this end, a seminary has been founded at Bayonne, under the direction of a French pastor, and in which are received young Spaniards whose hearts have been gained to Jesus Christ. This effort is superintended by a committee, which sits at Paris, and which is composed of men whose name alone is a guarantee for good administration. I regret to be forced to add, that the pecuniary means necessary for the development of this Christian work are almost wholly wanting; no doubt because prudence has hitherto prevented the committee from giving to the work the publicity proper to make it known. But it is evident that it is sufficient to indicate it to those who have at heart the progress of the Gospel in Spain, to make them regard it as a precious privilege to contribute to it by their donations. The prosecution from which Mr. Matamoros and his friends have had to suffer has not dispersed the little bands of converted Spaniards which are found in the principal towns of the country, and when the hour of liberty strikes, who can say what these twelve young men, animated with the spirit and the energy of Mr. Matamoros, may be able to do, by the grace of God, towards causing the light of the Gospel to shine upon Spain?

TURKEY.

Constantinople, June 28, 1864.

During the past three months events of unusual interest have transpired in Constantinople, and I regret that they must all be brought within the limits of a single letter.

EXTRAORDINARY MOVEMENT AMONG THE GREEKS.

Missionary operations among the Greeks have been so unsuccessful, both in Greece and in Turkey, that they have been very generally abandoned. There is, I believe, only one Greek Evangelical church in existence, and that is a small church in the town of Demirdesh, near Broosa.

There are a few truly Christian men among the Greeks, who labour and pray for the conversion of their nation—men like Dr. Kalapothakes, the editor of the Star, in Athens—but these men are scattered, and exert little influence. The Greeks in Constantinople are, with honourable exceptions, more corrupt and hopeless than those in Greece, and the Church is much more decidedly unevangelical, more opposed to the reading and circulation of the Scriptures. But some weeks since, as Mr. Williams (Selim Effendi), the converted Turk, was pursuing his labours among his own people, his positions were openly disputed by a learned Jew. The Greeks who were present took sides with Mr. Williams, and it is said were inclined to support his arguments by material ones of their own.

The Jew, satisfied with his first success, appeared the next Sabbath at Mr. Williams's rooms with his friends. The Greeks came too, in large numbers, to join in the controversy.

On a succeeding day the crowd became so great, that the buildings seemed likely to break down, and Mr. Williams was induced by friendly Turks to escape secretly to another place. He was followed by an immense crowd of Greeks, Armenians, Jews, and Turks, but finally escaped to a private room, where he preached to the few who succeeded in following him.

At this juncture, the Greeks and Jews both resorted to the rooms of the Church Missionary Society, which they filled to overflowing. Both sides were then allowed to discuss the merits of Judaism and Christianity in the presence of an assistant missionary, Mr. O'Flaherty. The Jews were soon disgusted, and ceased to come, but a new interest in Christianity seemed to be awakened among the Greeks, who have continued to come up to this time, not only on the Sabbath, but on almost every day in the week. This interest in spiritual Christianity may not prove to be permanent among the Greeks, but it is a most hopeful sign among a people whom we had come to consider as almost hopelessly hardened.

PROTESTANTISM IN GREECE.

Count Sponnenck, the confidential adviser of the young King, has undoubtedly inflicted an injury on Protestantism in Greece which many years cannot repair. Himself a wordly and, it is alleged, an immoral man, he has led the King to adopt the Greek faith in form, while it is evident to all that he does it not from a conviction of right, but from motives purely political. As a Protestant, the King would have been respected by all, but as it is, he is regarded as a man who has no religious principles whatever. Very fortunately, the people have cast the blame where it belongs and added to the long catalogue of errors which they charge upon Count Sponnenck.

doubtedly the most unpopular man

The people are clamorous now for him, and demand that he be replaced by an English statesman who can give sense to their King, and help them on to constitutional liberty, as well as give them an example of genuine Protestantism. In spite of the bad example of their King, and the open immorality of his minister, Evangelical principles are slowly gaining ground among the people. Such is the testimony of Dr. Thomas, a British and Foreign Bible Society, and of Dr. King, the well-known missionary, and the pious Greeks in Constantinople. It gains slowly, sometimes almost imperceptibly; but still it is undeniable that there is more read and better understood of the Bible here than under the rule of the Ottoman.

THE CIRCASSIAN EXODUS.

Circassian immigration has once more increased. Three years ago we were overwhelmed by a horde of Tartars and a portion of the Crimean Tatars—forced from their homes by the Russians—the former on account of which they rendered to the Allies in the Crimean war. They filled Constantinople, and with them fever and disease of Thousands died here, and the rest were sent off into the interior, where for a long time they lived by plunder, and then began to be driven off by scores and hundreds. In Turkey, at least four-fifths of them have disappeared.

After the final defeat of the last tribe of Circassians, capable of self-defence, on the 15th of last, probably 300,000 more of these starving victims of Russian arms sought refuge in Turkey, and are now coming. All the horrors of this war can never be told. The Turkish coast of the Black Sea are all overrun with these dying thousands. It is reported that there are 70,000 about the little town of Samsoon, which, by its location, is one of the most sickly places on the coast. About 400 a-day are dying of fever and smallpox, and the rest are starving to death. Turkey is doing nothing to provide for them, but her means are so poor, her officers generally either ignorant or dishonest, and the immigration so great and so large, as to be overwhelming.

A large Turkish frigate passed the other day with 3,000 of these refugees on board, of whom over 400 had died of typhus fever or the smallpox.

The corpses of their dead lie unburied and rotting about their encampments, while they seem to have no power to aid themselves.

If the truth be told, they are undoubtedly the most undesirable immigrants that Turkey could possibly receive, and the Turks are not unaware of this fact. They are robbers and murderers by nature and profession. They sell their children for slaves, without hesitation. Of their religion but little is known, beyond the fact that it is an error to suppose that they are Mohammedans. They are inconceivably filthy and lazy, and the sole claim which they have to the sympathy of the world rests upon the obstinate resistance which they have made to the ambitious designs of Russia. They were a living and insurmountable barrier to Russian aggression upon Asiatic Turkey, and as such should have been aided by those who are interested in preserving the integrity of the Turkish Empire.

THE DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITY.

The dark cloud of war which seemed to be gathering on our north-eastern frontier has happily passed away for the present. Prince Couza has undoubtedly violated the constitution formed for him by the Great Powers. His real object, however, in secularising the property of the monasteries, and in emancipating the serfs, cannot be positively known; but it is certain that although the manner in which these things were done was unconstitutional, the acts themselves are absolutely essential to the prosperity of the country. The monasteries in the Principalities held a large part of the real estate in the country, and their revenues were all expended in Constantinople and Palestine. They were thus a constant and terrible drain upon the resources of Prince Couza's kingdom. Was it strange that he should seek to relieve his people of this burden? The other act, of freeing the serfs, was equally desirable, and but for its supposed political bearing would have been admired by all the world. But both these things were done à la Napoleon, and it was believed that they foreboded rebellion against the Sultan. Perhaps they did, but more probably they did not. To prove that they did not, Prince Couza determined to pay his homage in person to the Sultan. He has come and gone. His visit here was an enigma to every one. He was, technically, a rebellious subject, but he was received with the same honours which would have been conferred upon Napoleon himself. Everywhere he was greeted with the royal salute of twenty-one guns. An imperial palace was furnished for his residence, in place of the guest palaces occupied by previous guests of the royal families of Europe. In short, he was treated like an independent sovereign, except by the English, Russian, and Austrian Ambassadors. The changes he has made were not formally sanctioned, but were admitted in principle; so that, practically, they will be arranged according to his desire.

MOVEMENTS AMONG THE MOHAMMEDANS.

For several months it has been currently reported among all the nationalities in Constantinople that 40,000 Mohammedans had become Protestants, and had petitioned the Government to be set off as a separate community, and provided with the Mosque Sultan Baiyazid to worship in. This rumour has caused much excitement, and many Turks have visited the missionaries to inquire about Protestantism and about this strange report. We have sought in all directions to discover the origin or foundation of it. It is certainly untrue in its current form; but it is said that a number of Mohammedans—perhaps several thousand—have petitioned the Porte for a reformation in the Mohammedan faith. It is understood that they wish to go back to the simplicity of the Koran, which is now practically forgotten by Mohammedans and displaced by innumerable traditions, the absurd nature of which is well shown in a little book written by Rev. Dr. Pfander, and published by the Church Missionary Society. It is said by some that Fuad Pasha, the Grand Vizier, is himself secretly at the head of this movement. But others among the Turks say that the whole affair is only a conspiracy to overthrow the Grand Vizier, by associating his name with an unpopular scheme. It is my impression that the movement itself is genuine, but not extensive, and not countenanced by Fuad Pasha or any other Turkish statesman, for, so far as it is successful it must cause dissension and schism among the Mohammedans—perhaps even bloodshed—and such dissensions would be certain to overthrow this Government.

One of the Turkish converts baptized, named Ismail, was attacked, a few weeks ago, by a Mohammedan, and barely escaped with his life. This man's rage was first aroused by his discovering a Bible in the house of a friend of Ismail, where they chanced to meet. He spit upon it and threw it upon the floor. Ismail boldly professed his belief in the Bible and in Christ. He was then attacked with a knife and stabbed in several places. The police, however, soon interfered, and man was brought before a Turkish court sentenced to three years' imprisonment attempt to murder. Ismail begged that might not be punished, and the judge reduced the sentence to one year, and finally a heavy fine in money, which he forced Ismail to take, to pay the expenses of illness. This was a remarkable decision of a Turkish judge to make, in view of all the circumstances, and the conduct of Ismail was worthy of all praise.

PROTESTANT CIVIL COMMUNITY.

Through the liberality of a Protestant Armenian merchant here, the Protestant community has been enabled to resume regular business for a time, in the expectation that, ere it expires, a new constitution will be adopted and the present head of the community replaced by another. To accomplish this, however, the debt of the community must be paid—amounting to about 500,000 sterling—and this amount will have to be raised outside of the community itself—England and America. It is agreed by those who understand the constitution of the Turkish Empire that this civil community is essential to the existence of Protestantism here, and it is to be hoped that this sum of money will not be wanting, if the community succeed in arranging their part of the work satisfactorily. They now understand that they cannot expect any aid whatever, and they have actually accomplished these necessary changes, and they will probably complete them within a few months.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE AMERICAN MISSIONS.

The mission of the American Board in Western Turkey has just held its annual session in this city. The reports of the missionaries from the interior were generally more favourable and hopeful than for several years past.

One of the most interesting and important questions discussed was the necessity for encouraging the churches to settle native pastors, and encouraging these pastors to form some bond of union among themselves—presbyteries, associations, or something like these. Several such associations have already been formed, and are likely to come into successful operation this year.

It is the policy of the American Mission to interfere as little as possible with the internal management of these native churches, and consequently, it is in the highest degree portant that they should unite among themselves to secure cordial co-operation and sympathy. Until within a few years there have been so few native pastors, that such associations among them have been impracticable; but now that so many of the churches have been persuaded to have pastors of their own, they themselves see and feel the necessity of working together and moulding their own institutions. The one great lesson which these churches require to make them strong and permanent is the lesson of self-government and self-support. When this is learned, the missionaries can turn to other fields of labour. It will require time and constant pressure to bring them up to this point, but unless rival societies are tempted to interfere with promises of large supplies of money, it will not be long before some portions at least of the Armenian field will reach this point of absolute independence of foreign aid.

VISIT OF THE BISHOP OF GIBRALTAR.

We have lately been favoured with a long visit from the new Lord Bishop of Gibraltar, who has personally made a very favourable impression upon the British colony here. But some of his official acts have given pain to all Evangelical Churchmen. One of his first visits in Constantinople was to the Patriarchs of the Greek and Armenian Churches. It was certainly humiliating to see an English Protestant bishop standing hat in hand before the primates of the corrupt churches of the East, whose personal character is as unworthy of his homage as their doctrines are different from those of the Church of England. They received his visit, but they did not deign to return it. We cannot but believe that these things resulted from a misapprehension of the real relations of these churches to the true faith, and we cannot but hope that his next visit to the East will be under different auspices. His public services in the Chapel of the Embassy were all well attended, and left the impression upon all that he was himself worthy of the office which he holds spiritually as well as intellectually. Among the large number confirmed during his visit were a number of native converts, including several converts from Mohammedanism. Aside from the unfortunate circumstances above mentioned, we believe that his visit has been universally regarded as a blessing to the resident British community, and especially to the numerous English clergymen resident here as chaplains, missionaries, &c.

INDIA.

THE PROSPECTS OF CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA.

I gladly avail myself of your permission to put upon record in your columns my impressions, after nine years' residence in different parts of India, of the prospects of Christianity in that land. I am quite aware that many people in this country are disappointed, almost in despair, at the slow progress that we appear to be making in India. And this feeling is intensified by hearing how rapidly the Society of Reformed Hindus called the Brahmo Somaj has extended, not only in Bengal proper, but in the North-Western provinces, the Punjab, and Bombay. Yet I think that a right understanding of the facts of the case may serve not only to remove that feeling of disappointment, but to quicken the faith, and stir up the prayerfulness of the people of God in Great Britain. And I gladly, therefore, accept your permission to say what I myself have observed, and what my belief for the future is.

The Brahmo Somaj was formed a few years ago by the educated Hindus of Calcutta and its neighbourhood, when the facts of science with which they became acquainted, showed them the absurdity of many of the dogmas of their religion. When, for instance, men can prove to their own complete satisfaction that the earth is a sphere, they must give up belief in the Hindu dogma, that it is a flat plain supported on the heads of gigantic elephants; and when education has opened their eyes, they perceive how ludicrous it is for men to worship deities of lower intellectual attainments, and with a more debased moral character than their own. The founders of this society, therefore, asserted that the multiplication of deities, and of avatars or incarnations, was a mere modern invention, intended to satisfy the vulgar herd, but not needed for men of education, and they announced as the object of their worship and faith one only God, the creator and preserver of all nature. Professing to look with horror on the Christian idea of an atonement, and to regard as manifest injustice the acceptance of a victim offered to bear the punishment of man's guilt, they consider their own god as occupying a much higher moral position than the God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Now in joining a society of this kind, a Hindu has no troubles to contend with. He has no opposition either from the devil, or the world, or the flesh. Satan is quite satisfied so long as a man exchanges only one form of error for another, especially when the newly-adopted one is fitted to satisfy his fallen nature—so he has no opposition from the Devil. There is no loss of caste, no loss of social position—an elevation rather than otherwise in intellectual standing and a greater fitness for intercourse with European gentlemen—so there is no opposition from the world. And though great professions are made of the high moral character of the society, the lives of the individual members in many cases are not in accordance with them. It is acknowledged by those among themselves who are really striving after a knowledge of the truth, that a large proportion of the members are living notoriously immoral lives, in every respect. Thus a Hindu joining the society has no opposition from the flesh. It is not necessary to show how directly opposed is all this to the experience of a man embracing Christianity, how Satan by all means tries to keep him from committing his all to the Lord Jesus, how he is opposed by the world in the loss of caste, the isolation from his nearest relatives, separation in many cases from his wife, and the contempt poured on him by his former companions, how sorely he is vexed and tried by the conflict between his new spiritual nature and the lusts and desires of the flesh, to which beforehand he had given full indulgence. It need not be wondered at, that while many join the Brahmo Somaj, few enroll themselves under the banner of the Cross.

But there are signs of better times approaching to be seen even now. Till within the last few months the Brahmo Somaj had boasted that none but half-educated boys had been converted to Christianity. They are unable to say so now, for in the beginning of this year a Hindu gentleman was baptized, who had taken the highest honours at the Calcutta University, having carried off the gold medal of 1862. But the most encouraging signs, as it appears to me, are the difficulties which are besetting themselves as to the nature and attributes of the Deity. For whereas a year or so ago their chief conception of Him was as a God too merciful to punish, they have of late come to regard Him as a God too just to forgive. Now there can be no doubt that among them there are many eagerly and sincerely searching for the truth—"seeking the Lord if haply they may find after Him;" and it seems to me that when such men try to reconcile these two ideas of God, they will be shut up to the reception of one Mediator between God and men, whom God can be just, and yet the justifier of sinners. Their great difficulty will be the throwing off of the bonds of caste, which still retains its hold, even over these enlightened and educated men. But the system of caste, to quote an expression which I lately heard used by the Bishop of Calcutta, "honeycombed" from side to side.* Education, intercourse with Europeans, the extension of trade and commercial dealings with Europe, and not least, the spread of railway have brought caste to a tottering condition. Hindus themselves confess that it is so, the old orthodox believers with shame and sorrow, the younger ones with exultation. One great united endeavour, and it will fall, and great will be the fall of it. My own impression is that there are even now many who intellectually are believers in Jesus, that many more, earnest seekers after truth, will be shut up to the reception of Him as the only way of acceptance with God, and that if we had but a great outpouring of God's Holy Spirit on Bengal, we might and should behold there the glorious spectacle of a nation born to God in a day. Who can tell where it would stop? The head-quarters of the Brahmo Somaj are in Calcutta, but as I have said, there are many members in Bombay, in the North-West Provinces, and in the Punjab, and in all these places we might expect great things. It would almost seem, too, as if their outward organization were, under the guidance of God's Providence, being so arranged, as to need little alteration when the great event which I anticipate shall take place. They have consecrated one of their leaders, Kisob Sen, as a sort of bishop or pastor, they have formed a council, to whose decision matters affecting the society are referred. Their meetings for worship are conducted very a Christian prayer-meeting, with delivered by some of the leaders, and in their marriage ceremony lately adopted Christian customs, being to some extent public, the being given away by her father, the and bride joining hands and ex-mutual vows, and the whole proceeding sanctified by prayer.

* Mahiputram Rooparam, the Bombay Brahmin, brought an action for libel against some of his fellows who on his return from England addressed him as a patil—i. e., a sinful man. He has failed in the action, which is chiefly remarkable for the opinions expressed by the native magistrate, himself a Hindu, who tried the case. In the observations he made this officer stated, that the step Mahiputram took was certain to create persecution. "He should have been prepared for it, and should not have submitted to the disgusting ceremonies which he performed. His enlightened mind must have been shocked at the performance of the ceremonies he underwent. He should have declined to perform these ceremonies on the broad ground that his visit to Europe was not inconsistent with the Vedic religion. If his caste fellows did not re-admit him into the caste, he should not have cared a straw for it." Surely the schoolmaster is abroad.—Friend of India, April 28, 1864.

tion of marriage leads me to remark, as I have said, there seems a great ground for the hope that, when in place, the women will be to some extent sharing the blessing. Besides to be expected from the labours of those who are following in the footsteps of Mrs. Mullens,* visiting zenanas giving instruction, secular and religious ladies; the members of the Somaj are taking active steps in the female education. In their annual report 1863 they have invited women to the worship and love of the one following up this, some members of residing at Burdwan, about seventy Calcutta, have inaugurated a most scheme for female education. It is that the Central Council at Calcutta are a course of study for women, to five years; that each member of shall bind himself in his own house his wives, sisters, and daughters, nine them annually, assigning marks in each branch of learning, without partiality, and sending in his report to the Central Council, by whom prizes are to be awarded. Now it is quite possible, and highly probable, that this scheme, got up by enthusiastic young men, will fall through. But the question of female education, by giving hold of the native mind, and we may expect that some better-devised and extensive scheme will be carried out. There is a desire for female education is also from other facts. A considerable number of schools for girls have been opened up by the Hindus. In one case, the wife of a sub-assistant-surgeon, who, according to the tenets of the Brahmo Somaj, sold her jewels, to the value of two hundred rupees (200*l.*), for the purpose of founding a school for women and girls. And in Calcutta, where, under the enlightened rule of the present Lieut.-Governor, Sir Robert

Montgomery, the education of men has made rapid progress, that of the women has not been neglected.† It is not easy to estimate the number of women who are now able to read or are under instruction. In many, probably the majority of the Hindu families in Calcutta and its immediate neighbourhood, there are one or two ladies who can read. It is certain that among the young men and boys attending mission and Government schools there are many who impart to the females of their families the instruction they have received. But the idea of woman's inferiority, and of the necessity for keeping her in her own place, prevents men from confessing to each other what they are doing at home. I remember a missionary in Lucknow asking some of the young men who attended the mission school whether they taught their wives at home. They laughed, and one of them answered, "If we did, Sir, we wouldn't tell you before each other." This very man, it was known, was regularly teaching at home to his wife what he had learned at school. And there is no doubt that this is not a solitary instance. It is true that in the meantime the reading of women (except where a purer literature has been introduced by Christian lady visitors) is confined to works of by no means an elevating or improving character. But they are acquiring the faculty of reading, and with it to a certain extent the faculty of thinking, and when the day comes, which I fully anticipate, of an extensive turning to God of Hindu men, the women will be in a position to read and to think on the truths that their husbands will then present to them. Even now those members of the Brahmo Somaj who are educating their wives, that they may have some intellectual enjoyments at home, and who are perplexed with their difficulties about God, may in some cases speak to their wives on the subject, and may thus prepare them for partaking of the nation's blessing.

There seems to me, when I consider all the difficulties in the way of Christianity, the mountains of ignorance, prejudice, superstition, and hatred, that have to be removed; and when I look at all that has been done, the great preparatory work now going on, the good hope there is of more rapid progress hereafter—that we may well thank God and take courage. I have tried to show how in the higher and more educated classes much is now being effected. I might show how among the lower classes, God bringing good out of evil, has sent to our mission orphanages numbers of boys and girls left fatherless by the mutiny of 1857 and the famine of 1859. I might speak of the great benefits flowing from the labours of medical missionaries, the results that have already followed the work of Dr. Patterson in Madras, Dr. Robson in Calcutta, and Dr. Valentine in Rajputana. But I hope I have said enough to make British Christians feel that the Lord hath done great things for us, and to make them glad thereof; to make them feel, too, that He designs to do far more, and to do it more extensively; and to make them feel that the encouragements He has already given demand greatly-increased exertions on our parts.

We need a greatly-increased missionary staff—especially we need men of high talent, deep earnestness, burning zeal, strong faith, and earnest prayer, to follow up the work of Dr. Duff among educated Hindus both in Calcutta and other stations. We need a great increase of Christian women to labour in zenanas and to manage girls' schools. We need a great effort to be now made, that the augmented aid which the Government India is giving to secular education may not be taken advantage of for the spread of Christianity. For all these we need enormous enlarged subscriptions to our missionary societies and schemes, and to obtain these we need extended information as to the present, and future of Christianity in India.

Above all, we need much earnest intercessory prayer for the outpouring of God's Holy Spirit. I would earnestly intreat British Christians, in their public meetings, in their families, in their closets, to pour out their supplications before the Throne of Grace, that British India may be greatly favoured by an effusion of God's Spirit, and that in this country more men may be raised up to go forth as preachers of the Gospel. For I am persuaded that a time of great blessing for that country is at hand, and I sincerely desire that Britain should have her full share in being instrumental in this work.

MISSION WORK AMONG THE MATEBELE.

We inserted a letter from the writer of the following, the Rev. J. S. Moffat, in our number for July, 1863 (p. 332). In the communication now given, he resumes the narrative of the pioneer mission work in which he and his companions are still engaged, and is happily able to afford information of the removal of obstacles to their progress which, at the date of his previous letter, appeared to be insurmountable, though others still remain. Some particulars stated by Mr. Moffat have been given by us, in a fragmentary form, in the interval between his two communications, but our readers will doubtless be glad to have the whole of the facts from this distant outpost in one connected and authentic narrative:—

Inyati, Matebele Country, South Africa,
December, 1863.

PREVIOUS DISCOURAGEMENTS.

We of the Matebele mission have not a brilliant tale to tell; still the writer hopes that by lifting up his voice he may bring together some friends at the mercy seat, whose strong supplications, united to ours, may prevail to the pouring out of the Spirit from on high in this dark corner of the world. That is what we stand most in need of, and the request made for it here is not the mere use of a conventional figure of speech, but a grave request, such as might be made for money or anything else. When the writer left for Kuruman, last May twelvemonth, some circumstances had given the mission a discouraging aspect. An application made by Mr. Moffat, of Kuruman, through the missionaries on the spot, for another brother to join us, was peremptorily refused. In spite of our having been of great service to the people in saving thousands of their cattle from lung-sickness, we were not generally looked upon with favour. There were evidently two parties in the country, one of which was disposed to drive us away. On my return, however, after an enforced absence of sixteen months, things were in a very different state. Messrs. Sykes and Thomas were both much encouraged, and the sense of improvement has grown upon myself since my return. I was accompanied by the Rev. John Mackenzie, of the London Missionary Society, who, after a little demur, was admitted to the country. It is not wonderful that there should have been some hesitation in his case, for he had spent the previous twelve months at the Bamangwato, upon whom the Matebele made a cattle foray during the present year.

IMPROVED STATE OF FEELING IN CHIEF AND PEOPLE.

The general feeling is everywhere more favourable. Mosilikatse has expressed his wish that his people should attend the religious services of the missionaries, but prohibits systematic instruction. He little knows what he is granting. Only give us liberty to preach the Gospel to every creature, and we can afford to wait for the rest. About a fortnight ago, Mr. Mackenzie, accompanied by one of the brethren, went to apply to the chief for another station. To the great surprise of us quest was immediately granted, and my companion was requested to spot in the whole country he might suitably. During the Sunday spent there, a service was held in the chief's yard, and he listened with close attention to the words of eternal life, following them with very favourable remarks of his own. It appears to be no obstacle to our visiting the village and hamlet in this wide country to the glad tidings of salvation. Formerly the people were very much restricted by the the people and their fear of offending now, I doubt whether there is a village people would not hail the advent and of a missionary. When we consider the circumstances of the mission four we feel the change to have been very enough to encourage us to redouble

The manner in which we used to be and fettered by the abject prostration, from the highest to the lowest, was singular. One very pleasing feature is evident in the position of the chief's used to be treated with great dislike were afraid to approach us, so that intercourse with them, and more especially with the eldest, was most limited. Now, they come about us with the freedom, and their position is in all improved.

TO THE WORK—IMMORALITY AND THE WAR SPIRIT.

become better acquainted with the land, with the manners of the people, we are fully conscious of their awful depravity. It can be expected in a country where the of marriage is theoretically opposed to government? There are marriages—the law of nature is rapidly breaking away of man; but still there are large numbers living much as great numbers of soldiers do in garrison, and the moral can be imagined. I have said that marvellous in this country. Of course this applies only to the mass of the people. The class practise polygamy, more or less. It becomes an obstacle to the Gospel, but has done generally in South Africa. It is a worker, and contributes not only to the maintenance of the polygamist, but to his and wealth. The incompatibility of the law with polygamy forms Mosilikatse's objection to the "writings," whenever spoken of in his presence.

One of our obstacles is the war spirit. To be entirely given up to predatory warfare, and the precepts of the Gospel are anything but feasible. It is difficult to see how this can be disposed of, except by the direct action of Providence. As long as the Matebele continue to prosper as they have done in their destructive policy, we can hardly hope to see them submitting themselves to the Prince of Peace. One sad instance of the oppressions to which tens of thousands of unfortunate tributaries are subjected in this country occurred during the past year. A tribe of Bechuanaas, under their chief, Mahukwe, tributary to Mosilikatse, dwelt on the extreme south-west of his country. They were traditionally connected with the Bamangwato, the first large and independent tribe in that direction from Mosilikatse's country. A brother of Mahukwe's, resident among the Bamangwato, gave offence to the chief, Sekhomi, and absconded to the Matebele. His first step on arriving in this country was to represent to Mosilikatse that the Bamangwato cattle were pasturing at outposts on the Motloutse River, not more than three days from the outskirts of the Matebele. This was too much for the constancy of the chief, who immediately sent an expedition, to be guided by the traitor and his brother, Mahukwe. These two poor infatuated wretches refused to serve, and the expedition proceeded on its way alone, ultimately capturing a large part of the cattle, besides putting to the rout the Bamangwato near to their own mountains. Meanwhile a report had been sent to Mosilikatse of the conduct of Mahukwe and his brother. The fiat immediately went forth, and a number of Matjaha started to carry it out. All the men of the Bechuana town were first enticed out to a conference, and cruelly slain. The town then became the scene of pillage, and for two or three days every unhappy fugitive who could be found amongst the woods and hills was hunted out with savage joy. The women and children were carried captive, and the miserable remnant who gathered together after the departure of their enemies have since fled to the south-east.

Mournful were the feelings with which, on my return from Kuruman some months afterwards, I passed through the locality. I wandered with sad heart among the lovely hills, and found the long grass already beginning to wave over scenes so lately resonant with life. The blackened ruins still stood hideous in the sunshine, and the beauty of nature only served to render more gloomy the aspect of man and his works. The words of Holy Writ had here a more than usually solemn commentary, "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty."

APPEAL FOR PRAYER.

One of the brethren, the Rev. T. Thomas, is at present on a visit to the Cape Colony with his two motherless children. Mrs. Thomas died in June, 1862. She has gone to her reward, after a short but somewhat severe allotment of missionary labour, which she accomplished with admirable patience. Permit me to leave your readers with the request once more, but not too often made, Remember us at the mercy seat.

AMERICA.

New York, July 11, 1864.

MAPS OF MISSION CHURCHES—THE METHODIST AND THE PRESBYTERIAN BOARDS.

My letter alluded to a question which has attracted much attention in some of our churches, and which must grow in interest and importance for years to come. It concerns the ecclesiastical relations which ought to exist between mission churches in heathen lands and the home churches by which the missions are sustained. Those denominations which favour Congregationalism or Independency have had little difficulty in deciding such a question, for they, of course, concede to the mission churches that right which they claim for all churches—namely, of governing themselves. On the other hand, High Churchmen, in whatever denomination, promptly decide the question the other way, and pronounce the government of the mission churches to be not only the prerogative, but the sacred duty of the general church out of which they have grown, and to which they belong. The Presbyterian churches in America have very strongly inclined to this latter opinion. In the beginning of American missions, indeed, the question did not come up. But as soon as there were mission churches to be organized, it was impossible to be indifferent to the form and the relations which they were to assume. Out of this new concern, in large measure, grew the withdrawal of Presbyterian denominations from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. This great society began under the auspices of New England Congregationalism. Yet since it sprang into immediate and distinguished success, and since it incorporated no denominational features into its scheme of operations, the Presbyterian churches for many years furnished a large proportion of its corporate members, and made it the chief channel of their missionary gifts. Still, the Congregational element always predominated in the Board; and although it carefully abstained from every unfair attempt to impress its own features upon the mission churches, yet no one could think that a board thus constituted would ever become an earnest propagator of the Presbyterian polity. Hence, in part, resulted the organization of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, in 1837. This, as your readers may remember, was the date of the painful disruption of the American Presbyterian Church. It was that portion of the divided Church which has since been known as the Old School General Assembly, that immediately, upon the disruption, proceeded to establish this round of foreign missions. The churches of the other assembly continue, to this time, to co-operate with the American Board.

The example of the Old School Assembly was at length followed by the Reformed Dutch Church. This body, as its name indicates, is an offshoot of the Reformed Church of Holland, thrown out in the better and more vigorous days of the present stock. In everything but its name it is thoroughly Presbyterian. This church also had, for many years, co-operated with the American Board; but in 1857, by the action of Synod, it committed its whole work of foreign missions to a board of its own.

MISSIONS OF THE REFORMED DUTCH CHURCH—PRESBYTERIAN POLICY.

Coincident with these acts of withdrawal from the American Board was the avowal by both of these denominations of a policy by which the churches gathered by their missionaries should be formed into presbyteries (or classis, as they are called in the Dutch Church), and should become integral parts of the fostering churches in America.

According to this policy, the Old School General Assembly already has even a Synod of three presbyteries in India, and separate presbyteries in Siam, and China, and Africa. The Reformed Dutch Church, before its separation from the American Board, had a classis in India, and at the time of that separation it ordered that another classis should be formed at Amoy. Even the New School churches, which continue their connexion with the American Board, have been retained in that relation only by a recent express stipulation that the missionaries which they may sustain shall in no way be impeded in their attempt to form presbyteries out of the churches which they may gather.

The care which is thus manifested by these several denominations to extend that form of church government which they believe to be scriptural and beneficent, pre-eminently becomes them. But it is evident, that just as far as each church shall require its mission churches not only to adopt its form of government, but to become organic parts of itself, so far it forbids them to coalesce into the kindred churches which may spring up beside them on heathen soil, and requires all the smaller denominational differences of Christendom to be extended and perpetuated throughout the world over. Whether, indeed, such an organic relation of parts so dissimilar and so widely separated can be maintained at all, is a grave question, and one which will not approach its solution until the native element which forms the smallest fraction of the existing presbyteries, shall be largely increased, and the vexatious questions of legislation and discipline which are sure to be started as the churches grow, shall have tested the competency of the appellate bodies in America to weigh and to decide them. But if the extension of these denominational lines to heathen lands be possible, is desirable?

This question has recently been fore

Amoy Mission of the church just having been established in 1842, has in perfect sympathy of feeling and the Amoy Mission of the English an Church, which was established afterwards. It was not strange that in creed, and heart, and polity, and when they came together from their lands in the midst of that great field, should become helpful to each other and when, at length, converts multiplied their labours, it became hard to say which was of Paul and which of Apollos. By churches needed to be organised, English and American missionaries joined them in concert. Other presbyteries needed to be discharged, and missionaries discharged them together. After this united action had been decided when no attempt to arrest it had been made without laceration and at the missionaries of the Reformed church received the formal announcement of the will of their Synod, that the Amoy mission at Amoy should be left to a classis by themselves, to be subordinate to the church at home. They received a statement of the difficulties in their way; and it being left to them to decide when the proposed union could be formed, they could do more than yield to the preponderating influence of their work, and maintain the symmetrical co-operation by which it had been advanced. Of course, the relations between them and their helpers grew closer; the work proceeded; the churches increased in number, and a Chinese presbytery of a theory that had been so warmly cherished would have furthered no good end. But the circumstances which called for its suspension were too plain to be questioned. The Synod accordingly, with equal prudence and piety, suspends its action. The Providence of God is wiser than men. The great work of evangelising the heathen world is but begun, and while its great aim and method are perfectly settled in the Gospel, it is fair to expect that its details of policy, so far from shaping themselves by the theories even of the best men, will be unfolded at every important juncture by Him who "leads his people like a flock." Would it not be a matter of joy if He should make heathen ground, after every fatal growth of superstition and cruelty has culminated it for ages, to be the new fair field in which to plant one garden of the Lord, and so should lead the churches out from among the landmarks of their old disputes into the conscious and avowed unity of Christ's work and triumph?

I have run the risk of wearying your readers by this extended statement chiefly because it concerns what I consider a vital element in the development of our work of missions. But I would also be glad to convince British Christians, who have not withheld their help from American missions and missionaries in any corner of the globe, that the soul of American piety is large and generous, and that if any inadequate theory may mislead it for a time, it cannot control it.

NATIONAL PROGRESS IN ANTI-SLAVERY POLICY, ETC.

be no involuntary servitude in the State except for crime.

Two smaller circumstances are not trifling. The right of negroes to ride in the rail cars in the national capital, which was recently refused them with impunity, has been formally secured to them; and a policeman in New York has been tried and reprimanded by the police commissioners for ejecting a coloured woman from a car in one of our avenues. This act of the commissioners brought forth from the superintendent of the road a formal order that coloured persons be permitted to ride in any car. What a siam your readers will exclaim, that such an orde should have been needed! A shame, indeed; but since it was needed, it is something that it has, at length, been given.

The vast number of slaves whom the war has freed are exciting deserved interest. Of the efforts that are making for their advantage I will speak in my next letter.

It is pleasant to observe continued statements of extensive revivals of religion in different parts of the country.

AUSTRALIA.

Sydney, New South Wales,
May 18, 1864.

MISSION WORK IN THE PACIFIC—BISHOP PATTESON—THE NEW HEBRIDES.

During the last few weeks several matters of unusual importance and interest have been brought under the consideration of the Christian public here. First, a special and redoubled appeal has been made to the Australian colonies on the subject of Christian missions in the islands of the Pacific. Early in April we were visited by Dr. Patteson, the Missionary Bishop of Melanesia, who, under the direction of that experienced missionary general, Dr. Selwyn, Bishop of New Zealand, has organised a mission for Melanesia. Having expounded in Sydney and the southern cities of Australia his plan of training the Melanesian youth, and related some of the results, Dr. Patteson went for a few days to the capital of Queensland, and on his return informed us that his project had been so well received by the authorities there, that a grant had been promised to the Melanesian Mission of a portion of Curtis Island, off Port Curtis, to which he hopes to have his mission-school, now at Auckland, transferred; and where, besides having his head-quarters in a much more convenient position for the purposes of the mission in the islands, he will have an opportunity of attempting the evangelization of the aborigines of that part of Australia. While the interest excited by Dr. Patteson's addresses on the work of God among the Melanesians was still unabated, the Day Spring, from Nova Scotia, arrived in Port Jackson, with three missionaries—the Rev. Messrs. Morrison, M'Culloch, and Gordon—bound for the New Hebrides, in the same portion of the Pacific. These three devoted men, with Mrs. Morrison and Mrs. M'Culloch, have not yet been at the scene of their destined labours; but from the speeches of Messrs. Paton and Inglis, and the work of Mr. Murray on "Western Polynesia," the history of the New Hebrides Mission has become sufficiently familiar to us to enlist much sympathy with the enterprise of the Day Spring. That vessel has sailed to-day. Many Christian friends assembled to see the parting—including those two veterans in the South Sea Mission, Pitman and Buzacott. Dr. Steel gave a farewell address, in the name of the Sydney church, to the missionaries.

UNION AMONG PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.

Another important movement has awakened more varied feelings, and has met with more obstruction. This is the renewed attempt of the representatives of the Presbyterian churches to expedite the consummation of the long-sought union. In Evangelical Christendom for February, the union is spoken of as already consummated in regard to more important sections of the denomination. But, in fact, the work has not as yet gone beyond this, that the synods corresponding with the Established and Free Churches of Scotland respectively, and the United Presbyterian congregation, have agreed to unite on terms to which the majority in each of these bodies have assented. But before the synods and congregation act on the recommendations of the Conference, and make promised union a fact, two questions present themselves for decision, about which the parties to the pending negotiation are sufficiently unanimous to go forward. The questions are: (1) Shall the Synod of New South Wales and the isolated Presbyterians be now invited to join in the Conference, which many think they ought to have been called at the outset? And (2), Shall the conditions embodied in the Basis be so modified as, without abandoning any principle already recognised in the negotiations, to remove obstacles out of the way of some sensitive Free Church Highlanders? We are very anxious to avoid one sorrowful result of Presbyterian union in the sister colony of Victoria—the repulsion of two small parties of conscientious brethren, whose continued isolation mars to some degree the joy and strength of the union. No definite official steps can now be taken here until November, when the synods again meet. We hope the delay may serve to forward the attainment of a comprehensive and cordial union that will last till the Millennium.

EPISCOPAL PROCEEDINGS.

The new Bishop of Goulburn, Dr. Thomas, is exploring his wide diocese, and proclaiming to a scattered people the glad tidings, to the public declaration of which some of them have been for many years unused. Two harassing topics are likely to be agitated again before long—State aid to religion, and legislative sanction to ecclesiastical synods. The Bishop of Sydney has publicly avowed his conviction that the people of the colony have not yet given an unmistakeable decision on the question of State aid, and his hope that this system, abolished by Act of Parliament in 1862, may be restored. His lordship has also said that the Church of England must have a synod whose decisions shall have the force of law, and shall not be limited in their authority to those who have previously consented to abide by them.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

TUESDAY, JULY 5.—MORNING SITTING.

In accordance with the intimation already made in these pages, the Eighteenth Annual Conference of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance was held at the commencement of last month, in Edinburgh. The opening meeting, on Tuesday morning, July 5, took place in Queen-street [United Presbyterian] Hall. The area of the hall was filled and the galleries partially occupied. There were present on this and subsequent occasions, during the Conference, the following among other gentlemen: The Hon. Lord Benholme; Mr. J. Gardiner Baird; The Hon. Major Baillie; The Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel; General Anderson; Findlay Anderson, Esq.; Rev. W. Arnot; Rev. W. Anderson, Loanhead; J. Balfour, Esq.; Professor Balfour; Rev. Professor Binnie; Rev. J. W. Borland; P. Bayne, Esq., London; Pastor Berg, of Sweden; Rev. Dr. Beets, of Holland; J. D. Bryce, Esq.; Rev. Dr. Candlish; Rev. G. A. Callen; Captain Christie; W. B. Carter, Esq.; Dr. G. H. Davis, London; F. B. Douglas, Esq.; T. J. Dunn, Esq.; Dr. Duncan, Dublin; Colonel Davidson; Rev. D. T. K. Drummond; Rev. G. C. Duncan; Rev. Professor Duncan; Pastor Clement de Faye, Brussels; Rev. Dr. Davidson; A. Craigie, Esq., Falcon Hall; Rev. James Davis; Rev. Dr. Eadie; John Finch, Esq., Tunbridge Wells; C. P. Gibson, Esq.; Dr. R. K. Neville; Rev. G. J. Glyn, Witchesampton; Rev. A. Gould; T. H. Graham, Esq., Edmond Castle; Gordon, Esq., Aberdeen; Rev. Dr. Harper; Rev. Dr. Henderson; Rev. G. Hall, Madras; Samuel Holden, Nottingham; Sheriff Jameson; Rev. Dr. G. Johnston; Colonel Lavie, Blackpath; R. A. Macfie, Esq., Liverpool; W. E. Malin, Esq., Langholm; W. M'Arthur, Esq., London; Professor Mitchell; T. M'icking, Esq.; Rev. Dr. M'Cosh, Belfast; Rev. Sir H. W. Sheriff, Bart; Rev. Dr. M'Crie; Pastor Kuhn, Turin; Rev. Dr. M'Kenzie, Birmingham; R. Hamilton M'Gill; Rev. Dr. Murray Mitchell; Rev. Dr. Macfarlane; Mr. Alderman Oldham, Macclesfield; The Hon. the Master of Polwarth; Mr. Alderman Palk, Southampton; Rev. Dr. Peddie; Pastor Pilatte, Nice; Pastor Petavel, Neufchatel; Rev. Dr. Prochnow, Berlin; Rev. W. Robertson; Pastor Rothe, Berlin; Pastor Boughton, Lisbon; T. Sercombe, Esq., London; Dr. Stewart, Dublin; Rev. Dr. Stewart, Leghorn; Rev. J. M. Soule, Battersea; Rev. C. Seaver, Belfast; Rev. Dr. Steane, Professor St. Hilaire, Paris; Rev. A. N. Somerville; N. Stevenson, Esq.; Pastor Storjohan, Norway; Dr. Sibbald; Rev. George Scott, Newcastle; Rev. Dr. Smart; Rev. J. Stewart, from Africa; Rev. H. Schmettau; Rev. Dr. Andrew Thomson; Rev. W. Tyler, London; Burns Thomson, Esq.; Colonel Walker, R.A., London; Rev. J. H. Wilson, London; Rev. Jonathan Watson; Rev. Dr. Wylie; Rev. W. Watson, Langholm; Rev. Dr. Wood, Constantinople; Rev. W. Wilson, Feejee Islands; Colonel Young, Bedford; Dr. J. Young, Dr. W. Young.

The proceedings commenced with devotional exercises, over which the Hon. and Rev. B. W. NOEL presided. The assembly having sung the first six verses of the 32nd Psalm, the Rev. C. Seaver read the thirteenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians. Mr. Noel then proceeded to deliver the opening address, on Christian union. In connexion with this subject, he exhorted Christians to live holy lives and to labour zealously for the conversion of the ungodly. He dwelt also upon the necessity for the Church being rebaptized with the Spirit, and for the prevalence of genuine love amongst Christian people. And when this existed, we should hear no more of a prelate of the Church of England classing his Nonconformist brethren with beershops and bad houses, as hindrances to the spread of religion, nor find a minister not less eminent for his talent and virtues still more recently question whether Dissenters ought to hold any further intercourse with Evangelical ministers of the Establishment. Mr. Noel recommended the members of the Alliance to cultivate their union more closely than ever by holding united meetings for prayer, and for preaching, and to work with each other in all possible ways for the spiritual welfare of men.

The Rev. D. T. K. Drummond, Dr. G. H. Davis, and Colonel Young then offered prayer, and at intervals portions of Psalms were sung.

BUSINESS PROCEEDINGS—PRACTICAL RESOLUTIONS.

The devotional exercises having terminated, the chair was taken by Major-General ANDERSON, in the absence of the President, Lord Calthorpe, who, as Dr. Steane explained, was detained in London by his parliamentary duties. The General, upon taking the chair, briefly addressed the assembly, adverting to the meeting at Liverpool, when the Alliance was formed, eighteen years ago, and expressed his intense joy at that event, and that it had been continued until now.

Dr. ANDREW THOMSON here apologised for the absence, in consequence of indisposition, of John Henderson, Esq., of Park.

Four secretaries of the Conference having been appointed, and the usual resolution on the order of business adopted, the Rev. D. T. K. DRUMMOND, of Edinburgh, read and enforced the Practical Resolutions of the Alliance, and declared his conviction that the association was of heavenly origin, that it had done a vast amount of good in a variety of ways, and was yearly increasing in strength. In putting forward these Practical Resolutions for the re-adoption of the meeting, he must be permitted to give utterance to the earnest wish that some means could be devised for the admission of members of the Society of Friends, without in anywise giving up the basis of the Alliance. This sentiment was warmly cheered by the meeting.

REPORT OF COUNCIL.

The Rev. JAMES DAVIS then read an abstract of the annual report of the Council. It stated that the membership of the British organization had been considerably increased during the year, and that these additions had included not a few persons, both lay and clerical, who had been won over to its ranks after a long season of indifference and opposition. A large and useful correspondence had been carried on with Christian brethren in many lands. Reference was also made in the report to the annual Week of Prayer throughout the world, and especially to the meetings devoted to prayer for the children of Christian parents; and then followed a detail of the several efforts put forth in the cause of religious liberty on the Continent of Europe. In regard to Spain, the Committee considered its work to have been done when Matamoros and his companions were liberated from prison; but much interest continued to be felt in their religious progress and usefulness. The meeting cheered the statement that the memorial to the Czar of Russia on behalf of the persecuted Baptists of Courland had been successful, the sentence upon them having been completely reversed, and the brethren restored to their homes; and also the announcement that information had that very morning been received of the restoration to their parents of the five children who had been forcibly removed from a house in Lucerne because the father had objected to allow one of them to be baptized: and it was stated that the public opinion of the place condemned the act of tyranny that had been practised. The report specified, at length, the manner in which the Tercentenary of Calvin's death had been celebrated in Geneva and in London, and concluded with the gratifying announcement that the funds had exceeded those of any former years, and that all outstanding liabilities were discharged.

JOHN FINCH, Esq., one of the treasurers, submitted an abstract of the accounts for the past year, from which it appeared that the total income for the year was 1,710*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, and the expenditure less than this by 9*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Of this income, 815*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.* was contributed by England; by Scotland, 124*l.*; and by Ireland, 192*l.*; for special objects, 577*l.* The report was adopted on the motion of the Rev. CARR GLYNN, seconded by W. E. MALCOMBE, Esq.

The Rev. Dr. STEWART next read a paper on "Special Helps and Hindrances to the Spread of the Gospel in Italy." We have kept our readers so fully informed upon this subject, from month to month, that it is not necessary for us to reproduce the doctor's paper. Some parts of it fully confirmed the statements of our own correspondent. When Dr. Stewart had concluded, the Conference adjourned till half-past six, in the evening, when there was a general reception of members at a soirée in the common hall of the New [Free Church] College.

EVENING SITTING.

RELIGION ON THE CONTINENT.

At eight o'clock on Tuesday evening a public meeting took place at the Free Church Assembly Hall, under the presidency of Lord BENHOLME. The meeting having been opened with singing, Principal Candlish engaged in prayer, after which the Chairman explained that the meeting was to be devoted to reports by brethren from different parts of the Continent. The Rev. W. ROBERTSON, of Edinburgh, introduced the several speakers.

Signor MEILLE, of Turin, then spoke in French, his subject being the progress of the Gospel in Italy, during the past fifteen years. He spoke of the encouragements, and also of the trials, which the Evangelical labourers had met with, and made an appeal to the Christian people of this country to aid in the work. They felt themselves free to call upon the churches for help, because the work they were doing was not for themselves, but was the work of Jesus Christ, in which all His true followers should be concerned. The Evangelical Alliance, he remarked, had in great part in its hands the remedy for the evils and religious divisions which distracted Italy. They did not want in Italy the Church of the Vaudois, or the church of any other party, but the Church of Jesus Christ. Signor Meille concluded by asking the fervent and unceasing prayers of the Christian people of Great Britain on behalf of Italy.

M. PILATTE, of Nice, addressed the meeting, as the representative of the Waldensian Church. He described the religious condition of Italy, maintaining that the Evangelical church in Italy had to contend, on the one hand, against the grosser forms of superstition, and, on the other, the most subtle and extreme form of idolatry. He made an allusion to Rome, quoted in our earlier pages, and went on to address the audience thus: On you we do depend, after God, for the extension of the work begun in Italy through the Church of the Waldenses, and which has already so prospered, that we have fifty missionaries in Italy, and have our school of theology planted in the heart of Florence. We have

Lombardy, and Piedmont hearing the Jesus Christ, and thousands of souls not knowledge of the truth as it is in thousands having actually believed in it. Is not that a great work accomplished in a country where, a few years ago, none of Jesus, none could open a Bible and none could give away an Evangelical work is little if we think of the Italy. Popery has done for the Italian even Paganism has not done. In fact, taking nominally the place of heathenism and preserved among the Italians the of heathenism; its moral effects are. Popery has been emphatically in than anywhere else, Paganised Christianity if you please, Christianised Paganism. The Italians are becoming enlightened, taking the place of superstition, have still some of the worst forms of. These are our fin de siècle days when we go you and are cheered at every sentence we put on a different look from reality ordinarily is. We hope more with you than when we are alone; we go back to our work and have to difficulties face to face, sometimes we lent. Just now you may cheer us, but gone we want something else from our prayers; we want you to rework before God, and remember it are on your knees—to pray for Italy, who preach the Gospel there, for whom the Gospel is preached, and for whom it is not yet preached. (M. Pilatte and great applause.)

ROSSEUW DE ST. HILAIRE, of Paris, said the meeting on the state of religion. The work of evangelization, he said, was very brilliantly in some parts of the and slowly in others; but altogether good reason to feel thankful, and to take heart for farther efforts. A great change place in France since the publication of his book on "The Life of Christ." For before the appearance of that volume the higher classes in France were peculiar in matters of religion; they were ch incredulous as indifferent. Now, the feeling of indifference had given place; and there was an intense curiosity in reference to religious questions. He (er) was in the habit of addressing things like the present, only there were included in the audience; and after the of Renan's "Life of Christ," the attendance at these meetings was doubled. It was generally known that the first edition of "Life of Christ" was followed by another—a edition—with the view apparently of the poison sink deeper into the public; it was rather astounding to discover the second edition, which was published at the time, was almost a complete disavowal of the first. (Laughter.) Pastor de Pressensé had paid a visit to Palestine, and was engaged in a work, another "Life of Christ," entirely refuting the statements of M. Renan, and had determined on bringing out first book, which would soon be in the hands of the public, to do its intended work during the of his more elaborate and complete work on the subject. (Applause.)

WEDNESDAY, JULY 6.—MORNING SITTING.

This morning the proceedings were resumed with a devotional service in Queen-street Hall, the Rev. Carr J. GLYN, Rector of Witchampton, in the chair. Two psalms were sung; and prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. Prochnow, of Berlin; the Rev. Dr. Wood, of the American Board of Missions; the Rev. W. Tyler, of London; and the Rev. Jonathan Watson. Mr. Glyn read 1 Cor. xi., and delivered a brief address founded upon that Scripture, applying it to the Church of these days.

PRESENT TENDENCY OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT.

At the close of the devotional exercises, the Hon. the Master of POLWARTH took the chair, and introduced the business of the day by urging the special importance of a visible Christian union in these days, when error is so prevalent. The SECRETARY explained the regretted absence, mostly through illness, of Lord Roden, the Revs. Dr. Blackwood, T. Currie, Dr. Urwick, and Professor Simpson, all of whom had been expected to be present and to take part in the engagements of the day. The CHAIRMAN having nominated a committee to prepare the names of the next year's Council, the Rev. Dr. M'CONH, of Belfast, read a very elaborate, thoughtful, and eloquent paper on "The Present Tendency of Religious Thought in Great Britain and Ireland." Setting out with the statement that in the end thought rules the world, impulse and passion soon expending themselves, the question, he said, was all important, What is the tendency of thought in these times? For as the tendency of thought in this age, so would be the settled opinions of the next. The result of his studies had led him to this conclusion, that the prevalent sentiments of young men between eighteen and twenty-five years of age became, after being somewhat modified and sobered, the opinions of mankind in the succeeding generation. It could not be doubted that the present was an age of restlessness and discontent, and of transition to something either worse or better. The day of the mediæval, or Puseyite, reaction he conceived to have passed in a great degree away, and one of rationalism to have begun. Persons who, like himself, had passed the watershed of life, were apt to complain and to magnify everything that was old at the expense of the new. He did not join in that cry. The old ought certainly to be revered, but it must not be allowed to crush the new, merely because it is new. He rejoiced in the spirit of inquiry that is abroad, believing anything to be better than stolid indifference, or careless acquiescence in what exists. Give him life at all hazards rather than death which had nothing to lose. But, if an age of inquiry inspired hope, it also excited anxiety. The age would not allow itself to be called an infidel one, nor did it deserve the name, for the Christian Church was still strong in zeal and activity. He doubted much if it ever was, on the whole, in a more healthy state. But it had formidable foes in the ranks of science and of literature, and also within itself, where strong objections were entertained to tests and creeds of other times. But the peculiarity of the age was not in its restlessness and discontent. In these respects, it resembled many that had gone before it. The peculiarity of the age consisted in this—that it would not declare what it wants, wishes, and expects. Instead of a clear and positive avowal of what was desired and sought after, there was a studied, or weak, and vacillating uncertainty about the expected improvement, on the part alike of the rejecter of Christianity, and of those who professed to accept it, but under modified aspects. The Professor then proceeded, at great length, to characterise the varied opinions prevalent among the so-called men of religious progress, and to relate a striking conversation which had taken place upon the theme in a distinguished literary company, influential writers for our periodical literature, including young men reared at Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh. Doubt, he went on to remark, had been exalted into the rank of a virtue, and mistiness was much approved. In the language of Scripture, it seemed by these people to be desired that we should be all "baptized in the cloud and in the sea." This condition of haziness and suspense, however, could not continue. We were coming to a point from which two roads diverge; and, this reached, our more eager youths would betake themselves either to the right or to the left. He feared that some would take the path that leads towards infidelity without knowing its direction, but felt confident that many would draw back and choose the right way when they discovered the position to which their leaders had conducted them, and that the something new and better which they had been promised was not to be obtained. After dwelling upon that miserable Pantheism into which men sank who forsook the truth, but stopped short of Atheism, and after examining the cheerless position taken by M. Renan, he showed how utterly impossible it was for men to be Christians at all without faith in the written Word, as well in the letter as in the Spirit, and consequently in fixed doctrines. Examining the philosophical systems of former and present times, he contended furthermore that the affections of the heart could be called forth only by belief in Christ and through love to Him. The attempt to keep up feeling without settled faith must end in making people first cold and then immoral. With reference to the Church of England, he said, all Christian communities must of necessity take a lively interest in her position and welfare, seeing that departure from the faith in that Church would be followed by tremendous consequences throughout Christendom. He earnestly trusted that the day would never come when the pulpits of that Church would be free to men of the most opposite opinions, in the way that some were contending for, on the ground that all sentiments in the nation ought to be represented in a National Church. He would not say a word against the demand for perfect toleration in the nation, believing that truth only could put down error; but it was too much to ask that there should be the same toleration in the Church of Christ, and the Church of England, while it was a national institution, was also a Church of Christ, and had been adopted by the nation because it was a Church of Christ. Such toleration as that pleaded for would be the destruction of all religious society. There must be substantial unity, or our Zion would not be the perfection of beauty. If the time should ever come when it was held to be desirable to place in one parish a minister who taught that Jesus is a mere man, and that no Saviour is needed; in the next, one who taught that Jesus is the Son of God, and the Saviour, we all need; and in a third, one who should exhort the people to hear the Church instead of Christ, one of two consequences must follow—either religious bigotry and unseemly controversy would prevail, or, what was more probable, all religion would come to be regarded with profound indifference. In this toleration of all creeds in the one Church, a still worse case might be imagined than the sharp collision of these opposite opinions—namely, that of a parish where a Socinian minister was the only instructor of the people; and if things should come to such a pass as this, surely good men in every church would combine to sweep it off the face of the earth. (This remark, uttered with much fervour, was loudly applauded.) With a touching and eloquent plea for more perfect Christian union, and a warm eulogy upon the action of the Alliance, Dr. McCosh concluded his address amidst loud cheers.

A vote of thanks was unanimously passed to Dr. McCosh for his able address, with a request for its publication by the Alliance Committee, on the motion of Sir HENRY MONCREIFF, seconded by the Rev. CARR J. GLYNN. Dr. PROCHNOW, of Berlin, and the Rev. BAPTIST NOEL warmly supported the resolution.

THE LAST PHASE OF GERMAN UNBELIEF.

Rev. Dr. CAIRNS, of Berwick, read a paper entitled "A Few Notes on the Last Phase of German Unbelief." The paper consisted of a brief exposition and criticism of the new edition of Strauss's "Leben Jesu." Professing to be for the people, the work still retained its character of learned and critical discussion through more than 600 pages of closely-printed octavo. A considerable part of the present work of Strauss consisted of abuse against the theologians; and it might turn out that the hopes of Strauss from his appeal to the German people would meet with as little success as his former appeal to theologians had done. It was certainly characteristic that the strength of unbelief was now looked for among the people, and that the movement of which the work of Strauss was the advanced guard strove to propagate its negations by a flattering appeal to the infallibility of the masses. Dr. Strauss divided his work into three parts—first, an exposition of the different theories of the Gospels; second, a history of Christ as purged from fable; and, third, a classified list of the myths, chronologically arranged, and traced to their sources, by which the real history of Jesus has, according to him, been disfigured and overlaid. Nothing could be more fair than to submit all this to the decision of a miscellaneous audience. Dr. Strauss in this work empannelled, as it were, a jury from the streets, and asked a verdict from this audience to the effect that the four Gospels were not recognised in their present form till the middle of the second century. It was surely a huge blunder to carry such questions as those discussed in this book before such a forum, and that Dr. Strauss should have attempted it was something like a confession of despair. The absurdity was all the greater that Renan had preceded him in this appeal, maintaining on these critical points views essentially different, and especially building up his "Life of Jesus" on the fourth Gospel as substantially apostolic, thus vitiating his whole process by what Strauss does not hesitate to call a radical error. It was an unexpected honour thus thrust on the sovereign democracy to compose the discords of unbelief, and decide where its champions themselves disagreed. In concluding his

Cairns said: One general answer to work this retrospect shows to be sufficient. Christianity went astray in the first labyrinth. If the balloon, to use a metaphor, was inflated by Paul and John, it was high to descend at his touch—he can get by it to his own injury; and if he came into contact into a temporary importance, to be dragged down again into that oblivion to which the Christian soon dismissed its most successful

In the dedication of his book to the memory of a deceased brother, he boasts of him his earthly troubles he never sought comfort of a hereafter. This tone is of coming neglect and forgetfulness; which ostentatiously digs the grave of hopes abjures its own title to immortality. (Applause.)

SPECTS OF THE INFIDEL CONTROVERSY.

Mr. BAYNE, A.M., next read a paper on "The Moral Aspects of the Infidel Controversy of the Day." He observed that the controversy reached a crisis, and within the century it will one way or other be decided. Mr. Bayne then proceeded to indicate the grounds for believing that Christianity will not survive any elaboration of a religion of nature. He pointed out that our modern naturalists have improved in any particular upon the ethics of Christianity. The abstract moralists of old philosophers was unquestionably better than, and therefore had a right to, the popular fables about Jupiter and the like. It has always been found that, no modern non-Christian moralist point out upon a principle of natural ethics is so noble, than the principle involved in the Christian religion. In the second place, it can be shown that the moralists of the naturalist, non-Christian school have ventured to depart from the true type, from the spirit of the letter of the ethics, they have substituted not a better, but a worse. But, thirdly, and last of all, we can deliberately affirm that, in the arena of argument, the facts on which Christianity rests have not only not been refuted, but have been fairly confronted—the facts, the life of Christ, the facts by which the power of the universe was in the fact that He raised the dead, and the tempest, and was, in all things, a conqueror. After elaborating this idea with much ability, and offering some practical suggestions as to the way in which the controversy between Christianity and scepticism should be conducted, Mr. Bayne concluded

While we cannot possibly be too emphatic in our affirmation of the Christian religion is supernatural and we beware of too dogmatic a certainty—we understand, in all relations and in all manner in which the Almighty has revealed Himself to man. Let us, on that basis, and faithfully take the command of His Word, holding fast to the fact that all contradictions, all difficulties, will be solved in Christ, and convinced that His own interpreter, and He will be our guide. (Loud applause.)

EVENING SITTING.

ADDRESSES ON MISSIONS.

The Conference met in the Free Church Assembly Hall. Colonel DAVISON presided, and stated that the principal business of the meeting was the hearing of addresses on Indian Missions. It had been hoped that Dr. Duff would have reached home in time to have taken part in the proceedings, but having extended his researches more widely than he had at first intended, he would not arrive in this country for some weeks yet.

The Rev. GEORGE HALL, of Madras, remarked upon his sphere of labour there, and called attention to the influence which missionary institutions seemed to be exerting on the evangelization of India.

The Rev. Dr. PROCHNOW, of Berlin, addressed the meeting on the missionary work of Gossner. He briefly alluded, in his opening observations, to some incidents in his own early life, and also to incidents in the life of Gossner, and then proceeded to refer to the beginning of Gossner's work in sending missionaries abroad. Five or six young men who had been refused by the Berlin Missionary Society came to Gossner and stated their belief that they were called of God to undertake missionary work, and asked for help. This he said he could not give, but the young men came back to him again, and after he had prayed with them and heard them pray he was convinced that they were called of the Lord for that work. Gossner, not being strong enough to give the young men the instruction necessary for them before they undertook the work, he asked him (Dr. Prochnow) to instruct them; and in the course of a short time he sent fourteen men to Australia to labour among the Germans settled there, and the natives. He had himself been labouring in India for nearly eighteen years, when, in consequence of the ill-health of his wife, he was obliged to return to Germany, in 1858. He then found Gossner still alive, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, but he found him dying, after having, during the last twenty years of his life, sent out 140 brethren and sixty sisters—altogether 200 labourers into the mission-field. Some of these were sent to America, and other countries where there were German emigrants. The mission in India, which Gossner began in 1838, was on the Ganges, not far from Benares, and there there were seven missionary stations, with seven married brethren, one unmarried, one widow, and one schoolmistress, labouring at them, and there were from twenty to 200 converts at every station. Another mission of Gossner's in India, which had been highly successful, was one among the the Coles on the hills, fifty or sixty miles north of Calcutta, and in which there were now 5,000 baptized converts.

Dr. MURRAY MITCHELL added his testimony to the good that had been done by Pastor Gossner's missionaries, and pointed out the large field which was still unoccupied by missionaries in India, and the call there was on all Christians to go forward in helping on the work.

Mr. BURNS THOMSON, superintendent of Cowgate Mission Dispensary, next addressed the meeting on medical missions. He said he thought the establishment of a school for training intending missionaries in medicine would be a great advantage. The Edinburgh Medical Mission had been very successful in its efforts, and the number of persons who had applied for relief during the first year of its establishment amounted to 1,273. A steady increase had since that time taken place, the number of applicants last year being 8,000. Mr. Thomson then referred to Madagascar. Could any one suppose that Protestant missions in Madagascar would have now been what they were had a Jesuit missionary enjoyed the confidence of the King rather than Dr. Davidson? Dr. Davidson had lately been putting up an hospital in the capital, with sixty-two beds, and had only expended 30*l.* upon it. The rest of the cost had been met by the nobles, this being the first instance in which the Malagase had united in the promotion of any benevolent enterprise. Dr. Davidson was now anxious to establish a Royal Medical College.

The Rev. Mr. SOMERVILLE pronounced the benediction.

THURSDAY, JULY 7.—MORNING SITTING.

OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

This morning, the devotional service was presided over by the Rev. A. N. SOMERVILLE, of Glasgow, in the absence of the Rev. Dr. M'Leod. At the business meeting, which was very numerously attended, Lord Roden was to have taken the chair; but as illness prevented the attendance of that noble lord in Edinburgh at this time, W. E. Malcombe, Esq., Langholm, presided. The CHAIRMAN having appropriately opened the business of the day, the Conference proceeded to consider the general subject of "Hindrances to the Growth of Religion in the Church, and to the Action of the Church on the World, with their Remedies." The branches into which this subject was divided in the programme were the following: "1. Sabbath Observance in this Country and on the Continent. 2. Our Moral Wastes, and How to Reclaim Them. 3. The Home Mission Field."

The Rev. Dr. ANDREW THOMSON read a paper on "Sabbath Observance." In commencing his paper, the reverend doctor said that the enemies of vital Christianity were now aiming their attacks at three points. Some were directing all their enmity and energy against its evidences, especially in calling in question the inspiration of the Scriptures; others were seeking to destroy the popular belief in the great central doctrine of the atonement; and others still were doing what they could to reduce the Lord's-day to the level of a common day, having found out what Voltaire long since announced, that this institution was the mound and outwork of our religion, and that, so long as men assembled in great numbers for the worship of God on a particular day of the week, it was impossible that religion could be destroyed. It was their duty, therefore, to do all they could to preserve the Lord's-day; and in this country it was not merely the work of Christians to preserve the Lord's-day—there was no inconsiderable portion of our population for whom they were called to recover that day. It was estimated that no less than five millions of our countrymen were systematically withdrawn from all holy Sabbath influence, including 100,000 railway servants, 100,000 boatmen and navigators, and 200,000 keepers of publichouses and such like. He called upon Christian men to use their political as well as moral influence to preserve the day of rest, and, as far as possible, to recover it to those who at present did not enjoy its hallowed benefits, and suggested that one way of causing the Sabbath to be honoured would be by our keeping up a high standard of Sabbath observance in our own households, in its character of genial and sunny benignity.

Mr. Alderman PALK, of Southampton, exhorted his hearers to give up the Sabbath only with their lives. He strongly advocated Imperial legislation in favour of Sabbath observance, and stated that, as the result of a recent local act passed through Parliament against Sunday excursion-trains, the plying of cabs for hire, the forcible shutting-up of shops, including tobacconists', and the earlier closing of publichouses, Southampton was now almost as quiet on Sundays as a country village.

After a few remarks from Mr. MACFIE, of Liverpool, and the Rev. Dr. ROBSON, the Rev. JOHN MACKENZIE said: Before the churches of Edinburgh set about reproving their neighbours in this matter, they ought to remove the huge beams existing in their own eye. One of the most aggravated forms of Sabbath desecration was to be seen at the doors of many of the churches. Two-thirds of the 300 cabs of Edinburgh were used on the Sabbath, and the most of them were employed by persons attending the places of worship.

Mr. GORDON said that those who were obliged to ride to church would do well to put the cab horse into the stable, and take the cabman into the church with them. This was done in some parts of the country.

The Rev. GEORGE SCOTT, from Sweden, spoke briefly upon Lord's-day observance in this country, stating that just in proportion as Evangelical religion prevailed was the sacred day revered. In several of the towns, the public houses had been closed the whole of the Sabbath by order of the municipal authorities.

The Rev. Mr. Rule, from Alexandria, the Rev. William Tyler, of London, Dr. Jenkins, of America, Dr. Stewart, and Professor St. Hilaire of Paris, also addressed the Conference upon the subject.

A brief but earnest address was next delivered on "Our Moral Wastes, and How to Reclaim Them," by the Rev. J. H. Wilson, of London. It was loudly applauded.

EVENING SITTING.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE GERMAN ALLIANCE

Lord BENHOLME occupied the chair at this meeting. After devotional exercises, his lordship stated that an important communication had been received from Prussia by the Council of this Alliance.

Dr. STEANE said that the document emanated from the German Branch of the Alliance, and was signed by gentlemen of the highest position in the Church and Universities of Prussia. The names were H. Messner, Professor of Divinity in the University of Berlin; Dr. Hoffman, Superintendent-General of the United Church of Prussia, an office analogous to that of the Archbishop of Canterbury; Dr. J. A. Nitzsch, Professor of Divinity and Metropolitan at St. Nicholas Church, Berlin; Dr. J. A. Dörner, Professor in the University of Schleswig-Holstein, at Kiel; Dr. Krummacker, one of the King's Chaplains, Potsdam; Dr. A. Tholuck, Counsellor of Consistory and Professor of Divinity, University of Halle; Dr. Julius Müller, Professor of Divinity, University of Halle; and Dr. von Kappeler, at Stuttgart, the highest dignitary in the Protestant Lutheran Church. It had been thought desirable that a communication proceeding from such a body of men should be laid before the present meeting, and that the assembly should be asked to approve of the reply that had been drafted and unanimously adopted by a numerous meeting of the Council.

The Rev. H. SCHMETTAU, Foreign Secretary, then read the letter, which began with an expression of brotherly love, and the wish that one or more of the German members of the Alliance should have been present at the Conferences in Edinburgh: and then dwelt upon the increasing need for a close union between all who love the Lord Jesus Christ. It next went, at much length, to a vindication of the German view of the Schleswig-Holstein question, especially in the respects affecting the religious teaching of the German population of the Duchies, and the illegal oppressive proceedings of the Danes. He stated that since the war great obstacles had been thrown in the way of the progress of religion by the Danish Government in Schleswig. The Gustavus-Adolphus Society, the Bible Society, and other religious institutions, had suffered irreparable injury, while in the schools the political objects had taken the place of religious teaching.

The reply to this letter was read by Dr. STEANE, echoing the brotherly sentiments of its earlier portions, the reply proceeded: "While together refraining from these (political topics), we not only feel ourselves at liberty to express deep concern for any of our brethren who may be suffering oppression and wrong, but distinctly laid upon by our Christian principles to avow sincere sympathy with them, as with all who are afflicted for righteousness sake. . . . May I graciously unite the hearts of His true children in both countries, as throughout the whole Christendom, in still closer and more affectionate bonds, and in answer to the cries of His Redeemed Church, speedily bring about that golden period when all wars shall cease, and none shall hurt or destroy in all God's holy mountain, righteousness, peace, and love prevail among the nations of the earth."

The first document was listened to with profound silence, and there was no expression of feeling at its close, whereas the second was evidently appreciated all through, and following the sentence there was a burst of applause. The CHAIRMAN, in asking the Assembly to adopt the reply, which was unanimously done, gave voice to the deep regret of his heart that the debate should have been waged at all. As the next subject of the evening was announced, the Rev. M. M'GILL, of Glasgow, begged permission to say a word in reference to the communications just read. He had not a sentence to utter against the first; one more suitable could not have been chosen; but surely it was a most unhappy thing that our German brethren were placed in circumstances which made them think it desirable to have the British Branch in this way to obtain publicity for what might turn out to be an entirely one-sided statement. (This remark was met with loud applause.) He was glad that the Council, by silence in regard to the most important part of the document, indicated that they did not endorse the truth of the statements made respecting the conduct of Denmark.

The meeting was afterwards addressed by the Rev. Dr. WOOD, of the American Board, on Turkey as a Field of Missionary Labour; by Pastor C. LE FAYE, of Brussels, on the Progress of Protestantism and Religious Freedom in Belgium; and by the Rev. Dr. BEETS, of Holland, on the state of religion in that country.

FRIDAY, JULY 8.—MORNING SITTING.

HOME MISSIONS.

At the business meeting, the chair was taken by Alderman PALK, of Southampton.

The Rev. W. ROBERTSON, of Edinburgh, delivered an address upon "Our Moral Wastes, and How to Reclaim Them." He stated that there was not a district in the old town where the churches were not engaged more or less successfully in home mission work, and gave an account of the method of operations in his own parish. He had found great advantage in the employment of the Bible-women, the holding of mothers' meetings, the opening of comfortable reading-rooms, and the delivering of weekly secular lectures on interesting and amusing subjects, by which the people became trained to the reception of oral teaching.

The Rev. HAMILTON M'GILL, of Glasgow, read a paper on "Home Missions," with reference rather to principles of operation and the duty of the Church than to actual schemes in force for the elevation of the masses. Regarding lay agents he spoke at some length, and said that they ought certainly to receive recognition by the Church, and to be subject to regulation; while the ordained ministry must ever be the mainspring of every home mission. It was essential, therefore, to the success of work of this kind that every pulpit should be occupied with an earnest Evangelical teacher of truth. The ministry of the Church must put itself at the head of the home missions of the Church. Let this be universally done, and the amount of moral and physical improvement that would follow could not be estimated, even by the most sanguine. Discoursing upon the duties of Church members, he laid it down as a principle that every Christian man and woman, possessing capacity for usefulness, had a right, and were under the obligation, to exercise a private ministry for the increase and the building up of the Church. In consideration of the rapidly passing away of time, he devoutly besought his hearers to engage themselves at once and heartily in rescuing their ungodly neighbours from the most perilous condition, in which they stand, and which must end in eternal death.

Pastor PETAVEL read a paper giving an account of Evangelical work among the Jews in Switzerland and elsewhere. He recommended that Jews should be requested to become, not members of the Alliance, but auditors at the annual proceedings.

The Rev. C. SEAVER, of Belfast, a clergyman of the Established Church, next read a paper upon the "Present Tendencies, Adverse and Favourable, to the Advancement of the Ends of the Protestant Reformation." Before entering upon his topic, Mr. Seaver expressed his conviction that there never before was such a body of pious and able ministers, nor of pious and able laymen, in the Irish Church as now. The Rev. Principal Candlish was to have read a second paper on the same subject, but another engagement necessitating his absence, the Rev. Dr. WYLIE delivered an eloquent address in his stead. It was followed by the appointment of the next Council, and by the adoption of some other business resolutions.

EVENING SITTING.
LETTER OF SYMPATHY.

The Hon. Major BAILLIE presided at the closing meeting. In an early part of the proceedings, Dr. STEANE referred, in language of deep feeling, to the absence of Mr. Henderson, of Park, and then read to the meeting the following letter to that gentleman, which had been prepared by the Council :—

"To John Henderson, Esq., Park, Vice-President of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance.

"Edinburgh, July 8, 1864.

"Dear Sir, and Beloved Brother in the Lord,—It is to us a matter of unfeigned sorrow that we are deprived of your presence, and of your much-valued assistance at the meetings which we are now holding in this city; and that sorrow is enhanced by the knowledge that your absence is occasioned by the afflictive Providence of God.

"It becomes us to submit to the will of our Heavenly Father, never for a moment calling in question the rectitude, the wisdom, or even the love of any of His dealings with us; at the same time, we rejoice to know that we are not forbidden to indulge sentiments of Christian sympathy when those whom we love are afflicted, or to offer our prayers in the spirit of hope as well as of resignation that it may please God to restore them to our society.

"Allow us to assure you, dear Sir, that in the season of your retirement you are most affectionately remembered by us, and our hearts are all the more drawn to you by the very circumstance which detains you from us.

"In our prayers we commend you to the tender love of our Heavenly Father, supplicating for you the rich enjoyment of His presence, and the abundant consolations of His sanctifying and sustaining grace. We know how dear to your heart are these great and precious truths of the Gospel, upon our common faith in which our Evangelical Alliance rests, and we have long been privileged to witness in your intercourse with us one of the happiest and brightest illustrations of the spirit of brotherly forbearance and charity which it inculcates. In your present withdrawal from us, which we trust will be only for a short time, may your spirit be refreshed by the assurance which we now convey to you of the love of the whole Christian brotherhood assembled here. Foreign brethren as well as those from the various parts of our own country speak of you in our meetings with the warmest affection, and in your affliction we all feel that we are ourselves afflicted.

"May it please our gracious God to render the trial eminently conducive to your peace and joy, and to His glory, and then speedily, if it be His holy will, restore you to us, that we may once more renew, and a little longer enjoy on earth, that Christian fellowship with you which is at once the foretaste and the pledge of the eternal fellowship of the saints made perfect in love.

"We desire to offer with the greatest respect our Christian love and sympathy to Mrs. Henderson, and to assure both our dear friends that we remain in the bonds of the Gospel, and love of Christ, who is our life and our hope.

"Your affectionate friends,"

On the motion of Dr. STEANE, which was seconded, this letter was cordially adopted at the meeting; and it was resolved that it be transmitted, signed as above, to Mr. Henderson.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The meeting then listened to several reports on foreign missions.

The Rev. W. WILSON, from the Feejee, gave a very cheering account of the progress of the Feejee mission, which was heard with peculiar interest. Less than thirty years ago, when the mission was first established, the people of that region were ferocious cannibals, and now 67,000 of them were professing Christianity. More than 13,000 of the number being Church members, and 5,216 on trial for baptism. There were in operation 871 schools attended by 34,999 scholars and 1,476 teachers. The number of English missionaries had increased to twelve. But there were at the time, besides these, twenty-one native missionaries, fully set apart to the work, catechists or Scripture-readers. These had contributed largely of their means for the erection of places of worship and houses, and now support all the missions. The Rev. W. WILSON had sent a handsome subscription to the Wesleyan Missionary Society. There were now 394 chapels, and 172 other preaching places.

The Rev. JAMES STEWART, from Africa, gave a report of the progress of missions upon the continent.

The Rev. Dr. PROCHNOW spoke of the progress of the institutions established by Pastor Gossner in Berlin, whose successor he has become. The thirteenth establishments are, a female Bible and Tract Society, and a Missionary Society. When called upon to succeed Gossner in the conduct of these heavy and responsible undertakings, he had shrunk from the task, fearing that he would not be forthcoming to sustain them if their founder had departed. He consented, however, to make a trial for six months, and sought the Lord to give him a sign of His will if it was right for him to continue instead of returning to India, where his heart was. Several donations soon came in, and especially from England of 1,000*l.*, given by one man, a rich man either, who also promised an amount of 25*l.* This he regarded as an answer to his prayers, and had never since had reason to doubt the Divine approval.

A closing address was delivered by Dr. PROCHNOW on the Principles and Aims of the Alliance, which was warmly applauded.

The Conference was closed with prayer and benediction, by the Hon. and Rev. BAPTIST

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

TURKEY.

A variety of facts of interest relating to Turkey will be found in the letter of our Constantinople correspondent, in an earlier part of the present number (p. 392). We here give one or two particulars, derived from other sources.

Dr. Koelle, of the Church Missionary Society, after stating the fact, already known to our readers, that there are at Constantinople several converts from Mohammedanism who are at only unmolested in their own persons, but can even do missionary work among the Mohammedans, expresses his belief that—

The Turkish Government have hitherto abstained from directly interfering with us simply because they think that, as yet, they can afford to ignore us, or, perhaps more correctly, because they apprehend that to interfere with us might cause more harm than to let us alone. At all events, some cause seems to have been hitherto at work to create obstacles in the way of converted Moslems registering as Protestant subjects of the Porte, in the manner in which, e.g., Armenians or Greeks embracing Protestantism are thus registered. The movement in favour of Christianity seems to be still quite sporadic and limited. There exists another anti-Mohammedan movement which I have to be much more general, especially among the higher class of Turks—viz., that in favour of fidelity—similar to the one found in other parts of Europe. Men of this description outwardly main Mohammedans, but in reality they are without any religion."

The above was in type, when the following telegram was published by the daily mails:—

Constantinople, July 22.—The Porte has closed all the Protestant missionary establishments and arrested several converts. The Bible and American Missionary Societies have since been opened. The Protestant movement is said to be greatly spreading among the Mussulmans.

The number of Turkish Scriptures sold last year was double that of the former, and sales in the languages used by the Armenian nation were also greatly in advance.

The erection of the English Memorial Church at Constantinople has been commenced. The Bishop of Gibraltar says: "It is a beautiful situation, and the church will show nobly on the Bosphorus."

INDIA.

A retrospect of twenty-one years' labour in Tinnevely, by the Rev. J. T. Tucker, of the Church Missionary Society, brings out the following facts. During that period he has saved from heathenism and Romanism 3,100 souls; he has witnessed the voluntary destruction by the worshippers of upwards of forty devil temples, with all their idols; and has established sixty schools, and built sixty-six churches of various dimensions. There have been, of late, some discouragement, arising from cases of immorality, and from the refusal to submit to church discipline; and from a revival, among some of the people, of heathenish practices, traceable to the prophecy that a certain demigod is coming to destroy the English Government and restore Hindooism in its integrity. But while this is the state of things in some places, generally speaking the people were never so disposed to listen to the preaching of the Gospel. The increasing liberality of the native Christians is regarded as the most encouraging feature in the work. "In almost every village where I have held a missionary meeting," writes Mr. Tucker, "there has been a goodly increase in the collection."

In some other parts of the Indian field, however, the missionaries have to labour on in vain, seeing, at present, but little fruit from their labours, and meeting with not a little calculated to discourage them in the tendencies of the native mind. The Rev. G. Shrewsbury, of the London Society, narrating the way in which the Gospel message was received at a place, held a few miles from Moorshedabad, whither he had gone for the purpose of preaching, writes a large portion of the people as utterly indifferent and careless as to which is true Christianity or Hindooism:—

They commend the truths of the Bible, admit the entire reasonableness of the Divine plan of salvation, offer not a word in opposition to what we advance, but just go away ignoring the question altogether. This negative kind of resistance is discouraging, but most heart-sickening, at times, is the active opposition we encounter. The Mohammedans, as usual, treat us with indifference and contempt. They say, "We worship God, what do we want with your Jesus? Our books do not tell us to worship Him." And so they turn from us with scorn, or noisily oppose us. Books of all kinds are highly sought after. The desire to get them is only equalled by the unwillingness to pay for them. In too many instances, I am afraid, a book is valued, not as containing so much truth, but as consisting of so much paper. So long have tracts and Scriptures been given away, that our asking a price is looked upon as an imposition, and resented as such.

The adult baptisms by the agents of the Church Missionary Society, during the second half of the year 1863, numbered, throughout South India, 393, of which 238 were in Travancore, and 139 in Tinnevely.

The adult baptisms, during last year, in Travancore, in connexion with the London Missionary Society, amounted to 242. In the district which contains the largest number of adherents, however—that of Neyoor—there had been numerous withdrawals and exclusions from the congregations, on account of immoral and inconsistent conduct.

In connexion with the German mission of Chota Nagpore, the activity of the native converts has been attended with remarkable results. The missionaries—five in number—had little opportunity of itinerating, during last year, but some of the catechists were continually travelling from village to village, visiting the Christians in their homes, teaching them the catechism, and holding prayer-meetings and other services. At the same time they sought to bring the Gospel truth also before the heathen.

“The church elders, too, came regularly to us [say the missionaries], bringing their reports and seeking instruction and advice. In consequence of this spontaneous activity of the native church, 625 families broke the fetters of heathenism and joined our people in the course of the year, and are now, together with many old inquirers, looking forward to be received as candidates for baptism.” The families coming for baptism were from 180 villages. They were simply provided with shelter, firewood for cooking, and mats for sleeping on. Their food was provided by themselves. A course of preparatory instruction was given by two missionaries, assisted by a number of catechists, for two or three weeks, and sometimes longer, and no one was baptized who was not deemed acceptable by the native church. In the year 1863 the total number baptized was 716 adults, with 454 children baptized with their parents, and 126 children of Christian parents.

A valuable native evangelist, named (after the well-known metropolitan minister) James Sherman, in the employ of the London Society's mission in South Travancore, has been called to his reward, after a career of remarkable activity and devotedness. He was originally a palmyra-tree climber, about twenty-five years ago became a convert to Christianity, and was then impressed with the conviction that he was specially adapted for preaching the Gospel to the heathen. He accordingly left his employment, and travelled from place to place in the prosecution of that object. His evangelistic labours were incessant, and his zeal was equal to any enterprise. The Dewan (Prime Minister), the King's mother, and even the King himself, were each on different occasions made the objects of personal solicitation to embrace the Gospel by James Sherman, who, for entering unbidden the royal presence was visited with blows and imprisonment. But the ruling principle of his life was to “warn all and invite all to come to the Saviour.” The last day he spent on earth he was filled with joy.

The oldest living missionary of the Baptist Society—the Rev. J. Johannes, of Chittagong, whose ministerial career extended over nearly forty-four years—now rests from his labours. Mr. Johannes passed away suddenly, but in perfect peace.

Three missionaries of the London Society—two in India and one in China—have been called to suffer similar heavy bereavement. Death, we regret to state, has removed the wives of the Revds. B. Price, of Bangalore; F. Baylis, of Neyoor; and R. J. Thomas, of Shanghai.

CEYLON.

In the reports of the native missionaries of the Wesleyan Society, in South Ceylon, we find repeated mention of the impetus given to the Buddhist superstition by the late movement, on the part of its leaders, against Christianity. Hence there appears, in some places to have been less opportunity of access than formerly to the Buddhists. One of the native brethren, however, says: “At present the movement is much abated, and we have more encouraging prospects.”

CHINA.

The Chinese Hospital at Shanghai, under the superintendence of Dr. James Henderson of the London Society, has now entered its eighteenth year. Since its foundation, upwards of a quarter of a million people have received treatment, and Dr. Henderson claims for such a continued career of prosperity and success as has been enjoyed by no other hospital in China. “Many blind receive sight, many paralytics have their limbs restored to usefulness, many are saved from dragging on a miserable existence by having broken bones united, dislocations reduced, bullets extracted, &c., &c.—all of which are exceedingly common, and completely beyond the power and art of Chinese doctors.” Last year, the aggregate attendance of patients was nearly 50,000. Cholera was very prevalent during part of June and July, and on the 14th of the latter month the mortality in the city of Shanghai reached 1,500 in twenty-four hours. Opium smokers were unusually numerous during the year, fifteen or twenty presenting themselves daily, until Dr. Henderson made it a rule that every patient, on coming under treatment, should bring his opium-pipe, as a guarantee that he was willing to stop the bad habit. This rule modified the numbers amazingly, and from the time it was enforced, in the middle of September, until the close of the year, Dr. Henderson only got twenty-eight pipes. The Chinese, in almost every instance, willingly submit to the treatment prescribed. Dr. Henderson mentions the case of a woman who had been run over by a carriage, and who had received a severe wound on the head, and was much bruised and stunned. She was in the hospital ten days. The gentleman whose carriage ran over her sent her six dollars, which were handed to her when leaving, and she was so delighted, that she expressed hope that another carriage would run over her soon." Dr. Henderson has, as his house-physician and apothecary, Chin Foo, who has been upwards of twelve years in the hospital; his brother, Keh Foo, is hospital chaplain.

WEST AFRICA.

Acqua-town, on the river Cameroons, is the most recently-formed station of the Baptist society on the West Coast. The Rev. J. Diboll, the only missionary residing there, relates some incidents which illustrate at once the degraded condition of the natives and the manifesting influence of the Christian teacher:—

Early in the month all the women in our town, about 100 in number, left their husbands and their work, and fled to a place about four miles distant, alleging as a reason that the women of the town were dying very fast, and that their husbands were bewitching them, or suffering them to be bewitched. In two days I took boat and followed them. I found them all together beneath a large tree, and there, with the first verse of the 46th Psalm before me, I endeavoured to set before them the folly and wickedness of their doing, in leaving the Word of God to seek after witchcraft. The next day they sent a messenger to me stating their desire to return, and wishing me to go and fetch them, an honour which I declined with as much politeness as I was capable of, allowing one of the head men to take my canoe and use it for that purpose.

A few weeks later I went to preach at a place where I found the chief and his people trembling with excitement; a neighbour chief had all of a sudden declared war, and was preparing to come down on him. I went immediately to that chief to dissuade him from his purpose, and happily succeeded; he had "seen the face of a white man, and would not go to war." He then told me that his people wished me to preach to them. I promised, and have been, and I shall go again. The people in that place declare that but for me Cameroons would have been all spoiled. God has in mercy twice made me instrumental in quieting the chiefs in that neighbourhood, and so preventing bloodshed.

I told you in my last of a chief having a great number of wives, two of whom I saw in chains near a tree. Upon inquiry I found that there had been nine of them who had gone aside and done wickedly. Seven of them had been punished by flogging, and had had their flesh severely cut with a knife. These two awaited similar punishment. I interceded, but got no answer; was to go the next day. Again I got no answer. A few days after his son came to my house, saying that his father had what I had said, and had unchained the women and let them go without further punishment. He was a child of sorrow who has worn a chain lifts the hands in blessing at sight of the missionary.

SOUTH AFRICA.

At Mekuatleng, the French Protestant Missionary Society's station, thirty-one natives, adults and children, were lately added to the church by baptism, in the presence of a numerous congregation. M. Dumas, the missionary, had received a visit from Moshesh, "the king of the Basutos." It had been long promised, and was evidently a source of pleasure to both parties. The old chief, or king, was accompanied by a numerous retinue. M. Dumas says: "Though Moshesh has not yet personally embraced Christianity, and though, for this reason to fear that, from political considerations, he will continue to delay conversion to an indefinite period, one cannot help regarding him with respect and attachment. We owe it to him that our mission has been established in his territory, and that it has been protected until this day. He is always happy to see new stations founded in the country over which he rules." Moshesh and all his dependent chiefs and their people attended Divine service, while visiting the missionary—at least, all who could be accommodated in the church, many had to stand outside. A grand national council was afterwards held, at which Moshesh spoke of the French Protestant missionaries in language of deep respect and gratitude. He called them the fathers of his people, and showed what they had done, by instituting a contrast between the condition of the Basutos at the period they entered the country and what it is at present. Pointing to the church and the adjacent buildings, he said: "These who founded that station and erected that house of prayer are our true friends. In the wars which we have had to maintain against our enemies, has not that place been a refuge for our wives and children, the old men and the wounded ! Was it not here the wounds were dressed and that they were nursed ? You, French missionaries, are our you have saved my tribe, you have been our true friends in the time of trial. Old missionaries are recently arrived in my territories, but I know nothing of them ; they have yet done anything for my people."

MEXICO.

An agent of the American and Foreign Christian Union, stationed at Brown Texas, mentions having met with a Mexican, who was formerly a Jesuit, but who embraced the religion of the Bible in apparent sincerity, and who denounces Rome and all its forms. The writer goes on to say :—

This converted Mexican informs me that there are 7,000 priests in Mexico, and that 150 who are fully convinced of the true character of Popery, and are more than willing to renounce the way opened. Two excellent men, he says, are suffering the severest tortures in prison in the city of Mexico, the other in Pueblo. Two more he knows, who have renounced Popery are travelling in disguise, knowing not what to do with themselves. He says the great difficulty is their extreme poverty. . . . Facts like these are coming up before us, and filling amazement. But wherefore do we marvel ? During the last two years several thousand Bibles passed into Mexico.

MADAGASCAR.

The Rev. Wm. Ellis reports favourably of the aspect of political, social, and religious affairs in Madagascar. The island is tranquil, the Queen's Government is becoming stronger, and the apprehension of any hostile attack on the island by foreigners has subsided. The native Christians continue to enjoy complete religious freedom. New places of worship are opened, congregations are enlarged, and the monthly additions to the number of members, many of whom are connected with the influential families of the capital, afford conclusive proof of the growing strength and social influence of Christianity. Mr. Ellis writes :

Quietly and satisfactorily, the Gospel continues to spread among the people, and as continuing our privilege to behold the evidences of the work of the Divine Spirit on their hearts. There has passed for a long time in which additions have not been made to the number of communicants in our churches, and few weeks pass in which we have not letters from distant places conveying salutations and asking for books. . . . The difficulties are great and the influences unfavourable to the Gospel are numerous and powerful. Still, the Christians hold their ground, numbers continue to increase ; not so numerous perhaps as a month or two ago, but still to show that God is giving testimony to the Word of His grace in the fruits which it bears. Prosperity is not confined to the operation of Christian agency within the capital, but is probably more evident in the villages around than in the capital itself.

Mr. Ellis also notices with approval the efforts of the native Christians to evangelize the Gospel. The increasing regard paid to the Sabbath excites the notice of Dr. Davidson. The market, which stands opposite his house, is nearly deserted on Sunday. "In fact respect," we are told, "Antananarivo is decidedly in advance of London." The loss of efficient members of the mission is severely felt amid its extending opportunities for usefulness. Mr. Stagg, who was doing a most important work as superintendent of education, died from the effects of the climate, and has been followed to the grave by thousands of mourners ; and the Rev. John Pearse and Mrs. Pearse have been compelled to return in consequence of the dangerous illness of the latter.

BRITISH COLUMBIA.

The Indian settlement, formed at Metlakatla, by Mr. Duncan, of the Church Mission Society, is going on prosperously. The schooner which he had fitted out carries to Vancouver's Island fish-oil, furs, Indian food, cypress-plants, &c., and the Indians at the settlement have already secured a return for their investments. Like Rastah, in the Fraser Valley, however, they had to learn the part played in commerce by the circulating medium. After the return of the schooner from Victoria (Vancouver's Island) a meeting of the shareholders interested in the vessel was held, and after providing for the expense of new sails and a dividend was declared by Mr. Duncan of five per cent. upon each share. This puzzled the Indians, who imagined when the money was given to them that they were to have it with their interest in the vessel. As soon as the matter was satisfactorily explained they at once gave her the appropriate name of the "Ahah !" or slave, signifying that all the work and they reaped the profit.

The settlement, we are told, is assuming quite an imposing aspect, and eighteen constables (who are volunteers, and desire no pay) "do their duty admirably, with favour, or prejudice, and are held in awe by transgressors."

SERMONS BY THE BISHOP OF CALCUTTA AND CANON M'NEILE.*

We connect these two works together, because, although very much unlike in several of their features, they both consist of sermons by excellent preachers and have sundry similarities in common. The sermons of the Bishop of Calcutta, upon the "Epistles for the Sundays of the Christian Year," and upon the Epistles for Christmas Day and Good Friday, fifty-seven in number, and their texts may be ascertained by a reference to the Book of Common Prayer. The Bishop's primary and practical reason for selecting these portions of Scripture was, as he tells us in the preface, that he was called to preach to strange congregations, of which he had only a general knowledge. Not only, however, does the preface give us the history of the production of this work; it contains a series of observations upon preaching and preaching. In order to successful preaching, the Bishop holds that two things are specially needed—"the knowledge of men's spiritual wants and difficulties" and a thorough acquaintance with Scripture. This last must include the study of the original scriptures, and must lead to a wise and liberal use of them in sermons. "The duty of conducting our sermons more directly with Scripture than we do, of preaching, if not continuous sermons, at least copious explanations of its actual words, is intended to be illustrated by the present publication, and furnished one of the motives for which I have collected these sermons on the Epistles into a continuous series." The advantages to be ascribed to literary preaching are—increased knowledge of the Bible; that Christian truth becomes the object of reflection and mental attention; and the promotion of a larger charity. Turning over the remarks on the plan upon which these sermons are constructed, with the simple observation that the Bishop has avowedly endeavoured to give a sound and intelligent interpretation of the texts preached upon, we notice that he insists upon spiritual preparation for sermons as still more necessary than intellectual. We quite concur in this, for however correct and critically exact a sermon may be, if the speaker has not deep spiritual sympathy with the truth he preaches, his discourses will be lamentably deficient in life and power. Rev. John Angell James was not far wrong when he entitled one of his books "An earnest Ministry the Want of the Times." Without going further into detail respecting the Bishop Cotton's preface, we may say that it is a very useful addition to his work, and a feature of it which distinguishes it from most collections of sermons. The sermons themselves are frequently accompanied by brief notes, which illustrate the preacher's literary and critical tastes.

As for the sermons themselves, it is quite impossible that we should give here anything like an analysis of them. In general, we may say that they are the reverent utterances of an enlightened Christian student, who aims not only to understand and to explain, but to apply to the hearts and consciences of men the texts on which he preaches. They are not remarkable as specimens of rhetorical effort or fervid imagination, neither do they enter largely into abstruse questions and philosophical speculations, but they touch very often upon practical topics, without being dry, and they develop great practical truths. They show that the preacher admires and honours the arrangements of his Church, but they have not an ecclesiastical air which limits the usefulness of many sermons. The combination of the intellectual and spiritual elements not only fits them for private perusal, but raises them considerably above the level of average discourses. Almost any of them might be appealed to as an illustration of these remarks. Take the second, for example, on the Holy Scriptures. The text is Romans xv. 4. The introduction speaks of the arrangement of the Advent services and their intention, explains the context of the text, paraphrases the text, and deduces its practical lessons. The lessons are three, and are considered in order. 1. The text of Scripture—"Not to teach us astronomy or geology, but to make us rich in hope, and unto salvation, to give us patience and comfort for the trials of life, through the promise of God's blessing." 2. The spirit in which Scripture must be read—"We must read in the spirit of Christian charity, and unfeigned love of the brethren;" "it is God's own

* Expository Sermons on the Epistles for the Sundays of the Christian Year; preached to various English Congregations in India. By George Edward Lynch Cotton, D.D., Bishop of Calcutta. Two vols. Millan and Co.

The Adoption and other Sermons, preached in the Cathedral Church of Chester. By the Rev. Hugh M'Neile, D.D., Canon Residentiary, and Incumbent of St. Paul's, Prince's-park, Liverpool. James Millan and Co.

of St. John's original text. For this he gives four reasons: First, that the words were found in any ancient manuscript or translation; second, that they are not quoted in controversies on the Trinity; third, that they are alien from the context; fourth, modern critical divines of eminence own them to be spurious. He then proceeds to the means by which the words obtained admission to the sacred text. The sermon consists of the paraphrase and practical lessons. We say nothing of the use of the word "water" in this text to Christian baptism, but we quite agree with the tenor of the discourse. By the way, we do not like to see "the baptism through which Christ passed He instituted also for us;" we prefer the old form, "passed."

We are fully prepared to commend this work highly, on religious as well as literary grounds, but we must not be supposed to endorse everything in it. It would be to select a number of opinions and expressions with which we cannot concur. On the point already referred to, that of baptism, although his views are more moderate than those of many men, we should not agree with Bishop Cotton. In fact, he is hindered by this, or he would scarcely refer to a well-known passage in 1 Peter as "showing that baptism may be a saving ordinance, the faith and conscience of the baptised must respond to God's mercy." If faith must believe and conscience must feel the reality of God's mercy, baptism can hardly be called a saving ordinance in any proper sense, but rather owe our salvation to the Divine mercy. The remarkable parallel passage, Titus 3, seems quite to support our view. However, we repeat that the Bishop's notions of baptismal regeneration are very modified, compared with what some men teach, and he distinguishes baptism from conversion, the reality of which as a spiritual work he recognises. There are so many admirable things in these sermons, that we should say a word to discourage any one from perusing them. Addressed as they were to Christian audiences in India, they were consciously spoken to men of intelligent education for the most part. To such we recommend them. But while they may be profitable to the intelligent laity, they will prove to ministers of the Gospel both interesting and useful.

We now turn to the volume of Canon McNeile, which, as we said, resembles the preceding. It resembles them, inasmuch as it is the utterance of a reverent and devout faith; and is designed for the instruction and edification of the people. But it differs from them in being what we may call less critical and literary, and in the prominence of religious emotions and sympathies. Thoroughly good as Bishop Cotton's sermons are, these are more completely within the range and sphere of the experience of pious Evangelical believers. The others are more fitted for the ear of the generality of Christians. Dr. McNeile himself very well and truly says: "These sermons were preached and are published 'as a help to those who believe that the Scriptures were written by apostles and prophets were given by inspiration of God. They are not evidential nor defensive, but rather expository.'" He regards the inspiration of Scripture as abundantly proved, and thinks that difficulties and apparent discrepancies are due to the errors of translators and transcribers, or because of our inconclusive expositors. These and other remarks in the preface are well worthy of attention, and should be read, as showing the grounds upon which the author takes his stand. It is less to say that the teachings of the book are thoroughly Evangelical and conservative.

The sermons are sixteen in number. Three of them are upon the subject of the Christian life; two treat of the Christianity of the Old Testament saints; then follow three on the subject of zeal and prayer, and the exposure of idolatry; next come two on practical views of the Trinity; the remaining six are entitled—The House of God; The priest (two parts); Living unto Christ; The birthright; and, The Word of God always effective.

ry of the subjects will show that the discourses are upon popular and useful themes ; and easy to perceive, on a perusal of the book, that the style and treatment are in harmony with the topics. It would be possible to point out passages or sentences which are unduly or verbose, and which could have been made more elegant without weakening them. Much of the language is plain and simple and direct. Everywhere it is the earnest scholar, zealous for his Master and for souls. The Protestant element is also conspicuous in one of the sermons, where allusion is made to Romish corruptions. These discourses are excellent specimens of Christian ministerial fidelity.

FOREIGN.

In the wars and rumours of wars which are now taking place all over the Continent, the position taken up by France is singular, and unlike her former character. The boast of the Emperor Louis Napoleon has hitherto been that he had raised France to the same commanding influence by peaceful means which she reached under his uncle by war ; so that no change should take place among the countries of Europe except with her permission—no revolution be tolerated without her sanction. But now we behold the spirit of war, rebellion, and conquest has broken out in central Europe to which France has nothing to offer—which she refuses to endeavour to arrest, and has no influence to regulate. Events are rapidly taking place of the gravest importance, such as a few years ago would have roused the whole country to warlike sentiments ; yet now France stands by with folded hands, and her ruler ostentatiously retires from the seat of empire and seeks the enjoyments of seclusion. It is felt that there is something strange and almost unnatural in this state of things ; and without ascribing to the French Emperor that profound foresight and calm serenity which some of his admirers believe him to possess, we cannot but think that, though quiet, he is by no means an indifferent observer of the strange events now taking place in Europe, and that he may hereafter seek to turn them to his own account. But in the meantime, while the country is in the enjoyment of profound peace, in the Church, as the letter of our correspondent shows, ecclesiastical elements are at work under the surface. As usual, good and evil struggle for the mastery, and with varied success.

The vitality of Italian Protestantism is apparent from this, that in spite of bitter internal dissensions, it grows. If so much has been done in the face of mutual opposition, how much more would be accomplished if the disputants could afford to waive their differences, and make common cause against the Papacy, which grows at their divisions. But we do not forget that God has His own way of educating His children, and that this bitter trial, as it seems to those standing at a distance, may really be the most appropriate discipline for the Italian churches to attain to ultimate concord, stability, and success. As throwing light on this question, the letter of our correspondent is of more than usual interest. The Gospel spreads in the most striking manner ; like the light which is its type, it finds access into many an obscure nook and corner, vivifying and quickening where before all was darkness and death. As the Italians show an unreasonable opposition to a regular ministry, there is this to be said in excuse for them—that they have suffered more than most people from priestcraft.

The unfortunate war between the German Powers and Denmark has again been renewed ; and this time we may hope the suspension will issue in peace. There is some reason to believe that the late Conference in London was put an end to by the Danes from hopes they had conceived that the other Powers in Europe must come to their rescue. When it was made clear to them, by the debates in the English Parliament and by the attitude of France and Russia, that none of the Great Powers were disposed to go to war on their behalf, and that the only result of a continuation of hostilities was to sustain still her losses at the hands of their conquerors, the Danish King changed his Ministers, and, coming into direct relations with his enemies, sued for peace. The three Powers lately so busy are now engaged settling the terms of pacification at Vienna ; and as none of the other European States would meddle in the war, they are not invited to join in settling the terms of peace. The French Government is in evident ill-humour at being thus shut from all advice in an important negotiation, and it may perhaps be from this circumstance.

stance that so many rumours abound of disputes having arisen among the Germans themselves as to the conditions to which Denmark shall be called to submit. We can only hope that in this hour of their triumph the conquerors may remember mercy; and that the terms they insist upon will not be found unworthy of one Christian people to ask, and another to accept. It will be seen from the letter of our correspondent, that he shares in the jealousy with which the Federated States regard the conduct of Prussia and Austria in the matter. But until more is known than has yet been allowed to transpire, it is useless to speculate upon the obligations which are to be imposed on Denmark, and the advantages, if any, which accrue to Germany. There is more satisfaction in referring to the religious movements to which he directs our attention. It will be seen that the Church in Hanover has been able, in a large degree, to emancipate itself from the control of the Government and to obtain a popular constitution. The arrangement, indeed, is hardly one in which Christians in this country would rejoice; for while, as in England, every person is presumed to be a member of the Church, unlike England, every person avails himself of the privilege, and thinks he is entitled to control and regulate the affairs of the Church, though perhaps he may never enter it. An irreligious democracy may work as much harm to a church as an irreligious Minister of State; but the movement itself is a sign of life; and where there is life the Church will work itself clear of impurities in due time. With still greater satisfaction we refer to the association in Berlin for church building, of which Prussia, according to our correspondent, is in great need.

The letter of our Constantinople correspondent will be read with great interest, from the light it tends to throw upon the news which the telegraph has more recently transmitted to this country, and which has been published in all the newspapers. Only a few days ago we were startled with the information that the Porte had closed the establishments of the Protestant missions in Turkey, though they had subsequently allowed the American mission and the Bible Society's agents to resume their labours. If anything could have added to the interest of this intelligence, it was its abruptness. The world at large, which was hardly prepared for the information that the operations of Protestants carried on there were considerable enough to attract the attention of the ruling powers, were surprised to be told that the Protestant movement among the Turks continued, when they did not know that had so much as begun. But the letter of our correspondent will go far to make the matters clear, as it shows those elements in the germ which have since burst forth so strongly. We can understand from our correspondent's letter how the awakening among Turkish converts should have been cunningly twisted into a political movement, in which the name of the Grand Vizier himself is implicated. We shall await with considerable curiosity the issue of these events. If there be any truth in the report that the Sultan has been petitioned to make certain reforms in the present state of traditional Mohammedanism, we may be sure that it is not the work of the missionaries, though it is quite possible it may be the influence of their teaching, acting upon outside listeners, who have not "received the truth in the love of it." But any awakening in the dull, apathetic, and stationary character of the Turkish intellect must be attended with important consequences.

The accounts from America continue to be of the same afflicting nature as they have been for the last three years. The combatants are animated with the greatest ferocity against each other, and outrage leads wherever it is possible to retaliation. In the late movements of the Federal armies for the capture of Richmond, the road to Maryland was left open; and a body of Confederates taking advantage of the unguarded gap, dashed through, crossed the Potomac, threatened for a time Baltimore on one side, and Washington itself on the other; burnt down the residences of some eminent Federals in revenge of similar outrages committed on leading Confederates in Virginia; and finally retired within their own lines, laden, say the newspapers, with immense spoil, which, of course, means that they have swept off the property of unoffending inhabitants over a widely-extended district. It is noticed, as significant, that the inhabitants of the neighbouring States did not respond to the call for militia so promptly as they once did—in fact, the proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania reproaches the people for their apathy, and some hopes of returning peace are built on that circumstance. A more important incident has occurred in the State of New York. Some time ago General Dix, acting under the immediate authority of President Lincoln, took forcible possession of two New York newspapers, and temporarily suppressed them. This was an undoubted violation of the rights of the State, and Governor Seymour has directed the prosecution of the General, which has been proceeded with, in spite of the instructions sent the President to General Dix, directing him to deny the jurisdiction of the State courts in the matter. Governor Seymour has called out the militia to defend the rights of the State, and there is the possibility of a collision between the central authority and the most powerful State in the Union. But all this tends not to the restoration of peace, but to farther confusion, distraction, and war.

A letter from a correspondent in Africa, bearing the honoured name of Moffat, is here to be read with interest. It will be found to detail in simple but clear language the obstacles which the missionary finds in his way when he attempts to spread the Gospel among savage tribes under a despotic, self-willed ruler. It is matter for thankfulness that the hearts of the chiefs are, upon the whole, so favourably inclined to the propagation of principles which condemn, and must eventually put down, their own most cherished practices; while the mass of ignorance and heathendom the missionaries have to strive against might well cause any one to despair who had not a vivid sense of the all-conquering truths of the Gospel. In connexion with this letter, it is not out of place to mention that the brother-in-law of the writer, Dr. Livingstone, has returned to this country, checked in his philanthropic plans for the moment, but indomitable in his resolution to work, and to exert, and labour for the benefit of the benighted and oppressed African.

H O M E.

The ecclesiastical business of the Parliamentary session that is about to close has not been of a very important character. The legislation of the previous year, which empowered county magistrates, if they chose, to appoint and pay Roman Catholic chaplains to the prisons under their control—a power, by the way, which the majority of the magistrates have declined to exercise—remains as it was. There was an impression abroad that Sir George Grey meant to supplement that measure by a clause in his new Prisons' Bill, which would have enabled the Home Secretary to overrule the decisions of the magistrates, and to appoint Romish chaplains, in defiance of their veto. This threatened to destroy what was otherwise a valuable bill. Sir George Grey, however, prudently withdrew the clause, when, of course, the opposition was abandoned. In the Upper House, the Duke of Buccleuch introduced, and managed to carry through, a measure which has accomplished an object the Scottish Episcopalians have long set their hearts upon—a union with the Church of England. By the bill, the bishops of the English Church are empowered to institute to any living in England a clergyman who has received ordination at the hands of a Scottish bishop. The measure was regarded with a good deal of jealousy, mainly on account of the semi-Romish character of the Scotch Episcopal Church, and the Tractarian sympathy which the measure itself elicited; but the opposition never assumed a definite form. A different exception, however, awaited another measure introduced and supported by High Churchmen. The Bishop of Oxford introduced a bill by which it was proposed to hold Divine service in such public grammar-schools in towns as are generally known as King Edward VI. schools, which it should be compulsory on the scholars to attend, and to which their parents and friends would not be admitted. The bill passed, not altogether without opposition, the Upper House; but on its reaching the Lower, several objections were urged, among which not the least forcible was, that, as it stood, it would practically exclude from such schools all those children of Dissenters whose parents were not willing that they should attend the Established Church; and it was ultimately determined that the matter should stand over for further consideration next session.

The meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, at Edinburgh, in the course of last month, proved to be one of great interest. Representatives of all the Evangelical churches in this country, and of many in foreign lands, were present on the occasion; and the subjects brought under discussion were of deep and general importance. The harmony that prevailed upon the different subjects was the more remarkable, as many of them related to questions of practical life, on which variety of sentiment might fairly have been looked for. A pretty full abstract of the proceedings will be found in other pages, from which those who attended the meeting will, no doubt, be glad to refresh their recollection of the pleasant meetings in which they participated; while those of our readers who could not attend will be able to see how successfully the Alliance pursues its operations.

The Oxford Clerical Declaration is being followed by one of a somewhat analogous character from the students of the natural sciences. It has already received the signatures of several of our most distinguished natural philosophers, and what we still more to be expected, it has encountered the strenuous remonstrance and unconcealed anger of those of their number who sympathise with the views of Bishop Colenso. The favourite form which this opposition at present takes is to sneer at the scientific standing of the subscribers, though the published names ought to be enough to silence all marks on that score. The movement is an important one. Modern sceptics profess to draw their choicest weapons from the armoury of physical science; and a declaration signed by the most profound students in that science, that there is not in their apprehensions any discordance between Scripture and nature, will be as timely as it is true.

Bishop Crowther, the first negro bishop of the Anglican Church, took his departure for the scene of his labours, on the banks of the Niger, by the last West African mail. He had previously made a tour through part of the manufacturing districts, where his presence and the earnestness of his address excited a warm interest in himself and in the object which he devotes his life. That interest, we believe we may state, is not confined to the Episcopal communion, but pervades all Evangelical denominations. In connexion with the bishop's departure we may record here a graceful act attending his consecration, which will be remembered, took place last month, in Canterbury Cathedral, at the same time with the consecration of Dr. Jeune, as Bishop of Peterborough, and Dr. Bromley, as Bishop of Tasmania. Dr. Jeune was presented to the Archbishop by the Bishops of Lincoln and Winchester; Dr. Bromley by the colonial bishops, Dr. Smith, of Hong Kong, and his own predecessor, Dr. Nixon, late of Tasmania; and the colonial bishops were also to have presented Dr. Crowther; but when it came to his turn, the Bishop of Winchester, apparently acting on the impulse of the moment, waived the colonial bishops aside, and he and the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol led up their sable brother in Christ to the Archbishop. The feeling which dictated this graceful act of welcome was heartily appreciated by every Christian heart.

One or two other slight but significant incidents, connected with the Church of England in the course of the month, deserve a passing notice. The first of them refers to the publications of Bishop Colenso, and curiously illustrates the distractions of the present time. Among the numerous answers which the bishop's work has called forth, one is an anonymous publication—all the information deigned of the author being, that he is "A Layman." The book, however, commanded a good deal of attention, one main cause of which was that it was dedicated, "by permission," to the Archbishop of York. But on examination, it turns out that the layman was not more orthodox in his views than the bishop, as one of the fundamental positions of his volume is, that the books which pass under the authorship of Moses were much of them written by authors long subsequent to the time. And as the book was dedicated "by permission" to the Archbishop, it was not natural to infer that he approved of the views thus put forth. From a correspondence that has just been published, we find that the Archbishop explicitly declares that he does not approve of these opinions, and adds that, though dedicated to him, he had never read the work. It is to be supposed that his Grace will be more cautious of permitting dedications for the future. The other is a correspondence that has passed between the Earl of Shaftesbury and the Principal of St. Aidan's College, Cheshire. It appears that the principal had intimated that Wesleyan ministers would be received into the college, with a view to episcopal orders, without any preliminary examination. The Earl was justly indignant at this method of touting for candidates for the Church, combined with what seems very like an insult to the Wesleyan body, and he remonstrated with the principal on the subject. The reply of the principal was so unsatisfactory, that Lord Shaftesbury has withdrawn his name from the list of the vice-presidents of the college.

The Joint Committee on Union of the Free and the United Presbyterian Churches held a meeting a few days ago. In accordance with the resolutions passed at the respective Synods, deputations of the English Presbyterians and of the Reformed Presbyterians (known in Scotland as the Cameronians) attended the meeting, and expressed their wish to enter into arrangements for a general union of all the churches. The presence of these deputations was hailed with great pleasure by the original committee. The members then proceeded to the consideration of the various points submitted to them. It will be remembered that at their former meeting differences prevailed respecting the powers of the civil magistrate in matters of religion. It was, therefore, with much pleasure they found after a full and free interchange of opinion, that no difference whatever prevailed on those doctrines which constitute the marrow of Christianity—those on the fall of man, on sin and its punishment—on God's covenant with man, and on Christ as the Mediator between God and man. The committee then adjourned till November next.

DR. NEWMAN'S APOLOGIA.

THE history of his religious opinions which Dr. John Henry Newman has seen fit to publish, in reply to Mr. Kingsley, is one of the most deeply-interesting books which have appeared in our day. There is a native grandeur in the religious emotions which affects every mind not incurably frivolous; and when an original man, one whose intellect is more keen and vehement, whose feelings are more intense, than those of ordinary persons, is profoundly imbued with religion, the spectacle constrains attention. The religion of Dr. Newman has always been sincere, and its intensity has been in proportion to the natural force and capacity of his mind. It has not, we must firmly though humbly declare, been pure and undefiled; it has been tainted with fanaticism, and darkened by superstition; in its latest development, it is open to the charge of idolatry; but it was always genuine; it was void of affectation, of hypocrisy, of levity; it was not debased by selfishness, or made the slave of vanity, and its impassioned earnestness lent exaltation to the character which it distinguished. It is only the worldling—the man who lounges indifferently through life, taking what pleasure he can find, and never rising, on the wings of moral aspiration, above the dust from which he sprung—that is contemptible. He who, though with shortcoming and aberration, does on the whole live as in the great Taskmaster's eye, and perpetually realises, by faith, those things which are unseen and eternal, will, in all times and circumstances, command the respect of men. "Him who honoureth me I will honour:" the promise is fulfilled in the case of all who, with wholeness of heart, serve God according to the light they have. Dr. Newman said in his youth, at a moment when death seemed to be looking him in the face, that he had not "sinned against light;" and far, and sinfully, as we believe him to have since gone astray, this book affords conclusive proof that he has never adopted any opinion, or taken any step, for which he had not, at the time, the approval of his own conscience. That, in these circumstances, he should have passed from a Church of the Reformation into a Church which he long believed to be Antichrist, presents one of those mysterious and melancholy problems, intimately connected with the characteristics of our time, which are fraught with peculiar instruction for thinking minds.

One or two words—the matter unquestionably deserves no more—may be devoted in passing to the special dispute between Dr. Newman and Mr. Kingsley. Candour compels us to admit that the latter was, strictly speaking, in the wrong, though his error may be pardoned, nay, almost commended. Mr. Kingsley, as all the world knows, is impulsive and impetuous, quick in arriving at conclusions and unguarded in their expression, with a passion for straight-forwardness, an instinctive hatred of Jesuitry, casuistry, and everything in the remotest degree resembling these. His good and his bad qualities unfit him for understanding complicated and subtle processes in the intellectual or spiritual life—for distinguishing between hesitation and insincerity, between doubt and deceitfulness, between clinging affection for old opinions, after they have in fact lost their hold on the mind, and designing or hypocritical concealment of new. We shall not blame his English hatred of equivocation, his inability to listen to what seems a plea for falsehood, his invincible detestation for arts like those of Loyola and arguments like those of Liguori. But we are bound to acknowledge, in behalf of Dr. Newman, that an opinion may be gradually changed, and yet honestly changed; nay, that the sincerity with which it was at first accepted will commonly measure the slowness of gradation by which the change is effected. The true-hearted strong-minded, and earnest man will so slowly relax his grasp of principle once firmly held, that others may be unable to say of him, for a time whether his beliefs are the old beliefs or the new. Dr. Newman was a sincere and decided Anglican ; he is now a sincere and decided Roman Catholic. He took many a year to traverse the bridge between the two ; and there were months, if not years, when it could hardly be said, either by himself or others, whether he stood the Romish or the Anglican slope. That is the simple truth, and it leaves his personal character for honesty unimpaired. The more general charge of counselling and defending the practice of equivocation, as advocated by Liguori and other Romish writers, can be established against Dr. Newman. He pleads his zeal and ingenuity on behalf of those apostles of his adopted Church. It may be admitted, however, that the task does not appear to be congenial to him, and that, but for his loyalty to Rome, he would never have attempted it. It is with him a point of honour to defend Romish lying. His own tendency has, from his boyhood, been to say and do extreme things, and he avows that he prefers the outspoken character of Englishmen to the subtle character of Italians. "As to the Catholic religion in the present day," he exclaims in words which do him credit, "this only will I observe, that the truest expedience is answer right out, when you are asked ; that the wisest economy is to have no management ; that the best prudence is not to be a coward ; that the most damaging falsehood is to be found out shuffling ; and that the first of virtues is to 'tell truth, and shun the devil?'"

It may be worth while to ask whether the Protestant eye is absolutely clear in this matter of lying. Dr. Newman is not prepared to assert that it is in all cases wrong to equivocate, and good Protestants are scandalised by the avowal. But if all speaking of falsehood for a purpose is to be condemned—and, for our part, we do not hesitate to condemn it—Dr. Newman is no solitary culprit in defending the practice. Take three of the most popular and influential writers in England during the last thirty years—Dickens, Thackeray, Carlyle. Each of them would be pronounced emphatically English, and each of them would be allowed to be frankly, veraciously. But Mr. Dickens indites, in one of his most careful books, a brief prose lyric in praise of those falsehoods which, being uttered from motives of kindness, bear the soul, he says, as on angel's wings, towards heaven ; Mr. Thackeray makes the nobleness of one of his favourite female characters, the little Sister, turn on concealment of the truth, if not on actual perjury ; and Mr. Carlyle, whose words are in great part composed of a running shriek of horror against lying, makes little or nothing of mean and barefaced lies, when brought home to his last and strangest heroes, Frederick the Great and his father. Mr. Carlyle's definition of truthfulness would probably now be, that it consists in acting and speaking according to the facts of nature and the conditions of life, rather than in verbal description of things as they are ; but so long as our most applauded writers play fast and loose with lying, we shall hardly be in a position to deal at once sternly, honestly, and moderately with the casuists of Rome. We have been detained too long, however, from the principal subject.

John Henry Newman was from early boyhood the subject of religious convictions ; but, associated with the very beginnings of his religious life, we find a susceptibility to vague imaginative impressions, than which nothing could be more apt to obscure the reason, and to substitute emotion for conscience. The light of his mind was never the "dry light" of the Baconian philosophy ; it was always tinted the splendour, or shadowed by the gloom, of "the cave"—with the sympathies or the antipathies of a marked and singular idiosyncrasy. During his schooldays he used to "wish the Arabian Tales were true." His imagination "ran on unknown influences, on magical powers, and talismans." He thought that life was perhaps a dream, that he might be "an angel," and all the world a deceptive scene peopled by angels, who, by "a playful device," concealed themselves from him, and "deceived him with the semblance of a material world." He was "very superstitious," and used to cross himself on going into the dark. He had at the time, however, no knowledge of, or tendency towards, the Church of Rome.

At the age of fifteen, a great change took place in his spiritual condition. He came under the influence of Calvinistic preaching and Calvinistic writings. He received into his intellect "impressions of dogma, which, through God's mercy, have never been effaced or obscured." He read a work of Romaine's, whose title he has forgotten, but it was the means of what he believes to have been his conversion. It taught him the doctrine of the perseverance of saints. "I received it (the doctrine) at once," he says, "and believed that the inward conversion of which I was conscious (and of which I still am more conscious than that I have hands and feet), would last into the next life, and that I was elected to eternal glory." Henceforward he rested "in the thought of two, and two only, supreme and luminously self-evident beings," himself and his Creator.

This is a most important passage. What was the basis of dogma on which Dr. Newman at this time set his foot? Was it not this—that there is one God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and that man is saved by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ? So far as the drift of his book enables us to judge, the question may be confidently answered in the affirmative. And if so, may we not make bold to put another question. Has Dr. Newman really abandoned, as the anchor of his soul, the apprehension of the Gospel which he, at this time, formed? He has seemed to wander far from it; he has appeared to exalt God's temple, the Church, over Him who dwells therein; he has learned, at the bidding of earthly guides, to invoke saints and to impute miraculous efficacy to relics; but we have an assured confidence that, if he were laid on a bed of sickness, and knew himself to be about to meet his Creator, Church and Virgin, Saints and relics, would recede into the background, and he would cling for salvation to that Jesus, and to that Jesus alone, who was first brought nigh unto him by the instrumentality of Romaine. One reason we have for entertaining this belief, additional to the devout fervour which pervades his work, is that he invariably explains what are called—and rightly called—the idolatrous practices of Rome, in a way which would render them, to say the least, not fatal to the life of the soul. The "worship" of Mary and the Saints, so far as he in his heart approves it, is little or nothing more than the reverent affection with which all men ought to regard the memory of the great and good. Observe, we do not assert that the defence of Mariolatry and saint-worship which he puts forward is tenable, or that he succeeds in rebutting the charge brought against the Church of Rome, that she imperils the salvation of immortal souls. We speak of the personal religion of Dr. Newman; and in reference to it, the hope may, we think, be entertained, that beneath all the adhesions and obscurations of his adopted Romanism, the spiritual life of his soul has remained unextinguished. God grant that, in this, we may not be mistaken!

Dr. Newman was still in his earliest manhood, and had been at Oxford only long enough to accept, with more than the usual fervour of neophytes, the traditions and influences of the place, when the simplicity of his early belief began to offend him, and the idea of the Church to occupy a higher place in his imagination than the idea of the truth. One by one those doctrines which exalt the instrumentality of the Church in saving the soul—apostolical succession, baptismal regeneration, supernatural efficacy of the sacraments—took possession of his mind. These would naturally prepare him to submit his private judgment to the decisions of the Church. The sacred society had, in his view, been made the repository of Divine grace, had been endowed with awful powers, and was the dispenser of eternal life. Fascinated by the Church, his eye was drawn gradually away from the Bible. Dr. Hawkins, now Provost of Oriel College, Oxford, persuaded him that the text of Scripture "was never intended to teach doctrine, but only to prove it, and that, if we would learn doctrine, we must have recourse to the formularies of the Church; for instance, to the Catechism and to the Creeds." This is, in a sense, true. Scripture does not lay down theological propositions in systematic form. But in so far as the view of Dr. Hawkins and his disciple implies that the Church has a right, independently of Scripture, to construct catechisms or creeds, it is false and dangerous. Its practical result, in the case of Dr. Newman, was to open a door for the admission of Tradition, as interpreted by the Church, is almost or altogether on a level with Scripture; to induce him to withdraw his support from the Bible Society; and, on the whole, to undermine his reverence for the Word of God as the fountain-head of Christian theology.

A healthier influence was exerted upon him soon afterwards by Dr. Whately. "He," says Dr. Newman, "emphatically opened my mind, and taught me to think and to use my reason." But between the shrewd, practical, somewhat hard and prosaic mind of Whately and his own there was a radical dissimilarity, and he soon turned to the more congenial fellowship of John Keble and Hurrell Froude.

Dr. Newman pronounces Keble the "true and primary author" of the Tractarian movement, and in this he may be correct, but the information he affords us of Keble's connexion with the beginnings of Tractarianism is meagre. The "Christian Year" appeared in 1827, and Dr. Newman dates the commencement of the movement in 1833; nor is it easy to discern in those hymns, so unfeignedly devout, so chastely beautiful, so deeply imbued with those sympathies of the Christian life which are felt by all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in simplicity, the announcement or prelude of Tractarianism. They are pervaded, however, by enthusiasm for the Church and for the sacramental system; and we can well imagine that, in the circle which hung around Keble at the university, attracted by his brilliant reputation and the fascination of his society, the talk would be frequently of these things. The beginning of religious and intellectual movements consists in the preparation of young minds rather than in the promulgation of specific dogmas, and Dr. Newman is, therefore, in all probability, right in saying that Keble did more than any other man to prepare the atmosphere of Oxford for "the movement."

Judging by what Dr. Newman lays before us in this narrative, we should say that the friend whose influence upon him was most direct and potent was Hurrell Froude. With him he was on terms of the closest and most affectionate intimacy for about seven years. He describes Froude as a man of high genius, of elastic force and versatility of mind, bold in speculation, yet critical and logical, and "brimful and overflowing with ideas." The statement of his opinions given by Dr. Newman is startling, from the revelation it makes of the extent to which Popish views had penetrated the Church of England before a single Tract had been published, and before the "children of the movement" had got either a name or a nickname. Hurrell Froude, according to Dr. Newman, "professed openly his admiration of the Church of Rome, and his hatred of the Reformation. He delighted in the notion of an hierarchical system, of sacerdotal power, and of his will clerical liberty. He felt scorn of the maxim, 'The Bible, and the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants;' and he gloried in accepting tradition as a main instrument of religious teaching. He had a high, severe idea of the intrinsic excellence of virginity; and he considered the Blessed Virgin its great pattern. He delighted in the lives of the Saints; he had a keen appreciation of the idea of sanctity, its possibility and its heights; and he was more than inclined to believe a large amount of miraculous interference as occurring in the early and middle ages. He embraced the principle of penance and mortification. He had a deep devotion to the Real Presence, in which he had a firm faith. He was powerfully drawn to the Medieval Church, but not to the Primitive." We presume that Hurrell Froude did not know the supremacy of the Pope over the Church of England, but we can imagine no other point in which he would not have been an exemplary Roman Catholic. "He was smitten," says Dr. Newman, "with the love of the theocratic Church." It is evident that his friend and admirer caught the infection.

Predisposed in their favour by intercourse with Froude and Keble, Newman proceeded, about 1830, to read certain of the early fathers, and an engagement to write on the Council of Nicaea led him to study the history of the Church in the ages preceding the great Arian controversy. These pursuits did not tend to give clearness or precision to his theological ideas. The vague magnificence of the Alexandrian writers enthralled his imagination, and seemed the response to ideas which he had long cherished. It was as music to his inward ear when Origen or Clement discoursed of the external world, physical and historical, as "but the outward manifestation of realities greater than itself." He rejoiced to tender them his assent when they declared that nature was a parable, that Scripture was an allegory, that the visible world has a Divine interpretation, could man but find it out, and that "Holy Church, in her sacraments and her hierarchical appointments, will remain, even to the end of the world, only a symbol of those heavenly facts which will endure eternally." From them he learned, also, to believe that the economy of the visible world is carried on by angels, and that "every breath of air and ray of light and heat, every beautiful prospect, is, as it were, the skirts of their garments, the waving of the robes of those whose faces see God." This may pass for sublime, but Dr. Newman, whether conducted by his Alexandrian guides or trusting to his own fancy, took another step, which brought him at once to the ridiculous. He believed that a middle race of beings, neither so pure as the angels, which animate flower and gem, nor so bad as the diabolic tenants of hell, partially fallen, capricious, wayward, but with touches of nobleness, "gave a sort of inspiration or intelligence to races, nations, and classes of men." The guardian imp of England is called John Bull; and "it seems" to Dr. Newman "that John Bull is a spirit neither of heaven nor hell." Such were the speculations by which Dr. Newman was prepared for inaugurating the Tractarian movement. The "dry light" of Bacon is here decidedly conspicuous by its absence.

The world around Newman, meanwhile, was not dreaming. While he held converse with Clement and Origen, and regarded visible phenomena as allegories to be mystically interpreted, the agitation of the Reform Bill period sounded in the air. Liberalism presented itself to his mind as the polar opposite of all he saw in the earlier centuries of the Christian era; and the Anglican Establishment, divided, threatened, perplexed, with liberalism storming in upon her, seemed to call on him to arise as her champion, to demonstrate her unity with the Church Catholic and Apostolic, and to vindicate her freedom. "She must be dealt with strongly"—such were his feelings at the period, "or she would be lost. There was need of a second Reformation."

Hurrell Froude and his father. Excited by his Alexandrian studies, and burning with fierce hatred for liberalism, he was exactly in a state to receive the full influence of his friend's Anglican Popery. He parted with the Froudes at Rome, and proceeded to Sicily. The various notions which had been floating like thunder-clouds in the sultry atmosphere of his mind now shaped themselves into something like a definite result. "When I was left by myself," he says, "the thought came upon me that deliverance is wrought, not by the many, but by the few, not by bodies, but by persons. Now it was, I think, that I repeated to myself the words, which had been dear to me from my school-days, Exoriaris aliquis!—now, too, that Southey's beautiful poem of Thalaba, for which I had an immense liking, came forcibly to my mind. I began to think that I had a mission. . . . Towards the end of May I set off for Palermo, taking three days for the journey. Before starting from my inn, in the morning of May 26 or 27, I sat down on my bed, and began to sob bitterly. My servant, who had acted as my nurse, asked what ailed me. I could only answer, 'I have a work to do in England.' On his way home he was in a state of feverish excitement, "writing verses all the time." On the Sunday after his arrival, July 14, 1833, he heard Mr. Keble preach in the University pulpit. The sermon was published under the title of "National Apostasy." It chimed in with Newman's thoughts and purposes, and he "has ever considered and kept the day as the start of the religious movement of 1833." It was henceforward the grand aim of his life to effect a second Reformation in the Church of England, a Reformation whose main object should be to undo the effects of the first.

The essential part of what remains of the history of Dr. Newman's religious opinions can be briefly stated. Commencing the editorship, and to a large extent the authorship, of the "Tracts for the Times," he endeavoured to prove that the Church of England, resting on Antiquity and Apostolical Succession, was as old as, along with the Greek and Latin communions, a branch of the Church Catholic, and that she ought to hold communion with her eastern and western sisters; while the so-called Churches of the Reformation were mere nests of Lutheran or Calvinistic schismatics, with whom she ought to have no communion whatever. The movement proceeded triumphantly for about half-a-dozen years. Newman, looked upon as a devoted and effective defender of the Church of England, admired, revered, followed by the ardent youth of Oxford, fascinating the religious community within the Church by his glowing yet classical eloquence, and laying the spell of his earnestness on all who came within his personal influence, seemed in a fair way of "riding over" his opponents "as Othniel"—the words are his own—"prevailed over Chushan-rishathaim, King of Mesopotamia."

One thing only remained to be done, and that one thing could be dared only by the most resolute, thoroughgoing, and intrepid of the leaders of the movement. It had to be shown that the Thirty-nine Articles, the stronghold of Anglican Protestantism, could be accepted in a Roman Catholic sense. The task of constructing an argument to this effect was stupendous; but Newman was not appalled. He wrote Tract 90, which must ever remain one of the most marvellous pieces of logical and rhetorical ingenuity known to man; whether the ingenuity displayed is of the kind which obscures, or of the kind which discovers truth, it may be more pleasant not to decide. "How can you manage," asked Dr. Newman's friends, "to sign the Articles? They are directly against Rome?" He "proceeded to make distinctions"—these are his words—and, on the strength of those distinctions, to affirm that the Articles might be conscientiously signed by men who viewed the Reformation with abhorrence. The first distinction taken was between the several meanings which might be attached to the words "Roman doctrine." They refer either to the Catholic teaching of the early centuries, to the formal dogmas of Rome as contained in the decrees of Council of Trent, or to the actual popular beliefs and usages of Roman Catholic countries. Dr. Newman endeavoured to prove that the Articles do not represent the Catholic teaching of the Roman Church, that they only partially condemn it in dogma, and that they for the most part oppose merely the dominant errors of everyday Romanism. As for the assertion that they were drawn up expressly against Popery, he made short work of it, by maintaining that the "Popery" they meant to oppose consisted solely of the pontifical supremacy over the Church and of that of the sovereigns of England. "Was I," he asks, "saying one single word in favour of the supremacy of the Holy See, of the foreign jurisdiction? . . . the supremacy of the Pope was the essence of the 'Popery' to which, at the time of the Articles, the Supreme Head or Governor of the English Church was so violently opposed." Considerable progress was thus made, but not sufficient for Dr. Newman's purpose. The next step was to affirm that the Articles were designed to gain converts. "What, then," says Dr. Newman, "was the best way to induce reluctant wavering minds, and these, I supposed, were the majority, to give in their assent to the new symbol? How had the Arians drawn up their creeds? Was it not on the principle of using vague, ambiguous language, which to subscribers would seem to bear a Catholic sense, but which, when worked out in the long run, would prove to be heterodox? Accordingly, there was at antecedent probability, that, fierce as the Articles might look at first sight, their bark would prove worse than their bite." If, then, it were possible to show that the very men who drew up the Articles had, in those Articles, avowed Papistical doctrines, the aim of Dr. Newman—to prove that they might be taken by persons agreeing on all questions of doctrine with Romanists would be accomplished. What says the 35th Article? "The second Book of Homilies doth contain a godly and wholesome doctrine, and necessary for these times, doth the former Book of Homilies." The doctrine, therefore, of the Homilies is the doctrine of the Articles, and the question of Romanism or Protestantism applies differently to both. Dr. Newman triumphantly enumerates twenty-six particulars in which the Homilies are Romish. They declare that the apocryphal Book of Daniel is the teaching of the Holy Ghost, and the apocryphal Book of Wisdom the "allible and undecivable Word of God"; that the Primitive Church "for almost 100 years" is, no doubt, most pure; that not only the holy Apostles and Disciples of Christ, but the godly Fathers, were endued with the Holy Ghost; that the meat in the sacrament is an invisible meat and a ghostly substance; that ordination and marriage are sacraments; and so on. The Homilies being accepted as "the best comment on the Articles," Dr. Newman had little difficulty in arriving at his conclusion that the Articles were "tolerant of a Catholic even a Roman interpretation."

Our readers, we dare say, are reminded by all this of the process by which the horse-chestnut was once proved to be a chestnut horse. The reasonings of Tract 90 had precisely that effect on the English public. The Tract was received, Dr. Newman informs us, with a "universal storm of indignation." The publication of the series came at once to an end. Dr. Newman, hitherto applauded as a champion of Anglicanism, was denounced as the deadliest enemy of his Church. "I saw indeed clearly," he says, "that my place in the movement was lost; public confidence was at end; my occupation was gone. It was simply an impossibility that I could say anything henceforth to good effect, when I had been posted up by the marshal on the buttery hedge of every college of my University, after the manner of discomfited pastry-cooks, and when in every part of the country and every class of society, through every organ and occasion of opinion, in newspapers, in periodicals, at meetings, in pulpits, at dinner-tables, coffee-rooms, in railway-carriages, I was denounced as a traitor who had laid train and was detected in the very act of firing it against the time-honoured establishment."

Dr. Newman admits that, a year or two before composing Tract 90, he experienced a doubt as to the ultimate tenability of the Anglican theory, but he was unfeignedly surprised at the reception of his attempt to show that the Articles might be taken in a Roman Catholic sense. Clinging still with heart and intellect to the Church of England, he was henceforward conscious of a terrible apprehension that he should one day quit her communion. He could not but see that Tract 90 was rejected, both by clergy and laity. The bishops condemned it in their charges. The religious public were scandalised by it. He found himself an object of suspicion and of observation. He was thus predisposed, though he knew it not, to be influenced by arguments in favour of Romanism which a dispassionate thinker would have felt to be inconceivably weak. The words of St. Augustine, "securus judicioris terrarum," the judgment of the whole world is right, wrought upon him like charm. The fact, important but irrelevant, that the early Church decided correctly against certain heretics, was imagined to be a proof that the Church of Rome decided justly against Protestants. The erection of the Jerusalem Bishopric, involving its discommunion on the part of the Church of England with Lutheran Prussia, was in his eyes a flagrant dereliction of principle, and contributed materially to his final determination. At length, on the 8th of October, 1845, he applied to Father Dominic, the Passionist, for admission into the Church of Rome. He had long sought rest, and now he found it, but it was the rest of the captive and of the slave. The day may yet come, though we cannot deem it probable, when he will burst prison house and break his chain.

Our space is exhausted. We have confined ourselves to tracing the stages of Newman's religious history as depicted by himself. The lessons which that history suggests, particularly in relation to the Church of England, deserve consideration and it may be of use to estimate the value of the arguments which he at the present time puts forward as establishing the truth of Romanism against the Protestant Churches. But of these on another occasion.

THE ETERNAL DURATION OF SPIRITUAL WORK.

THE quiet but firm assertion by the Lord Jesus of the permanent result of His Apostles' labours, "I have ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain," is one among many evidences of the Divine mission. And wonderfully has the course of history answered to this prediction. Eighteen hundred years have passed since these words were spoken. In that time the civilized world was filled by states and nations, religions and philosophies, institutions and laws, which bore every mark of durability. They have all vanished from the earth; they are neither living forces nor powers; the place that knew them knows them no more; they have all been swallowed up in the gulf of oblivion, and a new world covers the face of the East and Western Asia. Christianity alone survives. It has outlived races and empires, and all the ancient modes of thinking and living. And it is to-day the great and formative power in the whole world, the creative force which has shaped modern society, and it is steadily advancing to cover the earth. National and individual characters are powerful according to the measure in which they are

nity animate and govern them. It is the only religion which pretends to offer a rational theory of the origin, history, and destiny of humanity, and the only lamp which casts a single ray of light upon the darkness of the grave. Is it possible to doubt that the Eye which foresaw this triumph was Divine?

But on this page we desire to inscribe another truth, the explanation of the triumph just adverted to, and most cheering to all who are labouring in "the work of the Lord"—ALL SPIRITUAL WORK DONE UPON EARTH IS THE MANIFESTATION OF THE ETERNAL LIFE OF CHRIST IN GLORY.

The world contains work of two descriptions—the work wrought by man without God, and the fruit of the Spirit, or work "wrought in God." All things are full of labour; man cannot utter it, so inconceivably full of work is the world. Consider the works of man since time began, in the subjugation of the globe, in reducing its wilderness state to order and cultivation. Think of the work in changing one territory alone, such as England, from its primitive condition of wide-spreading forest, swamp, and oozy morass, into its present form of one exquisitely-enclosed farm or garden. Consider the works of men upon the materials furnished by nature from her surface or her depths—mineral, animal, or vegetable—the whole sum of human manufactures. Think of the labours of mankind in the fine arts, in architecture, sculpture, painting, and music; the unspeakable sum of human endeavours in literature; and, lastly, the untold amount of work expended on government, legislation, and war.

Of these labours many have been useful, many have been wicked; but none of them good in the religious sense, none of them spiritual, if they have not been wrought in God, and respected the Divine rule of action, or the religious nature of men.

The other description of work is spiritual, and consists of good works in the religious sense, including under that name the actions of common life done by good men, which therefore have become good works, the actions partaking of the quality of the actors; and that higher labour of an exclusively spiritual character, such as acting on the minds of men for God. Now, all spiritual work done on earth by Christ's disciples, whether it be action on matter or on mind, common life work or special religious labour, is the outgoing of the hidden life of Christ in glory. The branches bear fruit from vital union with the vine. They are "one spirit" with the Lord. The worker being animated by the Spirit of Christ dwelling in him, a "new" and "twice-born" man must be regarded as Christ's agent and instrument, a member of His body, of His flesh and of His bones," one of the organs of the all-handed Omnipotence. By far the larger proportion of the work of the world is the product simply of unreformed human nature, and therefore partakes in different degrees of the defective and positively corrupt character of the spirits from which it proceeds, varied in quality from the useful but simply mundane works of industry and scientific discovery, down to the worst crimes of the worst sinners. The better and smaller portion is wrought in God; by spirits in which God dwells—according to models and motives furnished by the inspiration of the Spirit of Christ, their redeeming and glorifying common life, or executing higher works for the spiritual benefit of men.

Christ's Spirit employs the truth as the means of His acting through and upon men, and nothing is of a more spiritual quality than truth. True ideas! these, to speak, are of the very substance of God. They existed from eternity in His mind, and before there were any created spirits to comprehend them. Was it not truth on which God thought from eternity? Then, when that truth is clothed in language, is not the "word of the Lord the incorruptible seed that liveth and abideth for ever?" Since Christ is the Wisdom of God, the Truth, and the Life, can we wonder that the Spirit proceeding from Him produces spiritual work in man, and imparts to the worker the "divine nature?" Every one who is possessed of more sensibility feels that there is a supernatural beauty in a very holy actor upon earth—a glory around the saintly head of one who has "laboured much in the Lord," and when the form or countenance of such an one is taken away from the world's picture gallery, that the luminous handywork of a Divine Artist is removed, and that a vacancy remains. The life of a Christian is the infused creative life of Christ, and this notwithstanding all his sins and infirmities. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?"

It follows from this that all spiritual work, fruit borne by the branches of the everlasting Vine, is of a permanent, abiding, eternal quality. "THAT YOUR FRUIT SHOULD REMAIN." This statement might produce no gladness at all, nor consequent strength, in many minds. Like Gallio, they "care for none of these things." They are indifferent whether their work in life is permanent or not, whether it lasts forever and ever, or passes away like the cells of bees or spiders' webs. Until the regenerating Eternal Spirit descends to dwell in a man, he is usually heedless as to the duration of his work. If it answer his present purpose, or "last his time," endure for a few generations, that is sufficient for him. Ephemeron! But God kindles in the bosoms of good men the ambition to perform work which shall eternal as nature, which shall not be "burned up" like "wood, hay, and stubble," when "tried by fire," but which shall "follow them" when they "rest from their labours."

And it is true of an earnest disciple of the Lord that his work is everlasting. Nothing can be a stronger inducement to steadfastness in the work of the Lord than this consideration. First, then, a Christian's work in common life, when well done, is of a vital, enduring quality; such work as business, the bringing up of children, household management, daily service, domestic labour. But does this sort of work indeed possess anything of a permanent character? Does it not rather pass away into oblivion with the mighty stream of time? Nay, Christ is the Redeemer of common life, or He would not be the Redeemer at all. Angels serve God in heavenly ministries; men serve Him amidst the duties incident to an earthly condition. The habits acquired in doing these works well are carried on into the future; habits of industry, perseverance, regularity, accuracy, carefulness, punctuality, faithfulness, and truth. "Thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities." Lights on earth shall shine in the firmament of heaven. All true light is inextinguishable, for it is kindled at the Central Sun of spirits. The past always goes on into the future. "He that is holy, let him be holy still." The child is father of the man. Guiding the house here "after a godly sort" is a school for guiding a heavenly mansion, just as the wise and good government of his own family by a bishop is spoken of as a training for taking care of the Church of God. A good quality or habit acquired on earth will never be lost. It will be called out, exercised, and applied in the heavenly glory. Is not this for the very essence of work to be carried forward into eternity? Many that are last shall be first. Many Christians occupying the lowest places on earth—servants with small wages, hard work, and not too thankful masters—who have in such stations shown all good fidelity, intelligent and willing service, so serving the Lord Christ, even though their work has been common house work or commoner daily labour, will in such discipline have acquired invaluable qualities and graces, which will find a sphere of activity in the world to come upon the throne of princes and in the government of kingdoms. For He who took David from the sheepfold, and Christ's Apostles from the trades of ashmen and tax-collectors, intends to fill the vacant tribunals of fallen angels with those "poor to whom the Gospel is preached."

Again, the common-life work of a Christian may be said to be permanent and eternal, because every good life and bright example in the discharge of common duties is setting springs in action which will act as causes of other good deeds through eternity. Take the common work of the rearing and education of children. Here are one father and mother who look upon their children as burdens, and hindrances to selfish enjoyment, who leave them to grow up as they best may, and who pass through life in a series of mean escapes from the fulfilment of their duties. And here is another pair, who undertake the work of bringing up their household as a long-continued labour to be wrought in God, one of the greatest and most acceptable common works which mankind can offer or perform to God on earth. For a family wisely, happily, frugally, industriously governed, with "plain living and high thinking," teaches at least as much of God and of true religion as a whole cathedral establishment or theological faculty. Let those who have had parents of this description, over whose house shone the pillar of a cloud by day, and the glory of a flaming fire by night—whose home, even if it were a cottage, was a cottage temple—say whether this fruit does not "remain." Is the drudgery all lost—the hard, ceaseless labour, by which health was tended, living provided, habits formed of cleanliness, self-respect, self-education, of order, industry, unconquerable honesty, and brotherly love? Is that labour lost? Has it sunk into the depths of chaos and oblivion? Is it not living still, and will it not abide as long as the world shall last? The more of moral meaning there is in any life or family, the more powerful are they as facts and forces in the world; and a spiritual mind infuses spirit into the commonest works, just as a graceful mind infuses grace into the commonest gestures. There is an indescribable excellence in the round, clean, complete manner in which a wise and actively good mind performs the most ordinary work, that takes it out of the range of general production, and causes it to fetch a higher price in the world's market. Temperance, self-control, vivacious earnestness, cannot but appear in their practical results. The work of the hypocrite, of the slothful, careless hand, betrays its origin. "I passed by the vineyard of the man void of understanding, and lo, it was grown over with thorns." But the hand that has been crucified with Christ is a right hand of power.

Further, the common-life work of a spiritual man may be said to be permanent and eternal, because it abides before God, the soul, and the world, as an object of pleasant and inspiring remembrance. In this sense, too, men's good works "follow them." An action in daily life which is wrought by a hand that is moved by a spirit in union with God, becomes thereby spiritual, and will bear thinking of for ever. It will bear narration through ages. The Bible is filled with such memorials of everlasting renown. The feast prepared at Bethany, the rustic marriage of Cana in Galilee, the fishing expeditions of Peter and John—these were ordinary scenes of the most common life; but they were sweetly hallowed by religion, and beautified and adorned by the presence of Christ. And precisely in the same manner still, where Christ's presence by His Spirit adorns and beautifies our common life, where in families mutual daily acts of kindness and forbearance, and united acts of self-denial and industry, are wrought in God, or common sufferings are patiently endured, and elicit gleams of temperate, true, and loving character—that common life becomes historical, will bear writing down in the books of earth and heaven, painting, describing, dwelling upon always with affectionate remembrance; the glory of the Lord shines round about it, gilds its outlines and its humblest details, as it lighted up the ten thousand lowly blades of grass around the shepherds in the fields of Bethlehem ; overshadows and transfigures it—makes it a picture, a poem, a song of praise, the theme of evangelists, the delight of ministering angels, and the joyful subject of discourse hereafter beside the fountains of paradise and on the everlasting hills. No such life as this is possible, without a secret life of most earnest faith, hope, and love. Roses spring only from the hidden root of the rose-tree. And if the soul would have her common life of home or business redeemed from vacancy, from irritation, from blind hurry and passionate misrule, from carking care and wasteful ruin, she must sit at the feet of Jesus first like Mary, and then she will go forth as Martha, to prepare a feast which reason will approve and love remember everlastingly as a banquet of joy.

Now, is not this a great and real encouragement to careful religious forethought to delicacy of sentiment and reflection in common life, so that works meet repentance may be done in that common sphere, the consideration that all our works and courses of action are eternal in their influence and in their reward? Temptation in daily life resisted sometimes crowns the faithful witness for God with more than the glory of Thermopylæ ; and deeds which are lost to the general eye amidst the obscurities of a back court or upper chamber shall be told hereafter with honour through many worlds by the fervent lips of saints and angels.

None will doubt that THE HIGHER SPIRITUAL WORK of an active Christian is pre eminently eternal in its results—work having for its object the instruction, conversion, and consolation of souls. The influence of Christ's life in glory, whether manifested in word or deed in His servants on earth, when brought effectually to bear upon those who are "dead in sins," is to communicate everlasting life. To save a soul from death ! What is this ? To change the vanishing spark of mortal thought into the star which shall burn for ever in the firmament of God ; to open a direct communication between a spirit sunk in deadly gloom and all the never-ending happiness of heaven ! Other works of men decay and pass away ; pyramids, temples, cities, manufactures, laws, literature—all are wearing out or rushing into ruin ; but there is one work which is absolutely eternal—the salvation of a soul, or the instruction, guidance, and consolation of a soul so saved. Planting and watering here are alike eternal. If I communicate thoroughly a view of Gospel truth to a fallen man, and he, through the grace of the Holy Spirit, believe it, then the idea is in him FOR EVER, as the incorruptible seed that abideth. Now such views of truth, creative and formative of character, principles for ever productive of lines of action, may be conveyed to other minds either by word or deed. It is not necessary for a man to listen to long discourses, or to understand a profound theology, in order to be saved. That God is love, and will freely pardon the worst man, through the Lord Jesus Christ—this is the message ; and this truth may be flashed upon the heart of a sinner by the fewest words or works. There are many Christians who have small speech, but great spiritual power. There are silent, sterling men and women, with profound natures and loving characters, whose single actions preach the Gospel of the grace of God as with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. Their spirits, like a diamond mirror, reflect upon the frozen soul the everlasting light of God. Their few sentences proclaim the glad tidings as with the silver trumpet of the Jubilee. Such a view of the facts as this holds out the highest encouragement to those who think themselves to be endued with but slender capacities for usefulness. The chief means of doing good is being good. If there be but genuineness of character, and the power of opportunely repeating in discourse the words of instruction or comfort heard elsewhere, it is a great power ; and when received with welcome, performs an eternal work. Casual sentences govern the Church and the world.

Wide, then, and permanent is the influence of any soul in earnest, whether its speech, station, or property. Immense is the work which every one may ; the least talkative are often the most powerful. How many are there Moses, are of a slow and stammering tongue, who cannot prophesy, but build up tabernacles, inspire their brother Aaron, and govern the Israelites. And holy thought and work is ever-living, and goes on working in many the measure in which we desire to communicate truth is usually the measure of influence over ourselves. All genuine light radiates far and wide. The plan of Providence is the honour which God puts upon a faithful few, or the soul found faithful unto death. Small power in earnest, a feeble spirit must, and working the works of God in faith and prayer, is often permitted results of spiritual labour for which the highly-gifted minister or plumed Christian have panted in vain. "Thou hast a little strength ; and hast not name : I will give thee the crown of life !" "With what measure ye all be measured to you again." Oh, may our common life, and our spirit, be so thoroughly animated by the life of Christ, that grace and beauty on earth may bloom hereafter unto glory everlasting. W.

WORLD-HISTORY.*

as the most entertaining should be the fortunes of the human family, nor inquiry be more interesting than the investigation of those causes to which the world now existing—the Europe of the nineteenth century ; but, like active tasks, it is arduous. A memory tenacious of minute details is associated with a clear and comprehensive intellect, and a glowing pen is aided by a calm and righteous judgment ; and when we think how rarely each, masterly generalization, and pictorial power are united in the same, we need not wonder that the world still awaits its historian, and we may take our own country on the genius which has once and again recorded its annals.

the universal histories which Germany has lately produced we are not ; but the work of John von Müller we long ago learned to admire. The work of forty years' fond labour, and concentrating into three octavos the work of seventeen hundred and thirty-three authors, its lucid summary is emphasised by the utterances of a sagacious criticism and a high-toned style. The "Discours sur l'Histoire Universelle" of Bossuet has the charm of equal eloquence, but is, after all, only a lengthened oration. The "Eagle of Helicon" soared so high, that his bird's-eye view of human affairs is a remote and faint outline ; and in looking at ecclesiastical affairs he sometimes found it difficult to close the membrana nictitans. More minute and less rhetorical are the works of Abbé Millot—with the usual felicity of French compilations, neat and sparkling with frequent anecdotes, and free from that charge of "baldness" lately brought against abridgments published in Britain. In the lower shelf of libraries still occurs Sir Walter Raleigh's "History of the World." Its mournful cadence is in keeping with the circumstances in which it was written—in the Tower of London and under the shadow of the scaffold ; and it has the still more melancholy air of the defeated and disappointed statesman, to the hollowness of courts, and with no very exalted opinion of mankind. The first volume, ending with the Macedonian Empire, is a grand fragment, not aware that any one ever attempted to continue it ; but towards the last century George Psalmanazar, Archibald Bower, and their associates, brought out "The Universal History." Of a book in the main so respectable written and so useful no one will speak disparagingly who remembers the good service it has done. Still, a hundred years have passed since its completion, and in the interval empires like Assyria, Babylonia, Egypt, have arisen from under their sepulchral mounds or from out of the dust of the desert, whilst a sifting criticism has revolutionised all our notions of the earlier Greece and Rome, and in the case of countries as familiar as France, Holland, Spain, and England, the diligent research has brought to light such unlooked-for information, that our ancestors are probably better known to their descendants than they were to their immediate contemporaries.

The time has arrived when English readers want a new history of the world, and we have no doubt that the work before us will receive a hearty welcome. Of Mr. Smith's erudition abundant proof has been afforded in his contributions to the well-known dictionaries of ancient biography and mythology, and to this new undertaking he has brought the talent which makes scholarship popular. "The story of our race" is the theme which he has prescribed to himself; but, like those vast and venerable olive-trunks which are occasionally seen growing in the East, united only at the root and at the summit, but split into several trees in the space between, the race is now divided into many stems, and is one only in its origin and its destiny; or rather like the river flowing past long and numerous islands in its progress, the great stream of humanity distributes itself from time to time into separate channels, and it is often after a prodigious interval that the parted clans or nationalities come together and commingle the various elements of good and evil absorbed in their severed and independent careers. To keep an eye on the main current, with occasional notice of its re-entering affluents and their effect on its volume and composition, is the business of the world-historian; and without caring to trace up to its source every tributary runnel, or getting embayed in the weedy margin of the flood, the author and his reader are carried down the "Course of Time," where the mid-channel flows fastest and strongest, only lingering where the beauty of the landscape or some outstanding object enforces a delay.

In the interest of national education and Christian intelligence, we rejoice at the appearance of this work. Tracing "the story of Divine Providence and human progress in one connected narrative," any one who masters its details will get impressive insight to God's plan with His own world, and will find it the best possible introduction to the study of any subordinate or national history. Its compactness is an immense advantage. In eight volumes it goes over the ground to which the "Universal History" gave five and twenty folios, or their equivalent sixty octavos. Judging from the specimen already published, nearly a fourth of the whole, no work of the kind could be more carefully or conscientiously executed. If fault there be, it is the occasional over-crowding of the page. The author's stores of knowledge are so ample, that facts and allusions sometimes come out too fast for ordinary memories to catch up and carry. The style is admirable, clear, expressive, animated, and often singularly forcible and happy. In his description of "decisive battles" Mr. Smith shows the same talent for military engineering which is so conspicuous in the pages of Dr. Arnold, and the human interest as well as the ethical value of the work is sustained throughout by its just and noble sympathies. In a day when literature is so full of insinuated doubt and outspoken unbelief, we cannot too cordially hail a contribution to historic authorship so thoroughly imbued with Christian faith and feeling, so devoutly observant of the hand of God, and so fitted to impress with the continual presence and overruling in human affairs of Him who is "wise in counsel and excellent in working."

NOTES IN THE FRENCH JOURNALS ON ANOTHER MORTARA AFFAIR.

Everybody knows that the shameful abduction of young Mortara, some years since, the most indignation. Doubtless the Papacy in this matter, immense injury. One may be thought, therefore, that the priestly temporal States would thenceforth have abstained from such acts. Not at all. It is an old practice at Rome to violate elementary principles of justice, right, and individual liberty; and the same of the same kind has recently gone into particulars, for I suppose it has been published in the English papers. A Jewish child, ten years of age, when, who had been apprenticed by his father to a Popish shoemaker, was led away by a priest, and shut up in a convent of nuns, or neophytes. In vain did the father demand his son; in vain did the authorities at Rome express their displeasure at the affair; the Pope intervened, and positively refused to give up the child so disgracefully kidnapped.

Which brings the case within our knowledge, is the controversy which it has kindled among the political journals of the liberal press has naturally been of great severity the clergy of Rome, and if the paternal authority is to be trodden under foot in the city of the

The organs of the Jesuit party have acted wisely had they remained silent. A crime of this kind cannot be justified before public opinion. But the policy of Ultramontanism had no more to say than what was prudent than of what was just; they therefore essayed to plead, in defence of this bad cause, that the salvation of the soul ought to prevail over every consideration;—that if the child had been taken to his father's house to enrol himself under the name of Garibaldi, the democratic journal would have said nothing;—that the law demanding compulsory education of the humbler class, also infringes the rights of parents, and so forth. It concludes its defence by declaring, in a haughty tone, that the Pope has too much firmness, too much courage, to yield to revolutionary clamour, and that, in the accomplishment of his pious duty, he will resist all Europe.

To these extravagant pleas, the Siccle replies, with much truth, that the democrats and the revolutionists will lose nothing by this obstinate policy of the Roman Court, but, on the contrary, must gain much from it, since sacerdotal despotism will be more and more detested and despised.

Indeed, the Pope and his counsellors seem to be struck with a fatal spirit of blindness. How is it they do not understand that such proceedings turn thousands of individuals from the Romish Church? Formerly, the wariness of the Papacy was proverbial. The so-called successors of St. Peter showed incomparable skill in whatever they took in hand. In our days, they sometimes conduct themselves like fools. Is this a sign that the temporal power of the Pontiffs is approaching its termination? Perhaps it is.

But one very deplorable result of such conduct is, that in the eyes of many people, the Christian religion itself is compromised and involved in blame. There are among us a multitude of persons, including even those who are cultivated and intelligent, who have found the Gospel with Popery; and when, irritated or disgusted, they abandon the Church of Rome, they see no path to follow but that of infidelity.

INFIDELITY AMONG THE YOUNG MEN OF FRANCE.

Every day furnishes fresh proof of the progress of scepticism. I may cite, from among other documents, a sort of manifesto, published in the Presse, in the name of the young men of Paris. M. Vermorel, the writer of this article, affirms, in the most explicit terms, that, after having held lengthened conferences with numerous students in our higher scholastic establishments, he has become convinced that the Christian faith has ended its days in France, and that it is impossible to reinstate antiquated beliefs, which find no thoughtful and educated person, of the rising generation, willing to defend them.

This is very plain speaking. I presume that the young sceptic has exaggerated the real state of things, and probably pious young men have not entirely disappeared. But we must admit, with regret, that this manifesto is, in the main, correct. The youth of France are no longer Romanists, and they refuse to embrace the Evangelical faith. In their eyes, Protestantism, at least when it maintains orthodox doctrines, is not worth much more than Popery. Both lag in the rear, while humanity is marching towards a better future. And what is the result of this fine reasoning? It is that the great majority of those who frequent our seats of learning adopt the theories of a vague pantheism or of an abject materialism.

This same M. Vermorel, who comes forward as the authorised interpreter of youth, does not hesitate to make M. Renan the object of reproach and sarcasm. You are aware that that elegant master of prose, while denying the narratives of the sacred writers, exhibits here and there profound respect, and even ostentatious enthusiasm, for Jesus Christ: after having accused him of violence, imposture, and charlatanism, he raises him to a majestic and almost supernatural elevation.

These perfidious tactics have displeased the young men, and for once we agree with them. M. Vermorel tells M. Renan rudely that the time for this temporising is past. One of two things, he adds: either Christ is God in a human form, and then you must accept what he says, and worship him as being divine, or he is a simple man, and in that case, why not put him upon the same level as Confucius, Buddha, Mahomet, and others? The dilemma is a difficult one; but assuredly M. Renan will not alter his method. He has an influential position to maintain, and is bound to respect appearances and pay due regard to propriety.

IGNORANCE OF THE ROMISH CLERGY IN FRANCE.

A periodical having the title of the Observateur Catholique (Gallican), and edited by the Abbé Guettée, contains a curious narration of what happened, a few days since, at the Sorbonne, in open disputation, upon a theological thesis.

You must know that this Abbé Guettée is a liberal and intelligent man, whose historical works have been put in the Index by the Court of Rome. He is one of those ecclesiastics, now so rarely to be met with, who still maintain the ancient liberties of Gallicanism.

M. Guettée, then, was present at a sitting of the Sorbonne, which, since mediæval times has been the seat of the most matured study in Roman Catholic theology; and there, according to his own admission, he ascertained the great ignorance into which the French priests of our day have fallen.

A young candidate presented himself to obtain the degree of doctor in divinity, and he had written a thesis upon the union of the Greek and the Roman Catholic Churches. It was a good opportunity for a display of a vast amount of erudition, and the candidate was under an obligation to avail himself of it, for he aspired to the doctor's gown. Well, the Abbé Guettée affirms that it was a poor and meagre discussion. The examiners, as well as the candidate, showed that they had not at all fathomed the questions debated in this controversy. Their only argument consisted in saying that the Pope is infallible, and that the Greeks can do nothing better, in order to obey the will of God, than fall upon their knees before the Pontifical See, and ask pardon for their long revolt.

What, then, asks the Abbé Guettée, has become of the ancient and glorious reputation of the Theological Sorbonne? The reply is very simple. The Jesuits perceived that thoroughly learned priests were less servile than ignorant ones, and in their conduct and their language they were given to display a spirit of independence. Religious learning was therefore suspected by the reverend fathers; and, in concert with the Ultramontane bishops, they reduced the education of the clergy to the narrowest limits possible. All the books which are placed in the hands of the young pupils at the episcopal seminaries are strictly in accordance with the Jesuitical system; and all the instructions which they receive reproduce the systems of scholastic theology, and take no account whatever of anything which has been effected by theological science for four hundred years.

As a consequence of this, the priests are very ignorant, and at the same time very docile to what is ordained them by their superiors. I do not know whether the episcopal body and the company of Ignatius Loyola make a clever calculation, when they proceed in this way. Can priests who have not studied, and who are without information, be the spiritual guides of a population in the nineteenth century? They draw upon themselves contempt or ridicule, and the religion which they teach is involved in their own debasement. The submission of the infatuated clergy is paid for very dearly.

L—V. NEW SERIES.—SEPTEMBER.

We must confess that Protestants, whether pastors or laymen, are often the most ardent in attacking the basis of the Gospel. This is not the way to recommend Protestantism in the eyes of serious men who have preserved their soundness of faith. Happily, in other countries, the disciples of the Reformation are at the head of all the undertakings which serve to propagate and strengthen religion.

CONTROVERSY ON PROTESTANT ECCLESIASTICAL ELECTIONS.

Let us come to our domestic discussions. The conflict still continues to be very animated, and is now directed towards the ecclesiastical elections, which are to take place in the month of January next. Some explanations are here indispensable.

In accordance with an Imperial decree, promulgated twelve years ago, all the male members of every Protestant flock have the right to vote in the elections of the lay members of presbyterial councils and consistories. The only conditions imposed upon them are, that they should be thirty years old, have observed their first communion, take their part in the exercises and obligations of worship, and have been resident for two years in the parish. Everybody will admit this is not too much to be required of those who use the privilege of electing elders.

The Consistory of Paris has established a regulation in conformity with these legal conditions. It enjoins every Protestant to present himself personally before the committee appointed to register the names of the electors, to declare for himself, with his own lips, whether he has taken his first communion, whether he attends upon the services of religion, &c. Moreover, the electors are to be introduced one by one into the room where the deliberations are carried on, in order to avoid all tumultuous agitation, and to allow every one to answer, without being embarrassed, the questions which must be put to him. Finally, proselytes will not be admitted as electors until after a delay of two years from their admission to the Protestant communion.

It would be very superfluous to justify such measures. Not only are they conformed to the spirit and the letter of the laws, but they are also dictated by common sense and the simplest rules of prudence. It is evident that the ecclesiastical elector ought to furnish guarantees before he uses the so important right which is conceded to him ; and also, that to obtain solid guarantees, it is necessary to exact the personal and direct declaration of individuals. The Consistory would come short in regard to its strictest obligations, if it did not take precautions to prevent the registration of false electors.

Well, the Messrs. Coquerel and their partisans have violently attacked these regulative measures, and have even reported them to the Minister for Worship as an excess of power. Observe that these gentlemen are not afraid to call for the intervention of the civil government in our ecclesiastical affairs, and thus to initiate Roman Catholic magistrates in a direct manner into our painful discussions. This is what they designate by the pompous word liberalism.

But what are the grounds upon which their grievances are founded? They pretend that this questioning, addressed to each individual, is arbitrary, abusive, inquisitorial, opposed to Protestant liberty, &c. These are imaginary grievances. The committee, composed of pastors and elders, who have been appointed by the Church, and who enjoy its confidence, cannot, without flagrant injustice, be compared to a council of inquisitors. Such language is inspired by passion, and violates the proprieties which are most worthy of respect.

At the moment of writing, I do not know whether the Minister for Worship has judged it fitting to interfere in this dispute. But you will readily understand what are the true motives of the opposers of the regulation. At the time when M. Coquerel, the younger, received his dismissal from the Consistory, his friends sought and obtained against the decision the signatures of a crowd of persons who did not belong to the Reformed communion—women, young girls, school-children, Lutherans, Romanists, and infidels of all sorts. I shall abstain from prying into their intention without framing any observation in it. In precise, it is certain that the Consistory committee ought to be very attentive, and scrupulous in its inquiry, lest false should obtain the right to vote.

ADDRESS OF THE ENGLISH UNITARIAN M. COQUEREL, JUN.

The Lien, the organ of the Rat party, has published in its last number, sent to M. Coquerel, the younger, the "British and Foreign Unitarian Convention," assembled at its annual meeting at Hampstead, near London. This document signed by the president, J. Clarke La and others.

You know this Unitarian Society than I do, for I have just read it the first time. But I can say that the comments of these honourable gentlemen are very strange. They invoke at the outset their own behalf, the honoured men of Baxter and of the Puritans. Is it because Puritans and Baxter would not have owned these Unitarians, who pretend the Gospel consists, above all, in brotherhood, and because error is necessary to the progress of the truth?

They say again, that M. Coquerel the younger, is the worthy heir of Pastor of Beausobre, and of Rabaut-St.-Etienne. This confusion of names proves that they know the first word of our history. He was a very orthodox theologian; he never lived in France at all; and Rabaut-St.-Etienne was a political adventurer.* The Unitarians speak of what they have examined? X. X

SWITZERLAND.

A correspondent whose pen has frequently furnished contributions to these pages, writing from Schiers (Grisons), gives the following deplorable account of the growth of the most undisguised infidelity among professed Protestant theologians and their followers in German Switzerland:—

MODERN CLERICAL UNBELIEF: ITS CHARACTERISTICS.

In my last I wrote a few words on the growing infidelity among our clergy, and I must turn anew to the same sad subject. It is of no use to conceal the fact that a great number of our ministers are bent upon the propagation of error and unbelief in their parishes. Allow me, therefore, to give a few sketches of the leading of this movement and the fruits already reaped. I will first acknowledge that there are among them such as really believe that they thus serve. They hope, by reducing the Gospel to vague religious ideas, and carefully stripping everything supernatural, to bring back to the young generation, led astray by materialism, a hero of spiritual life—if they are not shocked by the miracles and the supernatural machinery of the Gospel. They pride themselves on being listened to by many who would not enter a church where the old Gospel was preached. In this idea, however honest they may be forgetting that it is sin and the lusts that keep the infidel at a distance from the Gospel, and that miracles are so far from being a hindrance to faith in Christ by a repenting heart as he finds in them a great comfort, as the almighty power of his Saviour. They must censure them for their opposition to ministers that preach the true Gospel of Christ to the apostles. If, as they preach the same end in view—viz., the conversion of sinners—and if they, too, acknowledge the Gospel is most efficient for this purpose, they seek to destroy the confidence of the people in those ministers who preach that Gospel? Exclude them from the pulpit as far as their doctrines—why attack the old faith, often in a frivolous manner?

CLERICAL LEADERS OF THE CLERICAL INFIDELS: THEIR AVOWALS.

as now become the stronghold of this infidelity they are all powerful. The Government favours them exclusively. The professors of the university, the teachers of the schools, are, with scarce one exception, of the same mind. I have already spoken of the last of these, Professor Schweizer. Another professor, Mr. Volkmar, who also occupies a high position in the Church, has published a commentary on the Apocalypse. Listen to some specimens of his modern bibliology. The Apocalypse, according to this professor, is the production of a Jewish Christian—perhaps St. John the Evangelist—at least one of his intimate friends. He intended to teach that the Jews only can be saved; the heathen are excluded from the kingdom; their share is only the crumbs that fall from the rich table of the Jews. The whole is pervaded by a spirit of revenge and hatred against the heathen (not heathenism). It is directed against St. Paul and his converts, and the heathen are saved by faith, and Christians must submit to the heathen as they are, and its purpose is to warn the Church against such errors. Such as it is, this is the faithful mirror of the spirit of infidelity in Christianity (which, by-the-by, we know from the Apocalypse, because the Gospels and epistles owe their origin to a much later date, when spiritual Paulinism had already become the narrow primitive Christianity). What authority we can concede to infidelity, and whether, instead of regarding it as a Church blessed with the gifts of the Holy Spirit, we ought not to regard it as the immense progress we have made in advance of the apostles. The poor set up as the authoritative teachers of the Church! Forsooth, they are not worthy to be the shoe-strings of our spiritual professors! And all this stuff is put forth with the assurance as if it were positive truth, and now and then with pathetic religious fervour. But what is still sadder, is the fact that the doctrine of this school is widely spreading among the people. Its organ, the Voices of the People, edited by many laymen, and countenanced by the whole political press. The fruits of systematic propagation of unbelief are everywhere to be seen. With the perversion of the Christian faith, the morals of the people are more and more loose. Shocking crimes are of frequent occurrence. They are a stereotype column in our daily papers. A large number of our youth are led by their teachers and ministers to despise the Bible, as a book full of lies, and to consider faithful ministers as hypocrites or dull and ignorant men.

ELECTION OF A CLERICAL INFIDEL TO A PAROCHIAL CURE.

The recent election of the parish minister at Uster, one of the most important parishes in the Canton of Zurich, has afforded another striking proof of the prevailing infidelity in this part of Switzerland. Let me give you a few particulars of it, as a sign of the times in which we live. In this parish a very young man had been for some time assistant minister, and preached, without disguise, as is usual, the doctrines of the infidel party. When the old minister died, the party strove hard to get the young man elected as his successor. About a hundred members of the parish addressed a petition to the ecclesiastical council of the canton, requesting that so scandalous an election might not be allowed to take place. They assigned as their reasons, which were never disproved, that he had preached and taught the children—1. That the Bible was full of fables. 2. That Jesus was of human and sinful origin, like other men. 3. That He died, and never rose from death, since nobody has any knowledge of life after death. 4. That faith in Christ is an illusion, and that our only trust should be in our own works and in the universal goodness of God. This same man, in a sermon on Easter-day, had the effrontery to draw a parallel between the Lord and the traitor Judas, saying that the latter had himself given up his life for his convictions, whilst Christ's life was taken from Him by others. I will not annoy your readers by dwelling on other similar specimens of this shameless infidelity. Now all this was set forth in the petition to the Ecclesiastical Council, and what answer do you think that body gave the petitioners? It was to the effect that there was no legal ground to declare the candidate ineligible for the Christian ministry, and that they had received some good accounts of him. As though anybody short of the evil one himself might be entrusted with the ministry. Ought not the members of this body, if they were convinced that they could not legally prevent the election of such a minister, to have protested and withdrawn from their office? The election was then carried by 865 against 145 votes, and, when the result was known, thunders of applause broke forth in the church, louder than was ever heard in a theatre. Such is our shame and grief before the Christian world! What can we do but weep, and pray the Lord to strengthen His people, that they may keep His testimony unsullied in the time to come? But we also beseech you to strengthen our hands by prayer. It is the same enemy who threatens you, and in our poor country is already triumphant. Perhaps the knowledge to what length he will go may act as a caution to some men who are not yet sufficiently prepared to withstand him. K.

It will be felt as some alleviation to the melancholy state of things described above, that another correspondent is able to narrate how recently Zurich has witnessed a striking example of the power of Evangelical religion in impelling to practical effort for the good of others. An English clergyman writes as follows :—

Zurich, August 20, 1864.

GENEVA AND ZURICH.

Your Geneva correspondent gave an interesting account of the proceedings, in May last, in connexion with the Memorial Hall of Calvin, about to be erected there. The population of Geneva has nearly doubled in the last twenty years. A mixed multitude of French, Italians, and Germans, some for pleasure, others for profit, have been attracted to the smiling shores of the Leman Lake. James Fazy, the popular dictator of Geneva, acting on the old motto, Spartam nactus es orna, laid out a new town on the right bank of the Rhone, on a scale of Imperial magnificence. That nothing should be wanting to sever between the traditions of the past and the present, in Geneva, a Roman Catholic cathedral arose in the midst of the new quarter, and the traveller, bewildered with all this modern grandeur, would ask himself with wonder, Is this the city of Calvin, the republic whose more than Spartan simplicity and more than Spartan heroism filled Europe with its fame three centuries ago? It was felt that an appeal should be made, before it was too late, to revive the memories of Calvin in the city the foundations of whose greatness were laid by him. A visible memorial should appeal to the eye, as well as a spiritual testimony appeal to the conscience, of those who were fast forgetting that they were the descendants of those who built up the Reformation on the eternal Rock of the Word. So, as you have already read, a site has been procured in one of the most rising quarters of the town, and the building of the Memorial Hall is to be proceeded with as fast as the funds flow in to warrant the committee to carry out their noble design.

I have briefly recapitulated the doings of our Geneva friends, that you may the better understand what is doing in Zurich to revive the testimony for the truth as it is in Jesus. Zurich, as your readers are doubtless already aware, is to German Switzerland what Geneva is to the French-speaking part of the republic. It is the intellectual and commercial capital of the North and East cantons, as Geneva is of the South and West. To make the parallel more complete, it is easy to trace the greatness of Zurich to the greatness of its Reformer, Zuingli, as Geneva is imperishably associated with the memory of Calvin. I have only to add that the fine gold has become dim in the city of Zuingli as much as in the city of Calvin—the candle has gone out; and if God in judgment has not already removed the candlestick, it is because we may trust that He has purposes of mercy in store for Zurich as well as for Geneva. He will in mercy send us such a revival here, that we shall see the glory of the former days return.

NEW HOSPITAL AND PREACHING HALL.

For this end, there is as much need of witness work here as in Geneva. There is need even of a disruption of the National Church, the same as that which took place in Geneva forty years ago, and to which we may trace, under God, the restoring to Geneva the years which the locust of Deism and the cankerworm of unbelief had eaten. We have no signs as yet, in Zurich, of the spirit which would set up a Free Church beside the old worm-eaten National Church, and rally all believing hearts under the old banner which Zuingli and Bullinger held up three centuries ago. When the time comes for this, God, we are sure, will raise up a man, and we can only wait and pray that we may live to see the hour and the man. Meanwhile, our duty is for the present, and to occupy the talents, one or many, which God has given us to put out for His glory. "She hath done what she could," is the praise of her whose name is coupled with the burial of Christ throughout the whole world, and to the end of time. There is a lady here of whom the same may be said. "She has done what she could" for the honour of her Lord and Master, and in this spirit of cheerful self-sacrifice has brought her box of ointment very costly as a witness of her faith, that as His body saw no corruption, so with the incorruptible Word of God. It may die and be buried, but it will rise again. Zurich may forget her Lord, but her Lord will not forget her. The truth once delivered to the saints here must reappear and witness against the infidelity of preachers and the profligacy of the people.

With this end in view, Miss Escher, a member of one of the wealthiest and most honourable families in Zurich, has erected, at her sole cost, a large, commodious building, in a neat semi-ecclesiastical style, the lower story of which she intends to devote as an asylum for sick and convalescent children, and the upper, or principal floor, is laid out as a large preaching hall, adapted to seat 800, with a low desk or pulpit in the centre and a small gallery or recess at one end, in which a harmonium will be placed. In the front of the building, in letters of gold, this inscription is engraven over the doorway, "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." (1 Cor. iii. 11.) The inscription proclaims the intent of the building; it is at once a witness and a protest—a witness for the truth which was and ought to be preached in the pulpits of the National Church—a protest against the errors which have invaded those pulpits and made the preaching of the cross foolishness to the so-called philosophers who have substituted Hegel and humanity for Christ and His cross. A few weeks ago the building passed out of the architect's hands, and on Wednesday, the 3rd August, was solemnly set apart, by prayer, praise, and preaching the Word, for the good and charitable uses to which it is to be devoted.

It is needless to say that the building was crowded from end to end, and for three hours the large assembly listened to Dr. Held Pfarrer Zimmerman, of the Fraumünster, Zurich, Mr. Guder, of Berne, and other speakers. After the meeting, tea and refreshments were provided in the lower story for strangers and a large circle of Miss Escher's friends, and the rooms set apart for the children's hospital inspected with much interest. Let us trust that the building will answer the intentions of its liberal foundress, that a succession of faithful men will witness thus to the faithful saying, and that it may answer the same end for Zurich that the Memorial Hall of Calvin is designed to do for Geneva.

A STUDENTS' REVOLT.

We have lately had an eruption of boyish feeling in our great Polytechnic school here, which has caused much discussion, not in Zurich only, but in Switzerland. The director of this new University of Modern Sciences has unhappily made himself unpopular with the students, and having called to expel six who had made themselves ringleaders of the opposition, nearly half to the number of 400, signed a resolution if the six were expelled, they would take off in a body and never return to As the director would not yield, the took place, and one morning, about a ago, they assembled at the Polytechnic, a ing, and each company bearing its banner, bed through the town, and then sailed lake to Rapperswyl. Thus the great engineering and the practical sciences of its students at one blow, and that been fully opened or inaugurated, as it intention to do this September. As to the director or the students will give way, nature yet to offer an opinion. The heir part has been followed by a "lock- ie part of the authorities. Which is to cannot venture to say, as probably truth middle, and both are at fault for allow- o to such extremities. The fact, how- orth recording, as it points out the faults : university life which lie at the root of the failure of Germany to right herself as a nation in the eyes of the world. It has been said that youths in Germany run out their liberty in their college days, and spend the rest of their days in the stocks, to pay off the excesses of their youth. Too much liberty for boys, and too little for men, has brought Germany almost to the same pass as China, where old men are seen flying kites and boys fasten their books to the horns of the oxen that are drawing the plough, in their zeal to pass the competitive examinations. The Faust spirit is still, alas! the prevailing spirit of German bildung. The cock's feather, the short cloak, and the pointed sword, are emblems of a state of feeling as prevalent now as when Goethe wrote. There is too much swagger and too little self-restraint. Beer and duelling are the signs of manhood which a German youth thinks he cannot begin with too soon. A reformer who would do for the schools and universities of Germany what Arnold did for us, would be a benefactor to his race. Let us hope that, among other agencies for good, this will not be wanting.

ITALY.

Florence, August 17, 1864.

N IN THE SOUTH UNDER BOURBON SWAY.

y of Italy is pure and bright com- h that of England, but there is a over this land—thick and gross in places, the darkness of ignorance : attendant evils—which has happily elled from the shores of Britain. rance, promoted and defended by s, is a most formidable foe, which ire half a century to overcome, even est and valiant men enlisted in the it with so much apathy among the d in the halls of Government, how ust be the day of victory. There and growing party in Italy who are ry endeavour to rouse the energy of ows to the cry of "Arms and the " as the two powerful factors of ity ; but there is another league of lack army, the sleepless supporters of —ramifying society in all its o not only seek to defeat by any oly alliance the armies of Italy in but whose watchword, passed along line of the magistrates of the rural is this : "Oppose the opening of and if you cannot, get a priest or a named as director !"

erstand the sad plight from which re now struggling to rescue Italy, am a suitable background to the f present laudable efforts and far prings, we trust, in the future, take details as to education in the South previous to the dawn of this day of liberty. Let me premise, that unless I had with my own eyes seen the official documents and gone through all the details on which these general statements are founded, I could not have brought myself to believe in the existence of such a deplorable state of things. So much as a guarantee to my readers.

In 1861, then, in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, out of 3,094 districts, there were 1,084 destitute of every kind of instruction ; other 920 had no boys' school, while other 91 had no girls' school ; in all, 2,095 communities in which schooling was either imperfect or wholly wanting. The highest pay of a teacher was a miserable pittance, so that 20,000*l.* sufficed to meet the outlays of King Bomba's Minister of Instruction. Strange that in the year of grace 1861 the town of Turin alone disbursed as much on the elementary education of its youth as did the whole kingdom of Naples !

As to the quality of the education really imparted in the South, the less said the better. It was of the worst kind. The whole thing was a sham—and one of those shams which the Bourbon eschewed indulgence in. These were the days in which any man who could read and write was deemed a proper object of espionage, and when any household servant discovered capable of putting words of two syllables together, either in print or manuscript, and making sense of them, was forthwith dismissed as a dangerous character.

And how many children frequented these southern schools, such as they were !

Shame upon the Papacy and its minion princes! only 39,884 boys, and 27,547 girls, or a total of 67,431 scholars in a population of 6,500,000 souls—that is, one in a thousand of the inhabitants—were at school!

LATEST EDUCATIONAL STATISTICS.

No wonder that Settembrini, after the liberation, by Garibaldi, of Naples, and when addressing the assembled syndics and counsellors, should have with eloquence and tears pointed to the miserable condition of popular instruction around them, besought them to save their money from holiday trips and illuminations, not so much to reform, as to create schools everywhere, insisted that, whatever might be the form of government, a people that could not read was always enslaved, and that the town of Naples alone, with its half a million of people, required 500 more schools and 50,000 more scholars in order to put it on a level with towns in Switzerland or France. No wonder that another distinguished writer should say that "the man cannot truly be called a statesman, nor is he worthy to sit in the Italian Parliament, who does not constantly and profoundly feel the necessity of reorganising the school system of Italy, and worthily providing for the education of the people." Though so much has been done publicly and privately these three years past, the first report of the Italian post-office, just issued, shows painfully how far this country is behind the age. During the year 1863, while you in Britain posted 550 million letters, and France 260 millions, Italy only reached 72 millions! And here is the share which the leading towns had in this correspondence: Turin, nearly nine millions; Milan, above four millions; Genoa, above three millions; Florence and Naples, each above two millions; and Palermo, below one million—the South being still furthest back in the race.

In Continental countries the Government is looked to for the inauguration of every enterprise. In ordinary cases this may justly be deemed an evil. In regard to education, however, and that in the present circumstances of Italy, it is undoubtedly to be deplored that the Government has not been able and willing, amid grants for theatrical and fine art purposes, for railways, roads, and other useful constructions, to grant more money for education. While France and Prussia set apart one million sterling each for this object, and England is spending annually two millions on her 60,000 schools, the State aid for the 21,000 Italian schools does not exceed 20,000*l.*, dealt out in miserable sums of 20*l.* to Brescia, 120*l.* to Naples, & so on. This is a good ground of complaint to the many patriots who are toiling nobly to raise the masses from degraded superstition and priestly despotism.

After all that has been done, the favourable view of national education is as follows. It is the most favourable, because the number of children is reckoned as from five to ten, and not five to twelve years of age. In Piedmont and Lombardy, 1 child in 11 inhabitants at school; in Liguria, 1 in 17; in Emilia, 1 in 33; in Sardinia, 1 in 35; in the Marches and Umbria, 1 in 44; in Tuscany, 1 in 58; in Naples, 1 in 66; in Sicily, 1 in 108.

Or, dividing the Peninsula into three parts southern, central, and northern, we have in the southern part one-eighth of the children at school, and seven-eighths as yet receiving no instruction; in central Italy, one-fifth of the children at school, and four-fifths as yet receiving no instruction; and in the northern provinces of Piedmont, of Lombardy, four-fifths are at school, and one-fifth not. On taking a conjunct view of the three millions children in wide Italy, more than two-thirds are receiving no instruction, while in some provinces scarcely one-eighth of the youthful population is at school.

What a contrast this is to highly-favoured England, where, out of 2,655,777 children capable of attending school, 2,535,462 are actually under instruction.

PECUNIARY AID FOR EDUCATION.

In the unaccountable absence of suitable Government aid, the hundred townships of Italy have with much enthusiasm set themselves to the work of education, as you will see by the sums severally spent by them in 1863—viz.: Naples, 11,000*l.*; Palermo, 8,000*l.*; Turin, 18,000*l.*; Milan, 16,000*l.*; Genoa, 14,000*l.*; Bologna, 12,000*l.*; Ravenna, 7,000*l.*; Ancona, Forlì, Perugia, Ferrara, Siena, each 5,000*l.* There is scarcely a town of any importance in which the authorities during the last two or three years, have not shown the liveliest interest in establishing elementary schools in their various neighbourhoods.

The latest news is that Cosenza has this year opened thirty-nine new schools, with 2,000 additional children; that artisans from twelve to twenty years of age flock to the newly-opened evening schools—250 at Arezzo, 147 at Massa Carrara, and 160 at Potenza; that the citizens of Milan have formed themselves into an association, of which each member pays a small monthly rate, in order to carry education to the smallest country villages of Lombardy; that the Neapolitan Chamber of Commerce, on the national festa of the Statuto, distributed prizes of 2*l.* and 4*l.*, in considerable number, to the best scholars in the day, night, and sabbath-schools; that all the annual prizes of the schools of Naples assume the form of savings-bank books, with which the youths started on a career of thoughtfulness and economy; and that the community of Lecce has given 700*l.* to be divided among the first sixteen infant schools founded in the district.

In all these schools the old and incompetent teachers are being replaced by trained and qualified persons from the many normal schools at work in every province, though it seldom occurs to read the advertisements for teachers in the newspapers, and to find that the salary offered usually ranges from 10*l.* to 20*l.* a-year. Great praise is also due to many private individuals. One gentleman gives 500*l.* to establish infant schools in Mella, while another takes in hand the education of the inmates of the Parma Foundling Hospital.

HOPEFUL INDICATIONS.

An Educational Congress of distinguished Italians, versed in educational subjects, meets next month, to confer as to the best methods of teaching, the preparation of a series of school-books, the granting of diplomas upon examination to schoolmasters, and a host of kindred topics. To the honour of the King and his two sons, it should be said that they never fail to visit the schools in the places through which they pass, while the heir-apparent to the throne, Prince Humbert, has, during his residence in Naples, not only gone about in a familiar way among the day and Sabbath-schools, but invited to a royal table some of the humble directors of these establishments, in company with all the civil and military authorities. In this way the schools have been popularised, and the efforts of the priests defeated, who, working on the prejudices of parents in a thousand ways, have done their very best to warn away the young, under severest threats.

The enthusiasm with which the educational movement is prosecuted may be judged of by the really eloquent addresses delivered at the opening of the schools. Here is a passage from the speech of the teacher at Massa Marittima: "Believe me, my young friends, in this town of most beauty, wealth, and importance is that of which the inhabitants possess the most learning and intelligence. These form the motive power, the life, the soul of countries. By them commerce prospers, industry flourishes, and families are enriched. Through them bread is never wanting to the poor, nor occupation to the industrious, nor happiness to all. Instruction, then, is bread, ignorance is starvation; instruction is wealth, ignorance is poverty; instruction is life, ignorance is death."

Here, again, are the brave words of a Neapolitan rector:—

These sixteen night schools are already the outposts of a new civilisation in the territories of an ancient barbarism, the first successes gained over the legions of old superstitions and ignorances. Behind these outposts will come the grand army, and to these first triumphs will succeed the noise of the pitched battle, which shall be waged throughout all the secret corners of this city against the thousands of phantasms of prejudice and error which encumber and dishonour so many consciences, and which have made this people—so good, so ingenious, so quick-sighted—the byword and reproach of the world. The time will come—and it is not far distant—when these shameless spectres will quit the field, and when the whole town will resound with the noise of schools and workshops, and when the people will divide their day between the one and the other. The streets and squares will be cleansed of the vile plague of idle vagabondism; with idleness shall disappear rags and horrid oaths, and then shall these disgraces of our city be forgotten. Meanwhile, let us have courage and go forward on our road. What though it be long and we have only set foot upon it? Do you not see how much progress you have already made, you who were so afraid to follow us at first? Let the remembrance of this be a good omen and a comfort to us in our march.

RELIGIOUS PERIODICALS.

The free press of Italy lends a powerful aid. Everywhere cheap and healthy serials are being issued at the lowest price, under the direction of men of worth and reputation. The Evening Readings and Italian Educator of Florence, the Italian Mind of Milan, the Popular Lectures of Ancona, the Workman's Journal of Genoa, the Social Science of Turin, are only a few of many "People's journals" which are now finding their way into the homes of the labouring poor, and diffusing useful information among the working classes of Italy.

I have only to add that the evangelists of Italy are doing their full share of the great work, not only by the establishment of schools in all directions, but by the circulation of an extensive Christian literature, in which the Echo of the Truth, Family Readings, and Sabbath-school Journal, hold a high place, although the Christian Almanac, edited by Dr. De Sanctis, is the most popular of all. Last year 100,000 copies were sold. It is very remarkable that the most widely-circulated almanac in Italy should be a thoroughly Evangelical one.

PROTESTS AGAINST PLYMOUTHISM.

Congregations of Italian Christians in Caravaggio, Milan, Intra, Casale, and elsewhere, continue to issue their protests against the Plymouthism attributed to them and to the work in Italy generally, in the ill-starred book of Signor Rossetti. The most remarkable protest of all, however, is a thirty-two-paged pamphlet from the pen of Pompeo Rossi. In your number for December last I mentioned that about a year and a-half ago this gentleman, then evangelist at Bologna, had written a book with a similar title and in a similar spirit to that of Signor Rossetti, though it was issued in his own name, and not in that of the Churches of Italy. I am happy to say that Signor Rossi has seen the error of his former way, and bitterly repents his past unhappy publication. In his present protest, he not only exposes the errors in detail of Rossetti's book, but makes a personal confession of his previous errors, which he has now renounced. Like Dr. De Sanctis, he has withdrawn from the Free Italian Churches, because they are infected with Plymouthism. Our earnest desire and prayer is that a like spirit of contrition may soon move the hearts of others, who have so needlessly and uncharitably disturbed the peace of the Church and the love of the brethren. May God grant it, so that the division of our Zion may be healed.

NEAPOLITAN NUNNERIES.

"The Mysteries of the Neapolitan Cloister," to which I alluded last month, has appeared, and is creating a great sensation. As a literary production the style is most attractive. When a few pages have been read, it is impossible to stop till the thrilling narrative is ended, as you will find when the English translation reaches you. The authoress belongs to the famous Carracciolo family, of the Princes of Forino. She gives her name, and deals in facts, supplying day and date for occurrences most scandalous to the Church of Rome. Forced to assume the conventual habit through the bigotry and straitened circumstances of her mother, after the death of her father, who was a general in the army and a governor of a Neapolitan province, this lady was subjected to a grinding despotism on the part of abbesses, confessors, bishops, and spies, which only a natural strength of mind enabled her to support, from which, after unheard-of difficulties, efforts of influential relatives alone succeeded in rescuing her. Such an unveiling, by a truthful and talented artist, of the inner life of Italian nunneries of all descriptions comes most apropos, when the Italian Government has decreed the abolition of these refuges of indolence and vice. This classical production passing from hand to hand, opening the eyes and stirring the indignation of the people, is the most terrible deposition of that power which free Italy is now carrying on before the tribunal of conscience and common sense against the monastic system. I wish you space had permitted one or two extracts from scenes in which the sloth, ignorance, and depravity of the priests of Rome are depicted with a power and eloquence inferior to the pages of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Chapter after chapter is devoted to the jealousy, thefts, pride, lunacy, selfishness and iniquity that reign in these vile prisons from which there is no exit for the unfortunate inmate. Of Cardinal Riario, the present Archbishop of Naples, we have a life-picture after studying which it is no astonishment that he should live in Rome, and not dare show his face in the capital of the South, hunting the very life of the defenceless authoress for the better part of twenty years. It will be a fair specimen of his character. The authoress is married to one of the heroes of Italy, and resides at Castellamare.

PRIESTLY KIDNAPPING IN ROME.

Another Mortara case has occurred in Rome. A poor boy of eleven years of age, the son of Jewish parents, named Cohen, was apprenticed to a fanatic shoemaker, called Messia, whose violent efforts at propagandism, in conjunction with his brother, a priest of Ultramontane views, had become so well known that another Jewish shop-lad was lately withdrawn by his more judicious father. Messia's shop was a rendezvous of priests and Jesuits, especially of those in forced exile from Naples and Sicily, and they aided in the conversion by fair and foul means, of the apprentice from Judaism to Christianity. Young Cohen, who is naturally a timid boy, giving no evidence that he had been impressed by conversations and arguments he overheard in the shop, was sent the other day, with a pair of shoes, to the house of the priest, Messia's brother, and from thence he was forcibly taken to the Hospital of Catechumens.

loud crying and opposition of the boy were only considered as the last efforts of Satan to retain his soul. The whole Jewish community in Rome is in a ferment, and the parents of Cohen are indefatigable in seeking the rescue of their son. Their efforts, as well as the representations of the secretary of the Israelite Society, the French Ambassador, and the professors in the College of Rome, have proved fruitless. The excitement in Rome is so great, that Messina's shop is guarded by five policemen. He parades the streets, and even defiantly strolls through the Ghetto itself. The Pope is said to have offered 1,000*l.* sterling for the father's consent in order to allay the storm, and the official gazette has been obliged to speak on the subject, though insisting that young Cohen has long desired to become a Christian, and that he is now happy amid the caresses of the priests. With a refinement of malice, the father was told that he might see his son, but an interview with the mother was forbidden, an offer which the poor man dared not accept, owing to a law stringently enforced in Rome, and which all those of Hebrew birth knew right well, that any Jew daring to approach or pass this Asylum of Catechumens is immediately seized and imprisoned within its precincts for forty days, during which time he is catechised, and has to pay fines to the establishment and to his gaolers. The Italian press is lifting a loud protest against the toleration of such inhuman practices on the part of the French. Cases of this nature occur frequently, though it is rare that they acquire the celebrity which this one is likely to have.

ANOTHER CASE IN LEGHORN.

The Evangelicals of Leghorn have just been excited by a similar act attempted in the light of day, and under the laws of constitutional Italy. Vanucci, a Capuchin curate, has been intriguing for some time with a schoolmistress for the forcible seizure of one of her pupils, Teresa Michelozzi, fifteen years old, and the child of Evangelical parents, both of them having become members of the Waldensian Church. It appears that the girl, who is of a timid disposition, had been several times taken to the priest's house, where she was made to confess to him, and to listen, on the one hand, to fearful threats of hell if she should embrace the faith of her parents, and, on the other, to promises of great kindness and maintenance as a lady, if she would leave every from home, and put herself under his care. Both threats and blandishments seem to have been thrown away on the simple girl, who stayed at home and frequented the school as before; whereupon she disappeared, and for several days was hid in the houses of the teacher, a bigoted aunt, and of the teacher's friends, all of whom in turn denied having seen the girl. The parents continued, day after day, the most persevering inquiries, tried in vain to move to action the retrograde authorities, and had it not been that public interest became aroused and caused the Capuchin to send back the girl of his own accord, the villanous scheme might have succeeded. The monk has tried to exculpate himself, by writing a letter to our Evangelical newspaper, which has only brought out further confirmations of all the girl herself has deposed, as to the force, fraud, and lying which were employed to coax, frighten, and remove her. Rome, you see, is unchanged in her tactics, and only wants the power, and not the will, to practise the most highhanded injustice. No wonder the joke should be going the round of Italy, "Is there such a thing as a superlative without a positive degree?" "Yes; the word santissimo applied to the Pope is a superlative which has no positive, for he is called santissimo (most holy) without being santo (holy)!"

UNPOPULAR TAXATION—OFFICIAL CORRUPTION.

The malcontents of Italy are coalescing and expressing their mind with more audibleness than usual. The country's difficulty is their opportunity, and they seize it with avidity. In the many and rapid changes that have recently passed over Italy, it was unavoidable that the individuals and coteries, here and there, whose cherished interests were overthrown, should cherish malice towards the powers that be. The most zealous and prudent efforts to overcome the gigantic obstacles to the unification of a long-divided land, have often ended in failure or met with very partial success, and so left many a weak point visible to the open or covert enemy. But there is no serious fear from within. The overwhelming majority of the nation is for constitutional government, and will persevere in the support of it, despite every discouragement and delay. Priestly opposition assumes the form of petty and irritating spite, and reaction shows its head betimes, only to exhibit its impotent treachery. The head and front of the present offending is the immediate introduction of the income-tax, on the English model, from which neither foreigners nor people of 10*l.* annual income are exempt, so wide is the sweep of this naturally unpopular measure. The various clauses of the act read most amusingly like translations of the English law, except that here there is no fixed rate of taxation. The sum to be paid by each person is left to the decision of a District Board of Commissioners, after examination of returned schedules, a most obnoxious feature certainly. The bursting of the bubble company for the construction of the railways of the South has likewise been made another ground for bringing the Italian Parliament into contempt among the people, leading many to cry out for its instant dissolution. It is truly to be regretted that the first native enterprise on a national scale, got up to deliver the country from the exorbitant terms of Rothschild loans and other foreign contracts, should have become so infected with bribery and corruption. Apart from all other sources of profit in the actual construction of the lines of rail, the M.P. and late Finance Minister who started the scheme, was at the outset to pocket 500*l.* sterling on each of the 7,500 kilometres, arising from the difference in price between the terms of concession and contract. The member of the House who brought in the favourable report of the committee, and was instrumental in obtaining the consent of Parliament, was found to have beforehand received for his services 40,000*l.* Neither the high station of the parties concerned, nor the fear of unfriendly criticism, however, prevented the Chambers from exposing the immorality of the transaction, and driving from their presence speechless the authors and abettors of this humiliation to Young Italy.

PROGRESS OF THE MORAL REVOLUTION.

As evidences of social progress, I would refer to the Ministerial circular against duelling, the clearing of the streets of Naples of its hosts of tormenting beggars, and housing them in asylums and workshops, the noble report drawn up lately on the subject of civil marriage, which, to the grief of the Papacy, will shortly become law, the formation of an association among liberal men of all parties, for the defence and development of constitutional rights throughout Italy, the earnestly-expressed wish for the popular election of the clergy, as at Piano, near Sorrento, where, from time immemorial, and through the operation of some old statute, the system has wrought so well, and such worthy priests have been appointed by the parishioners, and the outspoken leaders of the press in favour of the suppression of the out-of-door mummeries of Popery, such as the processions of the "dead Christ," and hideous "Madonnas." There is no doubt that a great moral revolution is now silently working in the minds of thoughtful Italians. It is better that it should work slowly and thoroughly than with violent haste. The remitting efforts of Popery here are well fitted to make lovers of their country think—think deeply and think to purpose. In Perugia some children have been driven from the school because their parents are exiles from Rome for their liberal views. An Evangelical has just died in the public hospital of Ferrara, and his minister, whom he desired so much to see, could neither get access to him while living, nor the liberty of burying him when dead, according to the rites of the Protestant Church. In one place the priests are refusing to baptize any children with the dreaded names of Itala or Vittorio, in another it suffices that they raise the report that a man was a Freemason and had joined the Waldensian Church, for a crowd to surround the funeral pall, and with hootings and stones throwing insult the living and dishonour the dead. These things cannot long be permitted. Italy is in a transition state to liberty of conscience, in theory and fact, or, failing in her high aim, she will return to her slavery of body and soul for centuries.

DR. DE SANCTIS AND SIGNOR MAZZARELLA

[Dr. De Sanctis requests us to insert the following letter, and we deem it but simple justice to comply with his request. We hope, however, that it will be the last upon this unhappy controversy to which it refers.]

May I beg of you kindly to insert these few words in Evangelical Christianity? I do not like discussion in a religious journal, and therefore will not reply, as I might do, either to the letter of Signor Mazzarella, or to that written at his request by Mr. Roberts.

My letter, printed in your July number, was not meant for publication. It was written to a very dear friend of mine, in order to explain frankly the facts of the case. These facts I still maintain, and I am pleased to see that Signor Mazzarella has not denied one of them, but he confined himself to the use of the most vague and ambiguous expressions.

The Christian public will decide which of us has acted in the more Christian way; I, in writing privately to a friend, or Signor Mazzarella in giving publicity to his letter.

I solemnly declare that I have separated myself from the churches called "Free Italian," because I am fully convinced that they are Plymouthists and my conviction is based upon facts which cannot be destroyed by fine words.

hopes thus to obtain the ascendancy of the great movement for reconstituting the Germanic Diet upon a liberal basis, and that he will be able to fix upon that great reorganization the impress of his reactionary policy. I am not now giving expression to imaginary suppositions, but to ideas which are proclaimed with all simplicity and in triumphant tone by the journals of the party. Seeing the Minister whom they admire master of the situation in Germany, they dream of his being already master of the situation in Europe. "It is no longer in London and Paris," they exclaim, "that the destinies of Europe are decided, but at Berlin and Vienna." And doubtless, in their secret thoughts, they associate Russia with this new preponderating influence in Europe — that Russia which has just caused to be hung, at Warsaw, the head of the Polish National Government, and the last of the officers who commanded those troops which were already dead or exiled to Siberia; that Russia which has driven from their country thousands of Circassians, to perish by hunger and disease upon the various desert shores of the East.

Such, at the moment, are facts and appearances. But it is evident to every man who understands the age in which he lives that these triumphs can be but abortive. No one can thrust back humanity in its onward march, nor stifle those rising forces which are in process of development. To say nothing of those winds which blow from the West, and which give another direction to the vessel of European policy, it is certain that a change has come over the spirit of Austria, and she gives the assurance, through her official journals, that she will not assist in subjugating the second-rate states of Germany, in the interest of a system by which she herself must be lowered. These reactionary attempts, therefore, may yet, for a considerable time, prevent the attainment of German unity, and involve this country in long and sharp struggles, and also occasion serious complications in Europe; but the future cannot belong to a worn-out system; the future belongs to the people, under God, by whom they are governed.

RELIGIOUS AGITATION IN THE GRAND DUCHY OF BADEN.

We live in a time when religious struggles in the Church are scarcely less keen than the conflicts which take place in the political world. There is being discussed in the Grand Duchy of Baden, between the two parties which divide the Church, a question which is the more important, as it involves the fundamental principles of Christianity, and is, in reality, the same as that by which the Churches of Germany, Switzerland, France, and Holland are agitated—being nothing less than that of the historical truth of the great supernatural facts upon which rests the entire Gospel. I informed you, in one of my recent letters, that Dr. Schenkel, one of the professors of the University of Heidelberg, who is also the Principal of a Theological Seminary in which all the young ministers of the country must finish their studies, during a twelve-month's residence, has recently published a book, entitled, Charakterbild Jesu, in which he throws doubt upon all those grand historical facts which lie at the foundation of the New Testament. I also told you that a protest had been published, signed by nearly 120 pastors of the country, who had at the same time requested the ecclesiastical authorities to deprive Dr. Schenkel of his functions as principal of the seminary, or that the students of that establishment might be released from the obligation of attending his lectures. In consequence of this, a numerous gathering of the opposite party has taken place at Durlach, and resolutions have been passed in defence of Dr. Schenkel, upon the ground that the tendency of his book has been misrepresented, that it is necessary to maintain the independence of those engaged in imparting instruction, and that it is for the ecclesiastical authorities, and them alone, to pronounce upon the professor's position. At the same time, the question has been brought before the diocesan synods, some of which have pronounced for and others against the professor. Hence has arisen a keen agitation, by which the country is equally divided into two parties. The matter is to be brought immediately before the General Synod, with whom rests the final judgment, and which will thus have to decide whether the teaching of the Church still reposes upon the authority of Scripture and Confessions of Faith, or whether it is to be left to the absolute will of University professors. Whatever may be the decision of that authority, a disruption appears to be impending in the Church; and, in the present state of theological opinion in Germany, there can be no doubt but that the crisis will be repeated in most of the churches of this country. I shall keep your readers acquainted with this serious agitation, which, in principle is exactly similar to that which is taking place in the Reformed Church of France.

THE KIRCHENTAG AND THE GUSTAVUS-ADOLPHUS SOCIETY.

It is very remarkable that it is especially the historical facts of the life of Jesus that are attacked, in the present day, by the negative school, both in theological instruction and literature. Strauss, Renan, Schenkel, and others less widely known, have thought proper, in all their negative utterances, to speak upon the sublime and holy life of our Saviour. Throughout Europe, men who read and reflect have their attention called in this direction. It was therefore natural that the Kirchentag, which has announced that its general meeting will be held at Altenburg, from the 13th to the 16th of September next, should make this vital question the principal subject of its deliberations. It announced the subject in its programme, in these terms: What advantage can the Protestant Church derive from the recent discussions upon the life of Jesus! Professor Dr. Beyschlag, of Halle, and Professor Dr. Hostlin, of Breslau, are appointed to introduce this important question to the notice of the assembly and to open the discussion upon it. Nothing is more opportune and important, in our day, than the consideration of such a subject, to which the most lively interest certainly attaches.

The second subject proposed for deliberation by the Kirchentag is scarcely less opportune and important than that just mentioned. The programme entitles it: Christianity and the People (Christenthum und Volksthum), and it is to be introduced by an essay from Pastor Köllner, of Elberfeld. After this meeting of the Kirchentag has taken place, we shall again have occasion to return to it, as well as to the labours of the Central Society for the Inner Mission, which, as you are aware, holds its annual meeting at the same time as the Kirchentag.

The Central Committee of the Gustavus Adolphus Society has announced that, in consequence of the state in which Germany now finds itself, as the result of the war, the association will not, this year, hold its general meeting; but for this, its labours and the grants made to poor churches would suffer no interruption. We cannot but deeply regret this decision. The absence of a general of this great association, by which est in its efforts has grown, year by tes a deplorable blank. The north ny only could have been affected by and the announcement that this has been arrived at, comes upon us anachronism, just at the moment ace has been concluded. It is at e hoped that political considerations

y taken. On the other hand, I am able to say, that the annual meet-he religious societies of Basle and which have lately been held, have most encouraging character, as re-only the large attendance, but the reported and the beneficial im-derived from the proceedings by

USE OF LEGAL PERSECUTION.

yet much to be done in Germany, aware, for the advancement of re-erty—especially in those Lilliputian which despotism displays itself with unblushing front and unchecked by public opinion. I am led to make this remark by a recent case of legal persecution. Last spring Herr Scheve was put in prison at Bückeburg, the capital of the principality of Schaumburg, for having administered baptism. After a week's imprisonment, Herr Scheve, having been able to procure bail, was set at liberty until his trial should take place. The case came on upon the 13th of June, and he was sentenced to a year and a-half's imprisonment, and to pay the costs of the proceedings; seeing that, besides this baptism, he had twice administered the Lord's Supper. Immediately after this sentence had been pronounced, two members of the Baptist Church at Bückeburg requested an audience of the prince, who received them kindly, but referred them to his Government for a final answer. Herr Scheve has availed himself of this appeal, but with very little hope of success, seeing that he has been proceeded against according to the laws of the country.

Hitherto, so far as we are aware, no decision has been taken relative to Herr Scheve's appeal. Will he really have to expiate, by eighteen months' imprisonment, the crime of having fulfilled the functions of his ministry?
If so, people will really be tempted to believe that Bückeburg, being but little known as the capital of a state, has been desirous of seizing this opportunity to acquire some notoriety.

a twelve o'clock various speakers from Germany, England, and Scotland addressed the meeting, their words being reproduced in the vernacular tongue. Among them were Mr. Fabri, director of the Mission-house at Barmen; the Rev. Dr. Welsh, of Liverpool; Dr. Craig, of Hamburg; and the Rev.

G. Jamieson, of Old Machar, Aberdeen. Dr.
Craig specially referred to the dead state of the Church at Hamburg, and requested the prayers of the Christians of the Netherlands for the Holy Ghost to raise it to new life.
Mr. T. M. Looman, a layman whose efforts for the spread of true religion are unwearied, next read the report of the missionary operations of the societies represented at the gathering, from which it appeared that though some districts of the country are still doing nothing, yet that the interest in missions is spreading.
In South Beveland, in the province of Zeeland, there were even thoughts of having a mission festival.

At three o'clock, speakers took their places at different points in the wooded grounds, where pulpits had been erected, and gave short addresses, intermitted by singing. The Rev. Mr. Stuart, of the Dutch Church, Rotterdam, gave the concluding address, after which all returned to their homes, well satisfied with the day's proceedings. The weather was most favourable, and during the pauses many enjoyed the shady walks, plucking the blue berries, which were in abundance and having friendly Christian intercourse. These missionary meetings in the open have awakened general interest, and calls have been made by various districts for the privilege of being the locality of the next annual feast.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, July 26, 1864.

EXCITING SCENES IN CONSTANTINOPLE—ARREST OF THE CONVERTS FROM MOHAMMEDANISM—SEIZURE OF THE PROTESTANT MISSIONARY ESTABLISHMENTS.

On Sunday, July 17, the Turkish police arrested all the Turkish converts to Christianity whom they could find in Constantinople, except the women and children.

The Rev. Mr. Williams (Selim Agha), who is now in the employ of the English Propagation Society, was arrested about noon, just as he was entering the chapel of that society in Pera. Two officers seized him suddenly, and dragged him, in the roughest manner, through the whole length of the Grand Rue de Pera to the central police station of that quarter. He reports that he was there insulted and abused by the officers for some two hours, and then suddenly set at liberty, with many apologies for his arrest, and the assurance that it was all a mistake. Why he was thus dismissed is a mystery, but possibly it may have been because he was known to be a regularly-ordained clergyman of the English Church. The Turks say, however, that it was because he was arrested in Pera, which is regarded as a sort of privileged Christian quarter.

The other converts were less fortunate. They are still held in confinement in the great prison of Constantinople. It is understood that there are eight of them, among the number Achmet Agha, who made such a noble confession of his Christian faith before the court of the Sheik-ul-Islam some two years ago. He is in the employ of the American Mission, and was enticed out of the house of an American missionary in Galata, and arrested in the street before his door. These men were brought before the police court the same day, and charged with being renegades and infidels. They boldly declared themselves Christians, and claimed their right to be so, under the Hatti-houmayoun, which gave religious liberty to the Turkish Empire. But this plea was not allowed; they were thrown into prison, where they have remained ever since in close confinement, all access to them having been refused since Wednesday last week. The English and American missionaries have made every effort to obtain their release, but as yet without success. The English and American Embassies have both represented their case unofficially to the Turkish Government, and there is but very little doubt that the men will be liberated in a few days; but it is certain that it was the original intention of the Government to banish them to some place in the far interior, from which they would probably have never returned. The Government have been shown, however, that this course would call down upon them the indignation of all Christendom, and they are now inclined to give them up.

SUMMARY SEIZURE OF THE ENGLISH AND AMERICAN MISSIONARY ESTABLISHMENTS.

On Monday, the day after the arrests above mentioned, the police took still more decided measures against Protestant missions, in deliberate violation of the most solemn treaties and of the customs of the Turkish Empire for many years past. The most flagrant acts were the arrest of the Rev. Mr. Curtis, of the Propagation Society, and the closing of the large establishment occupied in common by the British and Foreign Bible Society, the American Bible Society, and the American Board of Missions.

Foreign residents in Turkey are not subject to Turkish laws, neither are they in any way under the control of the Turkish police. This is the fundamental principle which regulates the relations of foreign residents to the Turkish Government. At an annual expense of many thousand pounds, the English Government maintains a system of consular courts, to administer to English subjects English law, and no Turkish police officer has any more right to arrest the person or enter the house of an Englishman, in Constantinople, than he would have to do the same thing in London. If the Turkish Government has any complaint to make against any English subject, they must do it through the consular court. If an arrest is to be made, it must be by an officer with a warrant from that court. These same rights are guaranteed by treaty to all other foreign residents. In the face of these rights, the Rev. Mr. Curtis was arrested by the Turkish police, without a warrant, for no greater crime than that of looking at the outside of the door of his room, which they had illegally closed and sealed. He was detained in custody for some time before he was allowed to go.

When the officers of the police came to close the Bible-house, they found there the Rev. Mr. Washburn, the treasurer of the American Board of Missions, and Mr. Sellar, the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society. These gentlemen refused absolutely to allow their building to be closed by the Turkish police, and solemnly protested, in the name of the English and American Governments, against this attempted violation of their rights. This protest, it seems, had been anticipated, and the officer, after some hesitation, said that, under these circumstances, he was ordered simply to place two armed men at the door, to prevent the taking of anything from the building. This he did, and Mr. Sellar and Mr. Washburn immediately went to Pera, to enter their protests and obtain protection from the English and American Embassies. During their absence, the officer returned with peremptory orders to close and seal the building instantly; by force, if necessary. Fortunately, the Rev. Mr. Bliss, agent of the American Bible Society, had arrived meanwhile, and he protested in the most energetic manner against this violation of the rights of English and American citizens, urging the officer to wait at least until the return of the gentlemen from the embassies. It was all in vain; the officer was accompanied by soldiers, his orders were to use them, if necessary, and he gave Mr. Bliss his choice to walk out or to be carried out by the soldiers. The street was filled with an excited crowd, and it seemed better to make no further resistance. The building was immediately closed, sealed, and put under a guard of Turkish soldiers.

On the same day, the rooms of the Church Missionary and Gospel Propagation Societies were closed in the same illegal manner; but as it happened, before the arrival of any of the missionaries, so that no resistance could be made on the spot.

Several printing establishments and book stores, belonging to natives, were also seized in the same manner, and many other arrests were made of persons suspected of being in sympathy with Protestantism. The Protestant chapels, however, were not molested.

These things occurred on the day when the Sultan made his annual visit to the Porte, to receive from his Ministers their official report of the state of the empire, and he was probably informed on that occasion that he had nothing more to fear from Protestantism.

REOPENING OF THE BIBLE-HOUSE AND OTHER ROOMS.

Earnest appeals for protection were made on Monday to the English and American Embassies, and the same evening Mr. Brown, the American chargé d'affaires, addressed an energetic protest to Aali Pasha, in reference to the affair of the Bible-house. He followed it up by a personal visit on Tuesday, which resulted in an offer on the part of Aali Pasha to order the immediate opening of the building, and the assurance that the Government were ready to apologise for the illegal manner in which it had been closed. He said, however, that the building had been shut on account of the grossly illegal action of its occupants, who had established secret printing-presses, and had printed and sold their books, containing violent and outrageous attacks upon the faith of the Sultan. Of these facts they had undoubted evidence. As it seemed most desirable to satisfy the Turkish Government of the absolute falsity of this charge against the Bible Societies and the American Mission, Mr. Brown challenged the Government to search the building, which was still under their seal. They consented to do it that day, but, for the convenience of Mr. Brown, it was postponed until Wednesday morning, when the building was opened and business there resumed.

The Turkish officers examined the immense stock of books on hand, which were mostly Bibles in some twenty languages, and on Thursday declared themselves perfectly satisfied that the charges against these societies were without any foundation whatever. Mr. Brown has demanded that the American Mission be authorised to publish an official apology from the Turkish Government for its illegal action and for the unjust charges made against the American missionaries.

The greatest credit is due to Mr. Brown for the energy and promptness with which he has acted in this matter, both officially and unofficially—securing the immediate opening of the Bible-house, the release of the printing establishments where the Turkish and Bulgarian Scriptures are printed, and the favourable consideration of the Government toward those in prison.

On Saturday the rooms of the Gospel Propagation Society in Stamboul were opened, but no service was allowed there on Sunday. Yesterday the rooms of the Church Missionary Society were opened, but most of the books and manuscripts there were seized by the officers who opened the rooms.

Sir Edmund Hornby, the supreme judge of the consular court, pronounces this action of the Turkish Government against the English and American missionaries to be the most flagrant violation of the established rights of foreign residents which he has ever known. As soon as it came to his knowledge, he addressed a demand for explanation to the Minister of Police, the highest authority with which he can officially communicate, but received no reply.

WHY DID THE TURKS ADOPT THESE EXTRAORDINARY MEASURES AGAINST THE PROTESTANTS ?

The measures above mentioned were not adopted hastily. For many weeks the missionaries have been beset with spies at every step, and the measures taken have been for several weeks under the consideration of the Government.

In my last letter I informed you of the reports in circulation, among all classes here, in reference to the conversion of many thousand Turks to Protestantism. I have now every reason to believe that the explanation then given of these stories was in a general way correct. There is a movement among the Turks in favour of reforming their faith. They have actually petitioned the Government to be set off by themselves, and to have the use of a mosque to worship in ; but beyond these two facts, the stories are so contradictory, that we cannot tell which is true.

The news of this movement came to the ears of the Sultan—probably in an exaggerated form—and he was told that it was the result of the labours of the Protestant missionaries, who were attacking his faith in the most violent manner. It is doubtful whether this information was carried to him through French-Catholic intrigue, or whether the missionaries were simply used by a party among the Turks to overthrow the ministry of Fuad Pasha, by representing him as friendly to these new movements. The Government of Fuad Pasha, however, found it necessary to take some extreme measures to satisfy the Sultan, quiet the fanatics save themselves.

I have the authority of a high Turkish official for saying that Sir Henry Bulwer consulted, and that the action of last week was taken by his advice. However this be, it is certain, that he was aware two weeks ago that some such action was about to be taken, and that he did not object to it, kept it a profound secret from the mission. It is also certain, that after the action taken he took no active measures for the protection of the missionaries, until he was driven to it by the terrible storm of indignation which burst upon him from all sides. It seems very certain, too, that the Turks have never dared to insult and trample on the plainest rights of English citizens here, if they had not felt very sure of the sympathy of the British Ambassador. His plea in defence, that he believed that we were on the eve of a terrible revolution in Constantinople, could only be averted in this way. If he believed this story, he was probably the person in Constantinople who did.

THE CHARGES BROUGHT AGAINST THE PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES.

The principal charges brought against Protestant missionaries are the following. They are said to have made violent attacks upon Mohammedanism, to have paid agents to attack their old faith in the khans and bazaars, and especially to have secretly published and circulated various books, which call the Prophet an impostor and his religion a vile delusion. Three books, written by Rev. Dr. Pfander, of the Church Missionary Society, are cited as examples. These three books (and especially the second of them) are indeed the chief nominal cause of all the wrongs perpetrated by the Turkish police last week, and this action of the Government is perhaps the highest compliment which they could have paid to the ability and skill of Rev. Dr. Pfander.

The "Mezau-ul-Hakk" of Dr. Pfander was first published in Persian, and Persian copies have been in circulation in Constantinople many years, which have gradually come from the Turkish Custom-house, where a large box of them was confiscated, but destroyed, many years ago. The name is "The Balance of Truth." The book consists of three parts. The first is a defence of Christianity against charges made by Mohammedans. The second part is a statement of the doctrines of Christianity. The third part proves that the Koran cannot be an in-book, and consequently that Mohammedanism cannot be of Divine origin.

When this veteran and honoured missionary was transferred by the Church Missionary Society to Constantinople, he prepared, and sought permission to publish, an edition of the same work in Turkish. Permission to publish was refused. It was then printed in England and brought into Turkey, without the knowledge of the Government. It has been in circulation here for two years, however, among all classes, and a most violent and abusive answer to the Persian edition was published here, with the consent of the Government, before it was translated into Turkish. The first book of Dr. Pfander was in the Trinity, and was published in Turkish about four years ago, without attracting much attention. The third book was published about one year ago, and is a reply to this attack upon the second.

Whether it is good policy to circulate such a book as the "Mézu-ul-Hakk" in the commencement of a missionary work among the Mohammedans, is a question upon which there is a difference of opinion. The American missionaries have generally regarded it as ill-timed, and they have avoided the use of it.

It has never been sold at their book-store in the Bible-house, but the Rev. Dr. Pfander—whose judgment and Christian character command the respect of all—regards this work as one of the most important instruments for awakening the Mohammedan mind from its lethargy, and leading it to the truth. It is not for us to pronounce judgment between these conflicting opinions of men of equal experience, and who equally command the respect of the Christian world, especially as, notwithstanding this difference upon a single point, they are working together in the fullest sympathy for the conversion of Turkey.

As to the other charges of the Government, it is probably true that there has been some indiscreet preaching of the truth in public places by one or two individuals; but no tumult has ever been excited, nor has any serious difficulty ever occurred in such cases. In general the greatest care has been taken not to wound the pride of the people unnecessarily, nor to make any violent attacks in public or private upon the faith of the people. As a ground for any action on the part of the Government, the charge is absolutely unfounded.

POSTSCRIPT.

Constantinople, August 3, 1864.

The following extract from the Levant Herald of last Wednesday, which bears the authority of Sir Henry Bulwer, proves the groundlessness of the hopes expressed in the former part of this letter, and merits the attention of every Christian in England:—

The "difficulty" between the Porte and the Protestant missionaries has been arranged on a basis which, if not all that the latter could wish for, will perhaps, under all the circumstances, be generally regarded as equitable and satisfactory. The book-stores and offices of the several societies have been reopened, and full liberty given to their agents to preach to all comers in their respective chapels and private houses, but not in the khans* or other public places of Stamboul. The free sale of the Bible in book-stores† is permitted, but not its colportage about the capital, nor either the sale or gratuitous distribution of controversial works attacking Mohammedanism. The native converts under arrest are, "for their own protection, and as a measure of precaution against popular excitement," to be temporarily removed from the capital to some English consular station in the provinces, the Porte engaging to provide for their families during their absence. Such, briefly detailed, are the terms of the settlement come to between the Government and Sir Henry Bulwer.

A long official letter addressed to the Constantinople Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, by Sir Henry, corroborates the above extract in substance, but states that he waits for final instructions from England before completing this "arrangement."

His letter, with the reply of the Evangelical Alliance, will be forwarded as soon as possible to the Alliance in England for publication, so that we do not need to discuss the subject in detail here.

But it may be said in brief that this "arrangement" puts an end at once to religious liberty in Turkey, so far as Protestantism is concerned, and will make missionary labour for Greeks, Armenians, Turks, and Jews, at once impracticable.

It is so understood by them, and the organ of the Greek Patriarchate contained on Saturday a jubilant editorial congratulating the Porte upon this step, and rejoicing over the final overthrow of all Protestant missions in Turkey.

The principle of religious liberty now laid down by the Turkish Government and approved by the British Ambassador is this: Every man is at liberty to continue quietly in the profession of the faith of his fathers, whatever it may be, but he is not at liberty to invite or persuade any one else to change their former faith for his. If, however, any person, without invitation or persuasion, desires to change his religion quietly, he is at liberty to do so, but the Porte in this case reserves to itself the right to exile him, "for his own protection," but not as a punishment. Under this system it is plain that all missionary labour is impossible, and religious liberty exists only in name. This is the principle which is about to be enforced, with Sir Henry's consent, upon the poor Turkish converts now in prison—no one of whom has ever been a preacher, or even a colporteur, and only one of whom is in any way in the pay of any missionary society.

* The khans in Constantinople occupy a place similar to the buildings in English cities which are used as rooms by room, some for offices, some for storage, and some for sleeping apartments.

† These book-stores, however, must be specially licensed.

This surrender of religious liberty is made only by the British Ambassador, as the representative of Protestantism. The Jesuit missions are undisturbed, although they have publicly baptized more Turks than the Protestants. They have the fullest liberty to proselytise in all directions, and their converts are secure from all persecution. They are not even exiled "for their own safety." The Turkish Government would as soon think of declaring war with France as of restricting Catholic missions; but having the full sympathy of the British Ambassador, they have taken a step against Protestant missions which places them in a worse position than that which they occupied before the publication of the Hatti-houmayoun.

It is a fact worth noting that the chief dragoman of the English Embassy here, through whom business is transacted at the Porte, is a most devoted Roman Catholic, and neither an Englishman nor in sympathy with English ideas.*

AMERICA.

New York, August 8, 1864.

THE NATIONAL FAST—MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ASPECT OF THE WAR.

The fourth day of August was very reverently observed as a day of "fasting, humiliation, and prayer," on account of the state of the country. An unusual interest attaches to the form of the call for this service. I enclose a copy, although it may already have been reprinted in your journals. You will see that the observance of such a day was proposed by the Senate and the House of Representatives, in language exceedingly devout and significant. One object of the day, according to the joint resolution of these bodies, was to be, to implore God "not to suffer us to be destroyed by obstinate adhesion to our own counsels, which may be in conflict with His eternal purposes." It can scarcely be supposed that all those who voted for the adoption of this language contemplated the same form of national obstinacy, or anticipated the same answer to the proposed prayer. But it is hardly possible to think of a petition that should be more appropriate to our condition. The recent repulse which our arms have sustained before Petersburg, and of which you will have received the tidings, and the successive incursions which the Confederate troops have made upon Maryland and Pennsylvania, contributed not a little to the production of a serious temper, in full sympathy with the design of the day. It would not be possible for Christian men to engage in such a service, at such a time, without the most careful review of all the feelings which they were cherishing in regard to the war and its aims. Not a congregation assembled on that day which had not felt, in some form, the fearful burden of this protracted contest. Scarcely a minister spoke who did not address the mourners for the slain. It would be natural, then, to suppose that the prevailing prayer of the nation would be for peace. That all most earnestly desire so great a blessing, is most true; and it is also true that many would secure it upon any terms. But I am sure that a far larger part of our people, including the vast majority of those who have the disposition to come near to God in humiliation and prayer, as firm as ever in their conviction that duty to God and to their country binds them to prosecute the war to a decisive issue. This conviction is not shaken, but confirmed, by the religious observance of a day of prayer. The men who are furthest from the indulgence of vindictive feeling towards our enemies, who care the least about the mere humiliation of failure, who have the keenest sense of the untold wretchedness that attends upon war, especially upon civil war, who have the least sympathy with that self-righteous complacency which would make the war a rebuke only of other men's sins—the most thoughtful, dispassionate, Christian men of our nation—these are they who are feeling to

HELP FOR THE FREEDMEN—AFRICAN CHURCHES.

I alluded in my last letter to the sincere sympathy and help which the condition of the freedmen and their families is eliciting from nearly all our Churches. The Old School General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, at its last session, appointed two committees to solicit and disburse the charitable gifts of its congregations in behalf of these most interesting and needy people. The other Assembly required its "Board of Home Missions" to undertake the same duty. The Synod of the Reformed Dutch Church assigned a similar task to its "Board of Domestic Missions." Meanwhile the Freedmen's Relief Association and the American Missionary Society devote themselves especially to this field. Under these auspices, schools are opened at Port Royal, at Norfolk, and at other camps where the freedmen have been congregated by the Government. The pressing temporal wants of the poor outcasts are met, and a fair and most promising beginning is made of this most Christian labour. It may give your readers some idea both of the numbers of the fugitives from slavery, and of the character of many of them, to know that since the beginning of the war more than thirty thousand members are officially stated to have been added to the two branches of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in the Northern and Border States.

A delegation from these African Methodist Evangelical Churches took part in a most interesting scene in the late meeting of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. They were five in number, and each of them addressed the body with great ability and effect. One of them gave the following important statistics of their churches. Their Church property they estimate at two millions of dollars. They have 1,000 travelling preachers, and 500 local preachers, and about twenty missionaries. Their members are about 50,000. This number includes the increase of 30,000 alluded to above. They have 1,200 day-schools and a thousand coloured teachers. There are 10,000 children in their Sabbath-schools, and, what is perhaps most interesting and promising of all, they have nearly a hundred students in the college in which their ministers are instructed. After the communication of these important facts, one of their number, while he thanked the Conference for their sympathy and fellowship, said: "We are struggling for self-elevation. We are striving to be men. We are labouring to disseminate Christianity among our people, and we ask your aid." Amidst the applause which greeted these manly expressions, one of the most venerable ministers of the Conference arose, and having responded with proper feeling, grasped each delegate by the hand with cordial expressions of fraternal affection. The crisis through which the coloured race are now passing gave an interest to the interview which it would not have had at other times, and many of the observers were moved to tears.

NORTHERN MINISTERS IN SOUTHERN PULPITS. MISSIONS.

The war is raising some novel questions concerning the relations of the Government to the Churches in the recovered territory. It appears very plain that the privilege of the Sabbath and a sacred place ought not to be pleaded for the propagation of treason. Disloyal clergymen, accordingly, have been forbidden to preach wherever our arms have control. The pulpits would therefore be silent, if other ministers were not provided in their places. The Government, accordingly, has placed the church-buildings of the South in the hands of the corresponding denominations of the North; and these have accepted the charge, and are attempting to rally the disbanded congregations to the preaching of loyal men. It is a delicate undertaking. In some few instances, it has been marked by signal success. But it will need the wisdom of the serpent, and the harmlessness of the dove, to ensure any large and general results. We watch the effort with great interest. The Congregationalist churches are entering upon this work with especial zeal. Hitherto they have scarcely found foothold at the South. Their general and avowed antagonism to slavery would, under ordinary circumstances, exclude them from every Southern community. It is a singular experiment which they now propose to make, to carry at once religious and moral and political truth to men who have not been willing to hear either from their lips. It will be another evidence of the striking changes which are passing over our land, if the undertaking shall succeed.

I am glad to be able to say that our missionary boards, which have suffered not a little in their available resources by the depreciation of the currency, are meeting hearty responses to their appeals for help. It is not probable that any of them will be seriously restricted in their work on account of the war.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON'S FUND.

It is now rather more than a year ago since the Bishop of London made an appeal to the liberality of his diocese on behalf of the spiritual wants of the metropolis. The sum he at first proposed to raise was 100,000*l.* in the course of ten years, at the rate of 10,000*l.* a-year; but that estimate had hardly been proposed when it was discovered to be totally inadequate to the requirements of the diocese, and the total amount was at once enlarged to ten times the sum, or a million sterling, at the rate of 100,000*l.* a-year. The first twelve months having elapsed, the Bishop of London called the executive committee together, to report the progress that had been made, and laid before them a statement full of interesting details, from which we take the more prominent points.

It appears that for the first year they had received 75,000*l.* in cash, and promises of money, to be paid by instalments, to the extent of 76,000*l.* more, or 151,000*l.* in all. At first sight it would appear that the sanguine anticipations of the bishop had been more than realised; but a little consideration will show that this is not the fact. The 75,000*l.* is all that has been received in this year's operations; the 76,000*l.* of promises apply not to this year at all, nor even wholly to the next, but are to be spread over the whole of the remaining nine years. The first year's subscription has, therefore, fallen short to the extent of 25,000*l.*, or one-fourth of the whole. And it must be remembered that the subscriptions already received represent the spontaneous and unsolicited generosity of the diocese; all the rest must be obtained by more or less of solicitation and pressure. Still, we think the bishop has good grounds for his confidence, that, when the plan is better known, the local committees set in motion, and the nature of the work intended to be done made clear, the full amount will be realised. On this point, the bishop has judged wisely that the best way of explaining the nature of the work to the world is to let them see it in actual operation.

The applications for aid to this fund have called forth some correspondence, on the part gentlemen, with houses in town, to be called on to contribute for al destitution in the metropolis. hat the wants of their own parishes istry are equally pressing, and that with more or less of liberality to heir duty there, where their pro-

YAN METHODIST CONFERENCE.

George Osborn, retired from the l chair to which he had been elected thren at its commencement. The chosen as his successor, by a large was the Rev. W. L. Thornton, the ditor of the official publications of an Church. Mr. Thornton, in the etween the two Conferences, had mission with which he had been by the earlier of these, as its repre- to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and to an Conferences of Canada and of : Provinces, on the St. Lawrence, wo last of which he presided. the Conference, properly so called, clusively of ministers, its functions, a to all matters partaking of a se- re, are now shared by laymen. The s, as the collective pastorate of the Church, retains its sole authority of doctrine and in the discipline a members, but its decisions upon e subjects involving a pecuniary element, are based upon the recommendations of deliberative bodies specially convened for the purpose, and consisting of laymen as well as ministers. These "committees of review," as they are called, discuss the several subjects brought before them in all their bearings, and the conclusions at which they arrive are remitted to the Conference, and almost invariably adopted. Each of these committees represents a different department of labour, and is freely open to the Methodist public, it being understood that no one except members of the committees shall take part in their proceedings except by permission. That this is felt to be an improvement upon the old system, in which no such usage existed, appears from the remarks of a venerable member of the body and former President, the Rev. Thomas Jackson, who said:—

He would, as an old Methodist preacher, declare the great satisfaction he felt in witnessing, from year to year, such an extensive gathering of lay friends to attend the Conference. (Hear.) He recollected the time when no man ever thought of coming to the Conference but a Methodist preacher. This assembling of the lay friends in their annual committees gave an energy to the Conference which it never had before. (Hear, hear.) It told on the public mind; it told on the Methodist community, and he would express his sincere gratitude to God, who had put it into the hearts of their lay friends thus to congregate and to aid them by their counsel, and give them the benefit of their experience. (Hear, hear.)

In fact, Mr. Jackson referred to these mixed committees as the grand and the best characteristic feature of modern Methodism—as its greatest engine for the purposes of general impression and impulse, and as having "solved the problem of religious liberty" and ecclesiastical government in its application to the conditions of modern society.

The subjects brought under the consideration of these mixed "committees of review" include education (Sunday-schools, day-schools, the academies for the sons of ministers, and the Theological Institutions, or Seminaries), chapel building and extension, home and foreign missions, and Sabbath observance. The tendency on the part of those who possess the greatest weight in the deliberations of the Conference would seem to be to avail themselves more and more of lay assistance. This was shown in the course of a discussion on a proposal to appoint a second clerical secretary for chapel-building affairs. The Rev. Dr. Osborn (the ex-President) said:—

It was perfectly true that if the present system of administering their chapel affairs was to go on unrelieved and undisturbed, they must have another secretary. It was perfectly true that that second secretary must be a minister. It was perfectly true that in seven years more four secretaries would not be enough, and in seven years more they would probably want twice four, and that all those must be ministers. Now he would draw the line boldly, and say that the system must be altered. (Hear, hear.) What was the business of the Chapel Committee? The building of chapels. Who were to build the chapels? The people. Who were to find the money? The people. To whom did the property belong? To the people. What was their interest in it as ministers? To see that they had constant access to the pulpits, and that no other doctrines but their own were preached there. He held that when this body of ministers had provided for those functions, it ought to wash its hands of everything else.

The result was that a resolution was carried, by way of amendment to the original motion, appointing a committee to consider how relief might be afforded to the present secretary "without setting apart another minister."

In another direction, the action of the Conference shows that it is determined not to remain stationary. One report of the proceedings says :—

Many circuits ask for the appointment of home missionary ministers, and many others ask to be divided, so that the labours of resident ministers may be more concentrated. The sanction given by the Conference to many cases of this sort indicates a growing desire for such a modification of the itinerancy as is compatible with the genius and constitution of Methodism.

It appeared that, during the year, upwards of 142,000*l.* had been raised for chapel purposes, and that during the previous nine years upwards of half-a-million of chapel debts had been liquidated. In the latter period, however, new debts have been contracted to the amount of 240,000*l.* Several munificent donations, the most noticeable of which was that by Mr. Fernley, of a chapel at Southport, which cost upwards of 8,000*l.*, were announced in this department. The progress of the Watering-places Chapel Fund was reported by the Rev. Mr. Punshon, to whom it owes its existence. It appears that grants had been made from this fund to the extent of 3,000*l.*, to meet an outlay of 17,227*l.*, providing 6,425 sittings, in chapels built, or to be built, at Eastbourne, Ilfracombe, Llandudno, Southbourne, Ambleside, Dawlish, Malvern, Keswick, Torquay, Filey, Matlock, Bath, and other places.

Home missions formed the subject of much interesting discussion. "Many admirable speeches were delivered," we are told, "full of heart, spirit, and practical suggestion." It was stated that the home missionary movement is taking a firmer hold of the Connexion every day. Altogether twenty married ministers were employed, during last year, in this department. Five of these have been at work in London. During the ensuing year, ten are to be employed in the metropolis. A constant process of absorption goes on from the Home Missions into the ordinary system of Wesleyan circuit itinerancy.

The Sunday-scholars in connexion with the Wesleyan body number upwards of half-a-million; the Sunday-schools, 4,895. In accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of Review on Education, the Conference appointed a minister to act as visitor of the Sunday-schools of the Connexion, and to report upon their condition. It was suggested that ultimately the body ought to establish a Sunday-school Union exclusively for the Wesleyan body. Dr. Waddy made a remark which might well find an echo in other denominations besides his own. He felt, he said, that there was nothing so humiliating as the comparison of the great number of their Sunday-school children with the small number who were, from time to time, introduced into their Church.

It was announced that the Jubilee Fund of the Wesleyan Missionary Society amounts to 190,000*l.* One of the objects which this large sum has enabled the society to achieve is the purchase of the Wesleyan Theological Institution at Richmond, which will henceforth be employed as a college for the training of missionaries. For the home ministry another theological seminary is to be obtained.

The decrease, though but numerically small, in the membership of the body, was the subject of serious deliberation and earnest prayer by the Conference. The President said he felt that the present was a time for looking within. Daniel in Babylon, confessing his own sins and the sins of his people, was the example to be followed. He believed that the organization of Methodism demanded a spirituality in its agents even higher than that of other churches, connexionalism having a tendency to diminish the sense of personal responsibility. No responsibility in the dependent universe was equal to that of a Christian minister. The Rev. Wm. Arthur, on being called upon by the President, said that he had been struck with the absence of discouragement and indifference in relation to the fact that during the year there had been a small decrease in the number of members. The oneness of the whole Connexion on the question of the Jubilee of the Missionary Society; the spiritual influence resting upon the Jubilee meetings; and the liberal contributions to the Jubilee Fund—were all tokens of good. He was not discouraged, but he regarded the present state of things as a call of God. He did not sympathise with those who explained the decrease on the ground of removals, deaths, and other elements. Methodism was not merely to exist, but to aid in the conversion of the world. There was a danger of their becoming too ecclesiastical. The reading of sermons was a symptom on which he could not look but with suspicion. In elaborate analysis of the circuit schedules was then read. From this analysis it appeared, according to the returns of the March quarter-day, that the number of members in the Wesleyan Methodist societies in Great Britain was 329,668. The number on trial or church-membership was 18,080. In 271 circuits there was a net increase of 7,248, and in 226 circuits a net decrease of 7,284, so that the net decrease on the whole society was thirty-six. On the motion of the Rev. W. Arthur, a resolution, appointing Friday, September 30, as a day of humiliation and prayer throughout the Connexion, was adopted.

At an "open session" of Conference, the President gave, before a crowded audience, a graphic account of his visit to America and Canada. We quote one extract:—

One of the most interesting events in connexion with the General Conference was the introduction of five coloured clergymen, representing the African Episcopal Church. Some of them were bishops. They spoke most earnestly and solemnly; and one, the youngest and darkest-hued, was as eloquent as Mr. Punshon. He said, "Do not treat us as aliens and strangers. We do not wish that. We will thankfully accept your counsel and directions; only look upon us as brethren, and give us your aid." May 15th was a memorable day in the history of the American churches and of the anti-slavery movement. And he was informed that for twenty years past the coloured people in the North had been praying constantly for the relief and emancipation of their coloured brethren in the South, many of whom were their immediate relatives. So it was that in answer to prayer the Lord was breaking the fetters of the slave.

THE REV. BAPTIST NOEL AND THE REV. MR. SPURGEON.

The popular Baptist preacher has surprised and grieved moderate men both among churchmen and Dissenters. In two sermons he preached, on the subject of baptismal regeneration, he adopted and reiterated the charges which some of those who took part in the Bicentenary movement urged against the Evangelical clergy—that of subscribing to the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, and the sake of holding a living, which the whole of their subsequent conduct and preaching was a protest against; and their dishonesty was contrasted with the straightforwardness of the Tractarian party, who consistently maintained the doctrines which were set forth in the Prayer-book. These trenchant censures have called forth a reproof—we cannot call it a rebuke, so mild and gentle it is—from the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, who, having left the Establishment himself because, among other reasons, he condemned the doctrine in question, comes forward with the more grace and authority to plead for the honesty and uprightness of the men who, holding the views he does, do yet not see it their duty to do as he has done.*

VIOLATION OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN TURKEY.

A deputation from the British and Foreign Bible Society, introduced by its President, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and consisting of James Farish, Esq., J. T. Thomas, Esq., W. M. Arthur, Esq., W. Coles, Esq., the Rev. Dr. Thomson, and the Rev. Charles Jackson, Secretary, waited by appointment on Earl Russell, at the Foreign-office, on the 12th ult., to ask his interposition on behalf of the agents of the above society, who have been treated with great indignity by the Turkish police, and whose humble work of Bible distribution has not only been temporarily interrupted, but is threatened with entire suspension. The following is a copy of the memorial, to which the Committee asked the favourable attention of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. According to the latest accounts, eleven converts are still in prison for conscience' sake:—

To the Right Hon. the Earl Russell, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Memorial of the Officers and Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

The Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society most earnestly request the attention of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the recent proceedings of the Turkish Government at Constantinople, by which a gross insult has been offered to their agents resident there, and a grievous wrong done to the society which your memorialists represent.

Without any warning previously given, or any ground on which to justify the course taken but their own unfounded suspicions, the Turkish Government expelled the officials of the British and Foreign Bible Society from their own dépôt, locking and sealing the doors, which they afterwards guarded with armed police, and refusing all access to the premises for the space of two days.

Such proceedings are in direct violation of pledges frequently given by the Sultan, as well as his responsible ministers, to the effect that full religious liberty should be granted to all classes of his subjects, and that no penalty should attach to the profession of the Christian faith.

* Mr. Noel's letter has been published by Messrs. Nisbet and Co.

As long ago as March, 1844, Sir Stratford Canning wrote to the Earl of Aberdeen to the following effect: "The Sultan gave me his royal word that henceforward neither should Christianity be insulted in his dominions nor should Christians be in any way persecuted for their religion."

In January, 1856, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe forwarded to the Earl of Clarendon a memorandum, in which he set forth the views of the British Government on the subject of religious liberty. He urged that "Religious toleration shall be fully carried out, so that no one shall be insulted on account of his religious opinions."

In the same year, in a note addressed to the Porte, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe speaks still more strongly. He says: "The British Government distinctly demands that the Mohammedan who turns Christian shall be as free from every kind of punishment as the Christian who embraces the Mohammedan faith;" and finally, as the result of these noble efforts in the cause of toleration and religious liberty, a Firman and Hatti-sherif was granted in February, 1856, which declared:—

"As all forms of religion are, and shall be, freely professed in my dominions, no subject of my empire shall be hindered in the exercise of the religion he professes, nor shall he be in any way annoyed on this account."

Unless all the labour hitherto bestowed on this all-important question is to be thrown away, and a retrograde movement is to take place in the policy which, for many years past, has been pursued, your memorialists venture to express their opinion that the recent indignity perpetrated by the Turkish Government upon the agents of this society calls for loud remonstrance and decided action on the part of the British Minister in upholding the law. It has produced intense indignation in the minds of all classes of European Christians resident at Constantinople, as well as of the members of the American and Dutch Legations, who feel, that to permit such proceedings to pass without redress would be to sacrifice that security of person and property on the attainment of which so much labour has been bestowed, and for the guarantee of which the most solemn engagements have been given.

The present is not the only instance in which the Turkish authorities have recently acted at variance with their professions of religious toleration, and in which the representative of the British Government at Constantinople has failed to maintain the principles of religious liberty which has been already conceded.

As the copies of the Holy Scriptures circulated by the British and Foreign Bible Society at Constantinople are subject to duty prescribed by the Turkish tariff, the society is entitled to claim the fullest liberty of disposing of these Scriptures, by sale or otherwise, throughout the whole Turkish Empire, a liberty which must be guarded with the utmost jealousy, in consequence of its inseparable connexion with the sacred freedom of conscience and religious worship secured by the Sultan to all classes of his subjects by the Hatti-Humayoun of 1856.

Notwithstanding this, however, a colporteur in the employment of the society, usually resident at Shumla, in Eastern Bulgaria, was, in the year 1862, subject to insult and imprisonment, and finally prohibited by the Pasha of Silistria from selling the Scriptures within that Pashalic. Rev. Dr. Thomson, the agent of this society at Constantinople, laid these facts before the British Ambassador, and sought for a removal of the unjust and illegal restrictions; but no redress obtained, nor any answer given. If any dependence may be placed upon reports now in circulation, the Porte has it in view to forbid the sale of the Scriptures altogether by our colporteurs, a restriction which would be most unjust and offensive, since these men take no part in religious controversy, never even preach the Gospel, or distribute tracts, but confine themselves wholly to the sale of the Scriptures, without note or comment.

The Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society cannot contemplate without alarm the persecution to which converts from Mohammedanism have been exposed, the only reason given for their imprisonment and banishment being the same that was alleged nine years ago—viz., that such a step was necessary "to evade the violence and deceive the bigotry of an exasperated populace." They have reliable information that no such violence is to be apprehended, and they have every reason to believe that firmness shown by the representative of the British Government in maintaining the law would have obviated all the difficulties the existence of which they now deplore.

If religious liberty in Turkey is to be a reality and not a mere name, they earnestly entreat Her Majesty's Government not to permit the most solemn pledges of the Ottoman Porte on this question to be disregarded, but to claim the fulfilment of those engagements which Lord Stratford de Redcliffe laboured with such happy results to obtain.

They submit this grave question with all the more confidence to your lordship's judgment, from a conviction that, having devoted your life to the cause of civil and religious liberty, you will not allow this liberty and freedom of conscience to be violated with impunity in any country in which the indignant remonstrance of the English nation can be successfully made.

On behalf of the Officers and Committee, (Signed) SHAFESBURY, President.

CHARLES JACKSON, Secretary

THE REV. DR. DUFF.

It may be known to our readers that this eminent missionary, driven forth from India by failing health, has returned to his native land, and that he has assumed the office of Convener of Foreign Missions in the Free Church of Scotland—an office to which he was appointed by the Assembly of the Free Church on its being made known that he was about to return. A meeting of the Commission of Assembly was held in Edinburgh, on the 10th of last month, at which the reverend doctor attended, as it may be said formally, to assume the office to which he had been appointed. In doing so he addressed his brethren with an energy and an eloquence which satisfactorily show that neither his

SYRIA.

v. Mr. Eddy, of the American Board, reports "a scene of deep interest, and of aring upon the advancement of Christ's cause." It was the ordination, at Abeih, ba Jerawan, a native of Syria. He had pursued a four years' course of study at minary, in a manner most satisfactory to his teachers, and had been for some ed as a teacher and preacher, proving himself faithful and efficient. His field expected to be the city of Hums and its vicinity. This is the second ordina- ive by the missionaries of the American Board in Syria. The first, that of Dr. , of Aleppo, occurred eleven years ago.

PERSIA.

rkins calls attention to the important fact, that the mission of the American mia is aided by sixty Nestorian preachers, addressing from Sabbath to Sabbath ber of congregations, the average number in attendance approaching 3,000. winter this number greatly increased; in many places it more than doubled.

There are also four or five itinerant evangelists, who carry the Gospel to many not included in these congregations. These preachers and their congregations are scattered widely, like so many beacon lights, among a hundred thousand Nestorians. The same agency is exerting an ever-increasing influence upon other nationalities—Persians, Koords, and especially Armenians. The missionaries have successfully introduced the system of Bible reading among the Nestorians, having now about twenty devoted females engaged in that work. Perkins says: "I believe this will become one of the most important means of evangelizing the masses in these regions, and in a very economical way." The Papists are making a spasmodic stir, as they have often done before; but Dr. Perkins is surprised to see how little they have accomplished.

Two of the American missionaries have been holding a series of protracted meetings on a distant part of the plain of Oroomiah. Inquirers, and large, deeply-attentive assemblies, are found at every place, encouraging the hope that the number of true conversions, within a short time, will prove to be not small. In and around Gawar, very cruel cases of oppression have occurred, in which the Christians have suffered from both Turks and Koords.

INDIA.

Within twenty miles of the capital of our Indian empire, a few weeks since, the festival of Juggernaut was celebrated, as of old, with all its sanguinary horrors. An eyewitness writes to the leading journal, describing the self-inflicted death of several persons by throwing themselves under the wheels of the idol's car. Looking beneath it, he says the wheels seemed as if they were clotted with human bodies. The police interfered, but too tardily.

Narratives of itineracies and visits among the heathen, by labourers in the field, are among the most interesting and trustworthy sources of missionary information, as the writers often give their impressions with a certain freshness and breadth of view, not to be obtained by a resident, yet without his inexperience. Several such narratives lie before us, in the letters and journals of ministers belonging to different communions; and amid the diversity of ecclesiastical administration which obtains abroad, as in our own land, it is gratifying to observe how often the paramount claims of the common brotherhood are recognised and acted upon.

The Bishop of Calcutta, writing to the Christian Knowledge Society, gives an account of his metropolitanical visitation of India and Ceylon, extending over nearly four months, in the course of which he delivered his charge in the cities of Madras, Bombay, and Ceylon. Here is the bishop's testimony respecting Tinnevely:—

In the most southern provinces of British India there are nearly 40,000 native members of our Church, whose Christian villages, schools, and churches were scattered like so many oases amidst the deserts of red sand and forests of palmyra-tree. They are under a regular parochial organization, far stricter and more real than anything which we see at home; they contribute largely of their own substance to the maintenance of the poor, the building of churches, evangelistic efforts among their heathen neighbours, and other good works; and they live under the ministry of twenty-four European and fourteen native clergy, assisted by nearly 200 native catechists. There is an efficient system of education organised throughout the province, both for boys and girls, and there are four excellent training institutions for masters, mistresses, and catechists. Generally speaking, the Christians are well spoken of, in most respects thoroughly well by the civil authorities. If they have not cast off with their heathenism every national vice, we Englishmen, at least, have no right to find fault with them, when we think how drunkenness pollutes the poorer, and selfish worldliness the richer classes among ourselves. I have no doubt that a Tinnevely parish is decidedly superior in morality to an ordinary parish in England, and I have never been present at any church services where there was more reverence and attention, and where the singing and responses were more devout and congregational.

The Prince of the native State of Travancore, though showing no inclination to Christianity himself, not only tolerates, but even encourages missionary work. The Bishop heard the heir to the throne tell the boys at the Rajah's school, at the capital of the country, that the missionaries were among the best friends of India. The southern part of Travancore is occupied by the Congregationalists, who, the bishop says,

Have, in proportion to the population, been almost as successful as our own Church on the other side of the mountains. We stayed one day at Nagercoil, their principal station, where I was as respectfully and hospitably entertained as if the missionaries had acknowledged me as their ecclesiastical superior. I examined a Bible-class of women, whose answers were really excellent; a strange contrast to the ordinary state of the female population of India.

The number of professing Christians in South Travancore is about 20,000, and the Church members nearly 1,500. The northern portion of Travancore and the adjoining state lookin are in the hands of the Church Missionary Society, and here the Church of land numbers about 8,000 adherents :—

Here, too, we visited the Syrian Christians. Of these more than 100,000 are in communion with acobite Patriarchate of Antioch, but about 50,000 adhere to the Church of Rome, their ances- having been forced into submission to the Pope by Alexis de Menezes, Archbishop of Goa, in the 17th century. At Cottyam, the head-quarters both of the Jacobite Metran, and of the Church onary Society, many of the Syrians, including even some youths in deacon's orders, are receiving tion in our college.

Pausing for a fortnight's rest at Ootacamund, amidst the healthy breezes which blow the beautiful Nilgeries :—

Here, in a deep valley amidst the mountains, at Kaity, I found some Germans working under the Missionary Society, trying to teach and Christianise some of the hill tribes. Of these the most kable are the Todas, who regard themselves as the aboriginal lords of the soil; and who wor- the bell which hangs round the buffalo's neck, and employ their priests in churning butter, they look upon as a religious rite, the dairy being also the temple of the village. Among there has, as yet, been no success at all; but some converts have been made among their tribu- , the Badegas—Hindoos who fled to the hills, from the Mohammedan conquest, and are now tritious agriculturists there. The missionaries live in the middle of a Badega village; and their as, though hitherto small, has been genuine.

The Rev. James Duthie, Principal of the seminary at Nagercoil—the station of the lon Society referred to above, as having been visited by Bishop Cotton—has employed of his vacation in itineracy in some other parts of South Travancore, accompanied by re evangelists. In the vicinity of a Hindoo temple, near Attoor, they were surrounded mob, led on by Brahmins, and were at first apprehensive that they would be driven to the town. They were able to make their retreat quietly, however, and even here were d with attention by a few of the less degraded of the people. In another part of the e district, quite among the dense jungle, at the foot of the mountains, they had what is e unusual, a small congregation of Mohammedans, who listened for nearly two hours to xposition of the Sermon on the Mount. Further on, still in the jungle, they came to a ge which it is supposed no European had ever before visited. Here the people had but adly come over to Christianity, through the labours of a catechist. Mr. Duthie says :—

The devil temple, with its walls completely covered with hideous representations of demons, done laring colours, and in and around which, for how long no one can tell, the frantic nocturnal es of the heathen have been performed, was still standing; but just beside it, indicating the ge that had taken place, a shed had been erected as a temporary place wherein to offer the lices of praise and prayer to the true and living God. Here the villagers assembled with pre- s of such things as they had to give. After service the chief man told us they had now no fear emons, and intended destroying the devil pagoda as soon as sufficient rain fell to soak the mud a.

Elsewhere the brethren were received with the greatest respect and kindness, even by heathen and Mohammedans. With reference to the native converts, Mr. Duthie's ion is that there is much nominal profession, yet that there are a faithful few at every re, exerting a beneficial influence on the surrounding heathen. There is "conclusive lence that Christianity has taken root in South Travancore."

The Baptist Society has commenced a mission to the Santals—one of the aboriginal es of India—and their agent, the Rev. R. J. Ellis, gives an interesting account of his ney to make the necessary arrangements. The Church Missionary Society is already in field, and the Wesleyan Society is about to enter it. It is pleasant to read of the ground g mapped out and divided for occupation by the three societies, upon a common under- ding. This was effected by Mr. Ellis, in conjunction with the Rev. W. T. Storrs, of the rch Mission. Mr. Ellis describes his enjoyment as very great, when after having laboured equire the power of speaking in Santali, he was at length able to make the people rstand in their own tongue, with clearness and accuracy, the wonderful works of God. r his first sermon he was plied with questions, many of them relating to the Messiah. ey were greatly delighted," says Mr. Ellis, "with the relation of His doings, teaching, l death, and reluctantly allowed me to depart, after being with them about an hour and al." During this tour he visited 176 villages, of which ninety-eight were Santali. He s on to say :—

In all these villages, with one exception, a Bengali village, our message was well received. The hile, especially, were delighted to see us, and were much surprised at what was said. When we le to them of the only begotten Son of God, they said that their god—the sun—had many chil- d. These, of course, were the stars. That God should desire our good was also new to them, for the prayers they only ask that he do them no harm. Of a hereafter, they had not heard, or of a day of account and judgment. The word they use for hell is a borrowed one, and the idea expressed by it is also foreign to them. Heaven they have not, or it is only the visible firmament. In short, the ideas we had to present to them were totally new, as regards them. What the effect would have been had we been gifted with the common language they have themselves, we cannot tell; but, as it was, they either stood or sat in amazement, repeating after us what we said, and wondering at it amongst themselves. The women were especially interested. They came out in crowds, with their infants in their arms, and, unlike the falsely-modest Bengali females, listened and asked questions.

The committee of the Church Missionary Society have authorised the establishment of a missionary college in Calcutta, to be affiliated with the Calcutta University, as recommended by Bishop Cotton.

A young Hindoo student of the University of Calcutta, named Behari Lal Chundra, has been baptized at the Free Church Mission in that city. He is one of the educated Bengalees referred to by the Rev. John Barton at the last anniversary of the Church Missionary Society (Evan. Chris., 1864, p. 288), who having become convinced of the truth of Christianity, and coming in contact with certain members of the Society of Friends visiting Calcutta, eagerly adopted the Quaker view of baptism, in order to escape the sacrifice which invariably accompanies it when administered to a Hindoo. Yet he felt called to seek to win others to the faith he had himself embraced. After eight or nine months' effort, an intimate friend became also spiritually awakened, and resolved to join him in leading a Christian life. At first, this friend, like himself, was for dispensing with baptism; but the views of Kali Charan Banerjee, as he is called, undergoing a change, Behari was led to re-examine his position. The result was a conviction that it was his duty to take the same step. The necessary arrangements were made, but when the hour for the administration of the ordinance arrived, he was a prisoner in the house of his relatives. Subsequently he escaped from their hands, almost naked, and was baptized. Both the young men are candidates for the ministry.

Gya—the strongest hold of idolatry in India, being the chief place of resort for pilgrims offering pinda for the liberation of the confined spirits of departed relatives from the power of the manes—has been visited by the Rev. E. Edwards, of the Baptist Society. This gentleman states that as the result of evangelization and education, the number of pilgrims to Gya is diminished by two-thirds.

A native clergyman in Bombay, connected with the Church Missionary Society, adduces, in proof of his assertion that Hindooism is being shaken to its very base, the fact that he had been visited by a Hindoo fakir, for the purpose of beseeching him to intercede with the Government for his support. As the people are beginning to see that they have been imposed upon, they refuse their contributions. The clergyman, of course, refused to interfere, and the fakir will be compelled to quit the place, to avoid starvation. From the same source we learn that the better-informed among the natives of Bombay are beginning to take an interest in Christian missions, and that they are likely to afford them liberal support. Men are wanted, however, who will give themselves entirely to the work of missions. He goes on to say:—

We have found it very difficult, as yet, to secure the services of such men. English education is drifting our young men into offices and railways, where they expect higher salaries than we can give them. Except we adopt the plan of our American brethren at Ahmednagar, in restricting the education of young men intended for the ministry entirely to their vernaculars, I fear we shall fail in getting them at all.

The difficulties incident to the pioneer work, pursued by some of the brethren, in remote districts, ought not to pass unnoticed. A new station has been established in the thriving town of Yeolah, in Western India. The native missionary, in commencing the work, found it a matter of doubt whether he would be able to secure a house for the purpose. A report was spread that the object of himself and the catechist by whom he was accompanied was to make Christians by force, and to pollute the waters by their unholy touch. For six days they searched for a home, going over every nook and corner of the town. At length they obtained, as a favour, and after much difficulty, a room, ten feet square, where they had to reside, apart from their families, for six months. The shopkeepers, at first, refused to deal with them, and even money, in their hands, appeared to be useless. The barbers were shocked, and held a consultation; they decided to shave the native missionary and the catechist, but resolved that their servant should go unshorn! Yet gradually prejudices are overcome, mistakes are corrected, and a spirit of inquiry is awakened.

CEYLON.

The churches in Ceylon which have been organised by the missions of the American Board are ten in number, four of which are under the care of native pastors, who are assisted by twenty preachers and catechists and many other native helpers. During the last year there have been forty admissions to the churches.

CHINA.

It is deemed a remarkable feature of the mission stations throughout China that the converts have received their first-fruits at a much earlier period than has fallen to the lot of their brethren in India. In Peking they are now received by the people with attention and kindness, and already an infant church exists in the capital of the empire. Several converts have solicited baptism from the missionaries of the London Society, and to four of these the sacred rite has been administered in the imperial city. Three of the four converts are Manchus, who have offices in the household of the Prince of Corea, a Manchu since :—

One of these men [writes the Rev. J. Edkins] in his leisure time had been in the habit of playing, by means of counters and slips of bamboo. The implements of this art he has given up to me, as evidence of his sincere abandonment of heathen superstition. These three converts are the first fruits of our evangelistic efforts in the western part of this great city. We began with a small room in the courtyard of one of the imperial temples—dedicated to the representative emperors of the successive dynasties of China, and known as the Ti-wang-miau. Here a Tien-tsin helper was placed to preach daily, and hold evening meetings for prayer. The old Manchu, baptized in the autumn, started himself to gather an audience in this little retired room. The three men who have just been converted were part of this little audience from the first. After a few weeks we were able to obtain a better house in an adjoining street; this has been open for worship since the end of January, and the same inquirers have been diligent attendants at this new preaching-room since that time. The congregation in fine weather numbers about sixty, and many are becoming desirous of receiving baptism.

A hospital patient, who has heard the preaching of the Gospel for a year and a-half, is the fourth baptized convert; his name is Wang-peï.

The Rev. Mr. Green, of the American Presbyterian Mission at Ningpo, reports the recent ordination of two Chinese. He also states that the church at Yuyiao has increased its number of communicants within the year from four to forty, and mentions the baptism of six persons at other stations. The whole number of Protestant missionaries now in China is said to be about ninety-five, and the number of Church members connected with Protestant missions not far from 2,500. Nearly one-third of these are found in Amoy and the villages around it, where, for several years, success has been remarkable. And "one of the most cheering features in this success is the circumstance that it has been, to a considerable extent, owing to the spontaneous efforts of the native Christians among their heathen neighbours."

SIAM.

Two agents of the American Presbyterian mission in Siam, having recently visited the country of the Laos (north of and tributary to Siam) returned with very favourable impressions as to the opening for missionary effort there, and make an urgent call upon the Presbyterian Board to enter the new field without delay.

JAPAN.

The Rev. D. Thompson writes from Yokohama that Echizen-no-Kami, a powerful samurai whose principality lies near Miaco, on the north, has taken a decided stand in favour of unrestricted intercourse with foreign nations, and in favour of progress generally. A paper has been widely circulated among the Japanese, in which he sets forth and defends his views. Echizen-no-Kami, it appears, expresses himself in favour of the toleration of Christianity; at least, he thinks the danger to be apprehended from its introduction is imaginary. He guesses that if the Christian religion should be excluded, for the same reason the doctrines and teachers of Buddhism should have been banished, as they are equally of foreign origin.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The French Protestant mission at Bethesda (Lessuto), at the commencement of the present year was cheered by a revival which occurred in connexion with the week of prayer. It was the more remarkable, as, just before, the low spiritual condition of his people had been the burden of a sorrowful letter which the missionary (M. Ellenberger) had written home. On the occasion in question, one individual after another arose, confessed his sin and begged for forgiveness, and the emotion visibly experienced made the scene one of the most striking character. Four months later, as we now learn, the good work still continued.

"There is less of violent emotion," writes M. Ellenberger, "but many eyes are still bathed in tears, and souls are becoming strengthened in vital religion—"

Up to the present time thirty-seven persons have been led to repentance. Of that number twenty-two appear to have found peace; the other fifteen are in the right way to obtain it. [daily] prayer-meetings continue. They are held in the morning at the church, in the evening at a native village at the missionary's house. There is such a thirst for the things belonging to salvation that every day we have to commence the meeting with a short address. The people's hearts flow forth, in a peculiar manner, towards our Divine Redeemer. One Sunday, I was unable to conclude my discourse, in consequence of the general emotion by which the congregation was carried away, as they heard of what Jesus Christ has done and suffered, the just for the unjust. The work of grace is now extending beyond our borders. Missionary zeal is manifesting itself among the members of the church. They have parcelled out among them the surrounding district, and have resolved to visit all the villages several times during the year. They have already gone through thirty-six localities. On Easter-day, six adults were admitted to the church by baptism. A large number of the brethren were present.

WEST AFRICA.

With the expulsion of missionaries from Tahiti and Fernando Po fresh in our recollection, it is not without concern that we hear that French and Spanish influence is making itself increasingly felt in Equatorial Africa. The Rev. Mr. Bushnell, of the American Board, says: "They claim, I believe, all the coast from Camma, 100 miles south of the Gaboon, nearly or quite to Cameroons River, north. Some points are claimed by both Governments."

A new church has been opened at Domingia, in connexion with the mission of the Propagation Society in the Pongas. Twenty-seven persons were baptized on the occasion.

M. Jacques, the missionary pioneer despatched by the committee of the French Protestant Society to Senegambia, has taken up his residence at Sedo, the capital of the province of Casamance. His reception was encouraging. In consideration of his labours being for the public good, he has received a free grant of land from the mission, upon which he is erecting a house. In this work he has received much friendly and even gratuitous assistance from those around him. M. Jacques thus concludes his letter to the committee in Paris: "I propose to you, Gentlemen, to found, at Sedo, our first and central missionary station in Senegambia. It is with eyes and heart filled with tears of gratitude that I pen these words. I add to my proposal a request for another missionary, and at least one good schoolmaster." The committee have intimated that they would deem themselves unfaithful to their trust if they were not to respond to this appeal. A missionary and a schoolmaster are to be sent, before the close of the present year, to reinforce M. Jacques.

Further south, in the same region, the Gambia has been visited by the Rev. T. Oldham, of the Church Missionary Society, with a view to ascertain what facilities exist for the establishment of a mission among the heathen in that colony. Mr. Oldham writes:—

My ministerial labours have been mostly directed to the people called Sereias, who are natives of a country near the Senegal, and who are pagans, with scarcely any form of worship. They are hardly ever known to pray to anything, though they wear charms about their persons, and trust in them. They are employed chiefly as labourers by the merchants, and traders, and captains, and also as horsemen or grooms by the owners of horses. On the Sunday afternoon I have had as many as 180 or 200 of these people before me, in front of the market place, when I have preached to them through an interpreter. I have never seen more attentive congregations in my life, and it was a positive joy to me to witness the expression of delight in their faces when they quite understood what was said and approved of it. Many of them seemed to hear the Word so gladly, that I cannot think that the seed thus sown will be altogether in vain. These people are very promising subjects for missionary effort.

Mr. Oldham adds that the governor of the colony, Colonel D'Arcy, is very anxious to have missionary work commenced there.

We regret to hear of the death of several missionaries on the Benin Coast. Dr. Harrison, of the Church Missionary Society; Messrs. Horsell and Bishopp, and Miss Bishopp, of the Society of Friends; and Mr. Harden, a South American Baptist missionary, of African descent, have all fallen beneath the effects of a season more unhealthy than usual. The tribal war in the interior of the Yoruba Country goes on without any decisive result. Many of the Dahomians are settling down to labour in Abbeokuta with apparent contentment.

AMERICA.

The Classis of Holland (Michigan) and Wisconsin, in carrying out the plan to support a new mission in South Africa, recently laid the keel of a ship of 300 tons, at Holland, Michigan, for the conveyance of missionary families, &c.

"Nearly all the churches in the loyal States," says the New York Methodist, "have now sent out missionaries into the recovered portions of the Southern States, to labour there, especially among the freedmen."

POLYNESIA.

Heathenism, in its most cruel form, still broods over the great majority of the population, in portions of the South Pacific. The Rev. Joseph King, of the London Society, as he sailed, at Maré, close by a place where, "only seven days before, eight captives, taken in war, were killed, cooked, and eaten." Mr. King was proceeding to the station to which he had been appointed in Samoa, but landed at Lifu, and passed two or three days there. He was walking down to the beach, with Mrs. K. (Mrs. Macfarlane, the wife of the resident missionary accompanying them), when an amusing incident occurred :—

Just as we had got to the boat, a number of natives, wild with excitement, rushed upon me; a strong fellow seized me by the arm and held me fast. From their fierce appearance one would have much more readily conceived that they had arrested me in this summary manner to club me, than for the purpose they had. The whole affair was soon explained. The man who had seized me was a chief who had come with his people twenty miles, from an inland district, to ask the committee if he could not have a missionary for his land. He had made the request several times before, and having heard, through Mr. Macfarlane, that I was originally appointed to the station on the other side of the island, he thought he had some sort of claim on me. We were quickly surrounded by all the natives on the beach. Mrs. Macfarlane intreated him to let me go, but he positively refused. While he thus held me fast, another native stood by the side of Mrs. King, who was on my arm, and harangued the crowd, urging them to carry me off by main force. When I repeatedly assured them, through Mrs. Macfarlane, that I must go, as I had been appointed to Samoa, they made reply by shouting, "Samoa all light! Lifu all dark!" Mrs. Macfarlane, finding that all her stratagems failed, sent for Mr. Macfarlane. When he came he addressed the crowd, explaining to them that it was quite impossible for me to stay; until at last the poor chief, with tears in his eyes and a sad heart, gave up his hold, to return to his people to tell them that his appeal had been made in vain.

Bishop Patteson, addressing a meeting at Adelaide, stated that he hoped to begin a mission in the islands of the Solomon Archipelago during the coming winter. No one can speak positively as to the population, as this is a totally unexplored part of the sea, but it is known that fever and ague abound there. The mission will be conducted, therefore, by natives inured to the climate. The Bishop said, referring to these and other islands of Melanesia :—

They found they [Europeans and natives of some other parts of the Pacific] could not live permanently on the islands, and he could not take upon himself the responsibility of locating a mission at a station where he knew in the course of things he would have to succumb to disease and death. He never remembered one occasion when returning to the stations that he did not find one or more of the party laid up with sickness. Well, indeed, he recollected coming away from one of the islands with four dear friends in such a state that every morning for five weeks each one inquired if the other three had died during the night.

Letters from missionaries of the American Board in Micronesia contain various points of interest. The writer of one of these letters—Mr. Sturges—

Has been over twelve years in Ponape, the farthest west and the largest of the islands occupied by the mission (about sixty miles in circumference, with a population estimated ten years since at about 5,000). He had associates formerly, but for the last two or three years his has been the only mission family on the island. But he has not laboured in vain.

Among the points touched upon are—

The progress of the work over the mountains, notwithstanding renewed persecution, and specially encouraging as the fruit of native Christian effort; the erection, by the people themselves, with much labour, of a chapel there, and a church at Mr. Sturges's station; the persecution at the station; the description of the motley gathering there, when the people were driven from their houses; the old, persistent efforts of the lone missionary to secure their rights; the arrival of the Morning Star with a bell for the church, called by the natives, "The Voice of God, summoning the multitude to his bosom;" the communion season, when sixteen natives for the first time, and among them the tanakin (principal chief) and his wife, came with twenty others around the table of the Lord; the statement that Christian parties are forming all about the island, and that there are earnest calls for teachers.

The Rev. Mr. Bingham also, on Apaiang (Micronesia), is permitted to speak of—

The dawning of brighter days, a first revival, the hopeful conversion of the king and queen (the latter having united with the Church and the former being propounded), and the noble conduct of the king in giving up the, to him, large profits of a tobacco traffic, which he felt to be injurious to the people and not for the glory of God.

This group had been unfortunately visited by the Peruvian slavers. One captain states his belief that thousands of natives have been taken from it by these dealers in human flesh.

Literature.

The Wisdom of our Fathers. Selections from the Writings of Lord Bacon, with a Memoir. The Religious Tract Society.

"THE Wisdom of our Fathers" is the title of a new series of volumes for popular perusal, which commenced with choice extracts from the writings of Archbishop Leighton, and is followed by the work before us, in which the master-mind of Bacon displays its rich and varied treasures. These selections are classified according as they relate to theological, ethical, philosophical, forensic, or miscellaneous subjects; and they readily enable the reader to gain some idea both of the power of Bacon's intellect, and of its extensive range. In the memoir, the great blot upon his fame is treated in a moderate and discriminating spirit, the writer's verdict being that, while he is proved to have been guilty of receiving gifts from suitors while their causes were still pending, yet he never allowed those gifts to warp his judgment or to affect his decisions.

Death or Life; or The Story of my Experience on "the Line." Nisbet and Co.

A LADY, whose experience extends over twenty years, here narrates the varying results which have attended her efforts for the spiritual good of railway labourers. Though these have not been wholly without success, yet she frankly sets down her failures as the most noticeable feature in her story. She applies herself, however, to trace them to their cause, and thus furnishes some useful hints for any who may listen to her appeal to labour for the welfare of the many neglected "navvies" in all parts of the country. Now and then we meet, in these pages, with some sketch from life, which reminds us of the sturdy, yet far from coarse men whom Miss Marsh has so well portrayed.

Conversion: The Danger of Delaying it. From the French of the Rev. JAMES SAURIN. A New Translation, with Introductory Memoir, by JOHN S. GIBB, F.S.E.L. Nisbet and Co.

THREE of Saurin's discourses on conversion are here translated anew into thoroughly good English, and combined so as to form a treatise on that important subject. Saurin's fame as a divine is too well established for any of his productions to require commendation; and if English pulpits are now less indebted than they once were to the works of the great French preacher, there is abundant scope for their diffusion through the press. The little volume is very neatly got up.

The Spiritual Casket of Daily Bible Meditations. By JOHN EVANGELIST GOSSNER. Translated from the German. J. F. Shaw.

AN admirable little manual, for devotional use, upon the plan of the "Golden Treasury," though we miss the verses which in that work conclude each chapter. Gossner, like Bogatzky, furnishes a brief meditation for every day in the year, and none who are familiar with the pages of the "Treasury" will fail to appreciate the contents of the "Casket," which, as the Rev. E. H. Bickersteth observes, in an introductory notice, are not only real jewels—genuine stones—but of "purest lustre and choicest value." The work deserves to be popular in England, as it already is in Germany.

Morning Dew; or Daily Readings for the People of God. Selected from the Writings of the Choicest Ancient and Modern Divines. By ISABEL CHARLOTTE GARBETT. Bath: Binns and Goodwin.

THIS volume, as its title indicates, is similar in design to that of which we have spoken in the preceding notice. The plan, however, is somewhat different. A passage of Scripture furnishes the basis for a daily meditation, adapted to promote direct spiritual improvement; but this is the work not of one, but of many pens. Miss Garbett has here brought together selections from the works of upwards of one hundred and sixty authors. They are made upon the most catholic principle, for nearly all sections of the Church of Christ are represented in these pages by well-known names. The Rev. E. Garbett introduces the work to public notice in a thoughtfully-written preface.

The Alexandra Magazine, and Woman's Social and Industrial Advocate. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

FICTION and fact, plain prose and pathetic verse—useful information, and sound advice, in all its forms, from the gentle hint to the serious admonition, for women who wish adequately to discharge their varied social duties, and especially that of self-help—form the leading features in this new aspirant for public favour. While admitting, in some respects, of improvement, the general design of the periodical is so commendable, and the execution of particular portions so excellent, that we hope it may at once command success.

The Lambs All Safe; or the Salvation of Children. By the Rev. ALEXANDER BALLOCH GROSART. Edinburgh: Oliphant and Co.

THIS is a very small volume, but one which is well fitted to comfort parents who have been bereaved of their children. A number of little gems in prose and verse, ancient and modern, bestud the pages, and Mr. Grosart has been quite successful in producing what, in his own style, we may call a quaint, pithy, and godly treasure of consolation for the Christian mourner. The inquiry is conducted on a scriptural basis, and the author's position is justified by a considerable number of texts.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

Our foreign correspondence this month will be perused with a melancholy interest. The impression produced by it is a sad and depressing one. Superstition and infidelity divide the Continent between them, while the witnesses for Christ, the believers in the Bible, are reduced to isolated localities, like a few lighthouses throwing a feeble light over a murky sky and a tempestuous sea. The Papacy seems of late to have changed its tactics, and to be now engaged in one desperate effort to put out the lights of science, and to arrest the tide of human progress. Never were the Ultramontanes more active—never did they appear to be nearer to success. And by the natural law of reaction, the Liberals, while resisting these arrogant claims of the Church, seem determined to throw off the restraints of Christianity altogether. We should not have been so much surprised if this infidel spirit had been exhibited only among the nominal adherents of Popery. The men who only know Christianity in its Popish form may be excused, if they cannot be justified, in rejecting it. But the misery is, that the poison is as rank in the Protestant as in the Catholic communities. And one noticeable feature is, that in the former the pastors themselves—the men who have undertaken to teach the people the pure Gospel—are usually the leaders of the infidel ranks, the most active in denying the Divine mission of Christ and the supernatural element in the Bible. It is a dark and gloomy prospect; but we do not abandon our trust in the Divine plan. It may be that this wave of sceptical feeling which has swept over Europe—and the passing shadow of which has blighted, to some extent, the spiritual life of our own Churches—may be the painful but necessary process for killing some hurtful weeds that encumber the ground, and thus preparing the soil for a more kindly reception of the good seed which shall issue in a harvest more rich and abundant than we have yet dared to dream of.

But in the meantime we can only watch the progress of the blight. We have no heart to dwell upon it. We can only refer our readers to our correspondence itself, in which they will see that in France, in Germany, in Switzerland—in all the great centres of continental life—infidelity is rampant, flecked, it is true, by bright gleams of Evangelical work, which give rich promise for the future. In Belgium, Ultramontanism has received a severe check at the recent elections. Our joy at the result would be the greater, if we did not know that the contest lay only between superstition and infidelity; and that the latter is only the more tolerable because it does not forbid, as Rome does, free and full discussion. And we are not sure that the defeat of the priests is so complete and decisive as our journals at home would have us believe.

In the general gloom, the letter of our Italian correspondent comes as a welcome relief. No doubt, in Italy also there is much superstition, and, no doubt, where the superstition has been thrown off, there has been much infidelity. But the letter itself is filled with other matters: it speaks of life, and activity, and true progress. The past, and to a large extent the present, condition of Italy is explained by the gross ignorance of the people. In the Southern States especially, there were many districts where the very name of schoolmaster was unknown, and even where schools did exist, the education given did not deserve the name. Our correspondent deplores the fact that the present Liberal Government is not so alive to the importance of education as they might be, but it appears that their supineness is made up by the patriotic zeal of many of the municipalities and by private efforts. After all, education rising from such sources is more likely to be efficient than schools established and schoolmasters endowed by the Government. In another point of view, the news from Italy is cheering. The canker of infidelity, wherever else it may have spread, has not affected the infant Italian Church. The evils they have to deplore are of a different and less baleful nature, arising from the bitterness of sectarian strife aroused by the Plymouth Brethren. And even that spirit, we rejoice to observe, is subsiding; and one native Italian preacher after another comes forward to deplore the evils of disunion, to regret the spirit they had before manifested, and to confess that the progress of the Gospel can only be secured by the exhibition of mutual love and trust among the members of all Evangelical denominations. In the meantime, Rome proceeds in her old course. To the abduction of the Jew by Mortara is now to be added the abduction of another Jew boy, Cohen. This case has occupied much of the attention of the French press, but the fullest details of the case that we yet appeared in this country will be found in the letter of our correspondent.

The good old cause of religious freedom has, for the present, shifted its battle-ground to Constantinople. We referred last month to the serious interference with the liberty of Protestant teachers and Protestant converts, the news of which had then newly arrived in England. Since then abundant information has been received, and we are in a position to form some opinion as to the conduct of the different parties concerned. The question, may mention, is felt to be of so much importance, that the secular press has opened its columns to intelligence on the subject; and it gives us pleasure to state that the narrative of the facts given by the different correspondents does not materially differ, however opposite may be their conclusions. It appears that there is a great religious movement now going on among the Turks in the capital. That agitation has been produced by Protestant teaching, though it has not led, at least in the first instance, to a profession of the Protestant faith. The Turks, in fact, seem rather disposed to effect reforms in their own religion than to adopt another; and this, probably, created more anger in the breasts of their co-religionists than a direct conversion to Christianity would have produced. But it is absurd to suppose that the Turks, if left to themselves, would have singled out the Protestant missionaries for insult. They would certainly in their hot blood have made an indiscriminate attack upon all who professed the name of Jesus, if their fury had not been artfully played upon and directed by Romish and Greek emissaries against that form of Christianity which equally opposes itself to all forms of corruption. So far, however, we see nothing but what the friends of the truth might be prepared to expect. But we are certainly startled to find the part which our Minister, Sir Henry Bulwer, took in this matter. We gladly put aside the suspicion, which seems, however, to be generally entertained at Constantinople, that the arrest of Protestants was, in the first instance, advised by him; we are even unwilling to believe that he remained indifferent till the outcries of his countrymen forced him to interfere. But still we are far from acquitting him of a scandalous neglect of the honour of his country and the interests of his fellow-countrymen. England is regarded as the protector of Protestantism, at least in as great a degree as France is the protector of Popery, or Russia of the Greek Church; and the English Ambassador ought to stand forward in defence of the missionaries with as much zeal as the French or the Russian Ministers stand up for their respective clients. This part of his duty was thoroughly understood by our late Minister, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, who announced it to be a great object of his mission to protect the Protestant teachers. We owe it to his lordship, indeed, that the Hatti-humayoun was enacted, and we scarcely expected that his immediate successor would so completely undo that noble work. Yet we find that Sir Henry Bulwer acquiesced in the closing of the Bible Society's premises, in the stoppage of preaching, and in the incarceration of converts, on the pretext that it was in the interest of the cause of Protestantism and for the security of the converts themselves. To most men it would have occurred that the duty of protection in such a case fell to the Minister himself, and not to a Turkish gaoler. We could not have believed that an English Minister would have shown so much timidity in his office, or such a forgetfulness of what was due to the honour of his country. We shall be much surprised if Lord Russell gives his sanction to the conduct of his Minister; but we need not say that this is an emergency in which the utmost vigilance will be required by the friends of civil and religious liberty of this country. We have no fear for the effects of this oppression upon the Turkish converts; we rather anticipate that, as in another remarkable case, these things will tend rather to the furtherance of the Gospel.

Recent accounts from India disclose the painful and startling fact that human sacrifices still continue to be offered at the bloody shrine of Juggernaut. Most Englishmen, and probably most Indians too, had come to the conclusion that the self-immolation of human victims under the idol car had been abolished long ago by the British Government, and so they had, so far as edicts and orders can abolish anything; but we have in this case a striking exemplification of the manner in which fanaticism and superstition can survive and defy the decrees of power. We owe it to the accidental presence of some English gentlemen at the last celebration of the idolatrous festival that this abomination, committed under our rule, was brought to light, and there seems no reason to believe that this was any mere solitary outburst of heathenish fanaticism, but rather that it was the ordinary custom at the festival. The Government police are no doubt stationed there for the preservation of order; but when we remember that these police are drawn themselves from among the natives, and are probably devout believers in the idol, we cannot wonder that they have been slow to report the continuance of these cruel rites. Now that further attention has no report comes from various quarters, but no definite step towards that end has yet been taken. The movement comes from parties friendly to the South; and if they have any, the condition of the unfortunate negro will, we fear, be more hopeless than ever. I do not say that this movement, so far as there is any reality in it, is adverse to President Lincoln, who, whatever his faults, has always shown himself the warm friend of the slave.

H O M E.

The bitterness of religious hate broke out in Ireland, last month, in its most odious form. On the 8th of the month the Roman Catholics had a grand procession through the streets of Dublin, preliminary to laying the foundation-stone of a monument to the memory of O'Connell. The procession partook much of the nature of a religious festival. Priests were at the head of the procession, and the symbols of Romish guilds and other fraternities figured in the line. There was also a profusion of green flags, ribbons, and garlands of all sorts; and, in fact, everything was done to make it a sectarian and factious demonstration.

The exhibition of these religious and party emblems was of course contrary to law; and the Orangemen of the North were naturally irritated, as the exhibition of their party symbols is strictly prohibited. But the partiality of the Government affords no excuse for the scenes that followed. On the day that O'Connell was thus honoured in Dublin he was burnt in effigy in Belfast; but in neither case did the antagonist parties then show any disposition to retaliate. On the following day, however, the Orange party in Belfast decided to follow up the demonstration of the preceding night by going through the streets of a mock funeral of the remains of the effigy, in a churchyard belonging to the Roman Catholics. This was an insult that the Romanists could not tolerate, and on the 9th of the month rioting began, which for eleven days held one of the principal towns of the island in a paralysis of terror, anarchy, and bloodshed. Wherever bands of the Orange and Catholic parties came into collision, the latter were scattered like chaff; but, for the most part, the fighting consisted in bands sallying forth to some part of the quarters of their opponents, that was for the moment deprived of defenders, and there wrecking houses, smashing the windows of chapels and schools, and beating hapless wayfarers—men, women, and children, it mattered little to the savages—that might fall into their hands. All this time, a large body of troops and of the semi-military police of the country kept pouring into the city, till it was said that a military force of 10,000 men was concentrated there, but of no avail. The magistrates seem to have been paralysed, and gave no orders. It will hardly be believed that this most alarming outbreak was quelled by the respectable portion of the inhabitants, Protestant and Roman Catholic, coming together and agreeing to visit the disturbed districts, reason with the people, to explain and defend his views. It deserves to be noted, too, that at the time, Bishop Colenso has come forward with another explanation of his opinions, he denies that he ever said or wrote anything to prove that the Scriptures are not inspired. He holds, he says, the doctrine of inspiration as firmly as any one of his opponents; but then he maintains that inspiration is not incompatible with error in matters that are not purely spiritual. Bishop Wilberforce, on the other hand, though he admits the "human element," maintains that, in point of fact, no error or defect is to be found in the Word of God.

The Wesleyan Conference, which was held during the last month, revealed the unwelcome fact, that there is a diminution in their number of Church members, as compared with last year. It is true, the falling off is a mere trifle, some thirty or forty on the one side rather than on the other, but the great point is the cessation of that success which has hitherto enabled them to record with joy and thankfulness at every returning year an addition to their ranks. The statement was received by the Conference with humiliation and searching of heart; and it was resolved to seek for a remedy—where only an efficient remedy can be found—before Almighty God, in fasting and prayer. In other respects there was cause for thankfulness. The society enjoyed a full measure of peace and union; and their President, the Rev. Mr. Thornton, who had gone on a mission of inspection of the Wesleyan Churches in the northern districts of America, was able to report that the body, both in the colonies and in the Federal States, enjoyed the same amount of peace and harmony.

It will be seen by a reference to our religious intelligence, that that eminent missionary, the Rev. Dr. Duff, has returned home, and has accepted the post of Convener, or as we should say in England, Chairman of the Free Church Committee on Foreign Missions. It is difficult to over-estimate the value of this appointment. Successful as he has been in Calcutta, we do not hesitate to say that, if his life and strength be spared, his most valuable services to the mission cause are about to begin. What he did in the direct work of conversion was no doubt great; what he will now be able to do in stirring up the zeal and energy and self-denying devotion of others to undertake missionary work, must be greater still. His burning eloquence, joined to his missionary experience, will give a higher tone to the mission cause than it has ever yet reached, and will cause it to occupy a more prominent position in the Christian community. We only hope that his services will not be wholly confined to his own Church.

If the multiplication of churches be the real strength of a denomination, then Popery is rearing its head again in England. The Roman Catholics are building new and splendid chapels in all directions, and they take care to let the world know it. For the success of their cause, however, it would be better that they should trust wholly to the effect of these grand buildings and the splendour of their ritual, and commit themselves as little as possible to the utterance of their thoughts. They cannot speak without saying something that grates upon the feelings, not of religious persons only, but of all free men of this country. It was but the other day, at the consecration of a chapel at Leamington, that Bishop Ullathorne complained that the Government which looked to him and his colleagues to inculcate loyalty and order, denied them a legal standing; a complaint which might, on exactly the same ground, be uttered by every Dissenting minister in the country. If Bishop Ullathorne considers it a hardship to have to inculcate respect and obedience to law, and a duty so repugnant to his feelings, that he ought to be bribed into doing it, by some social recognition of his rank, why the sooner the people of England understand this the better. Still more audacious were the sentiments uttered at the opening of another chapel by "Monsignore" Manning, the old Archdeacon of Chichester, who seems now to be transmogrified, body and soul, into a Romish dignitary. Our readers will remember the horrible catastrophe at Santiago, where some hundreds of women were burned in a church at the festival of the Virgin. They will also remember the comments made on this shocking calamity by the English press, and they will be able to say whether any word was then uttered beyond indignation at the conduct of the priests. But Monsignore Manning now declares that every comment was directed against the Virgin, and that the blasphemies then uttered against her were enough to draw down the indignation of her Son, but for the intercession of the Monsignore and his fellow-religionists. How completely Rome must be able to transform the whole nature of a man, when an Englishman, born and bred, can bring himself to talk in such an absurd style as this, and descend to belie and malign his own countrymen!

Evangelical Christendom.

THE MIND OF THE MASTER.

Lowly and earnest, kindly and hopeful, the spirit of Jesus was in the highest sense a holy spirit. So lofty. He never gave up the claims of God; never surrendered truth; never said or did aught inconsistent with His inborn majesty; but in His lowliest guise still king-like, in the midst of people coarse and contracted pure, elevated, and separate from sin, He never for a moment quitted that region of exalted thought and feeling which formed His mental homestead, and with increasing lustre as the path grew darker He shone upon our world peerless and unprecedented, the Holy One of God.

Withal so kind, so humane, and gracious. Where greatness is inherent, it does not need to condescend. Pride is perpendicular, and an assumed superiority is stiff; it cannot bend, or if it tries to stoop, it comes down and collapses altogether. The Lord Jesus was great: His very gentleness made Him greater. It was largeness of life, an abundance of being, broad and all-embracing, which caused His sympathies to fill up the whole channel of humanity as the waters fill the sea. Hence, true High Priest of our profession, fit Mediator betwixt God and man, He came so near to all His brethren, that each was apt to feel as if in this new relation he had the largest share; and whilst the little child felt at home in His arms, and the pardoned penitent wept at His feet, the savage whom no man could tame, bound by cords of mysterious love, followed meekly in the way, and the sequestered spirit, surprised in his deep loneliness by an unexpected intimacy, no longer called himself a stranger in the earth. Such a divinely-endearing goodness, that down to the present hour it is by loving Jesus that most men learn the love of God: such goodness, that the Saviour's sympathy, sought in prayer and realised by faith, is still the great means of self-mastery, the great secret of self-denial: such endearing goodness, that in the soul which it fully conquers it supplants sinful affections and over each lawful relation and each innocent enjoyment sheds a holy and exalting charm.

So hopeful too. Though His path was shaded by the coming cross, though He knew what was in man, and anticipated those awful outcomes of depravity which have filled with horror so many periods of human history, and although the most ominous, the most alarming words in the Bible are certain words of Jesus, such as His confidence in truth and goodness, such His fellowship with the Father, such His sublime resolvedness, His serene preparedness for any possible suffering, that to our world He has been the great fund of heart and hope, His ministry consciously or unconsciously the motive and the model of all philanthropy, His example the inspiration of all who in the conflict with evil have not failed or sunk down discouraged, His approval the guerdon sought by each home-leaving missionary, by each life-surrendering martyr.

Such was the spirit of Jesus—the spirit of His life, the spirit of what He spake; and it is of little use to read the letter of His discourses except in sympathy with himself. A critic of our own* has said—

A perfect judge will read each work of wit
With the same spirit that the author writ; and whether they be the sermons and dialogues which His own lips uttered, or the preceding and following Scriptures which the Eternal Wisdom prompted and in-
